
HOW TO ENJOY A VENISON FEAST.—At a venison feast, Sir Joshua Reynolds addressed his conversation to one of the company who sat next to him, but, to his great surprise, could not get a single word in answer, until at length his silent neighbour, turning to him, said, "Sir Joshua, whenever you are at a venison feast, I advise you not to speak during dinner-time, as in endeavoring to answer your questions I have just swallowed a fine piece of fat without tasting its flavor."

"You envy your head rather high," as the owl said to the giraffe when he poked his nose into the belfry.

A NOBBY BEE.—Captain Wilbraham, when at a village in America, was crowded into a stable for the night which resembled Noah's ark. Children were squalling the whole night through, and two young fellows whiled away the cuptain ...e bu:dr! We had such a night of disquiet, a few years since, upon a visit to Pennsylvania. The village inn was "full," and we were compelled to seek rest in a cabin, where our hospitable partition was only two-thirds of the entire height of the apartment. We were annoyed most hastily, a child in the house had the whooping-cough, and the father rose at day-break, and killed a pig just under our window!

"Will you please to permit a lady to empty this seat?" said a gentleman to a fellow-passenger in a railway carriage. "I do see an advocate of woman's rights!" asked the astonished gentleman, and moved to the other side. He replied he who was standing. "Well, then, let her take the benefit of her discovery!" was the reply.

Curious answers often come out in examination for the Civil Service. The word "inheritance" occurring in a paper of reading, the examiner asked the youngster, "What is inheritance?"—"Patrimony."—"What is patrimony?"—"Something left by one's father."—"What would you call it, if left by a mother?"—"Matrimony."

We find in a provincial paper an account of two culprits who escaped from the custody of the sheriff, and hid themselves in a gun. They should, when found, have been discharged at once.

When Mr. White looks black, does he change color?

INK, BLOOD, AND TEARS.
(THE TAKING OF FORT SUMTER.)

A Forty hours' bombardment! Great guns throwing Their iron hail: shells their mad selves exploding: Furnaces lighted: shot in red heaps glowing: Batteries fired: and fort-armament, firing, loading— War's visible fiend, in all his terrors, raging! And all her devils free to use their powers— And yet not one life lost! Not one life for our lovers.

"Oh, here's a theme!" quoth Punch, of brag abhorrest, "Twixt promise and performance rare proportion!" This shoe-cloth, of five lines giving account!

Mocking some mangy, stunted, stuffed abortion: Then, groping, covers hiding, nought to see: These white-like nutes among little fishes— Here is the sum of all: no more my verses wishes.

"What ringing of each change on brag and bluster! These figure hogs of speech, summed in a note! This war-march, subsiding to "Yankee Doodle!" Thus entry of Tom Thumb, armed like a hero, Of all great deeds o'er great words the type! Of all big bubbles by fools' breath filled full, Sure seed the greatest, yet, and emptiest, for John Bull!

"John always thought Jonathan, his young brother, A little of a bully; and he swaggered, But in all cases of fight with one another, Nor John nor Jonathan were ever known to "Lagyard." This now, if any smart Jonathan style 'coward,' Or from that bright word shrunk, will now, their flag-staff towered."

Punch nibbed his pen, all jubilant, for gulling— "When suddenly a weight weighed down the feather, And a tear from his eye fell on the paper. Came from the nib; and the drops rolled together. And seemed and smelled and looked like ink, but blood; Drops now, but soon to swell into a flood, Because our Summer's leaf has borne Spring's guarding bud.

"Blood by a brother's hand drawn from a brother— Blood by the hand of Cain! Blood by Cain's legend! Are both the children of an English mother? Were both that mother's darlings? Why, they've striven! Wasn't not enough, that parricidal jar, But they must now put on Fratricidal war? If such strife drew no blood shall England scuff therefore?

"If she will laugh, through then, her shattered wit, Yet then the sick whisper of her heart will visit! Will find a figure for thy pen more fit. We blood-drops, blood-tears, blood-words round off Point, pun, and paragraph in this new way: Till rom shall read and hear with laughing, say, 'Well thrust! Punch is in vain: 'tis his old sober cry.'"

The weight sat on my quill: I could not write; The fit had passed: the fancy my pen—in vain! I had my theme—Brothers in war—Civil strife! Yet found no humor. Every jesting mood turned pain. I thought of all that civil war had been— Had cost and caused, up and roads and seas, And lo! the blood-drops of the pen were changed to tears!

And for the horse tongues that those bloody goals Had found, or seemed to find, upon my ears Like up a pigeon's throat— Of long-drawn sweetness—pity breathed through tears

And thus they sang:—"Twas not by chance, Still less by Fate, that this befell: That Sumter's battle came and closed, Nor could it stay— 'Twas not that Northern hearts were weak, Or flesh and blood failed, Or faith with silver fail, Freedom and Fatherland, Alien, Gaius, And gallant Wayne were there.

"With those who rose at Boston, At Philadelphia met, Whose graves give over the Union's seat By their dark charter set. Adams and Jay, and Henry, Rutledge and Randolph, too— And names as great as Liberty's fame Hath sealed brave, wise, and true.

"An awful host—above the coast, About the fort, they hung: And fierce pale, too proud to wail, But with sore anguish wrung. And Faith and Truth, and Love and Ruth, Hovered the battle o'er, Hindering the shot, that freight of death Should reach the fated shore.

"And thus it happed, by God's good grace, And those good spirits' hand, That Death forbore the lugged place, The battery guarded stand. Thanks unto Heaven on bended knee, Not scuff from mocking scorn, Rose as the smoke of sacrifice And a strife like this is borne!"

THE CAUTIOUS HUSBAND.

As through the town the mourners went
To bury Noah's wife,
The coffin struck a corner-stone
And brought her back to life—
And then poor Noah's days again
Were filled with ceaseless strife.

But years flew by—again she died—
They came to lay her low:
"My friends," the weeping husband cried,
"We face the type, we know—
We very nearly had you turn
The corners as you go!"

DOMESTIC INTELIGENCE.

THE OCCUPATION OF VIRGINIA.

ELSEWHERE will be found an illustration of the armed march of Arlington Heights and Alexandria by the Federal forces. The troops have been lining the heights of the Potomac, on the Virginia side, are actively engaged in throwing up earth-work and fortifying their position. A reconnoissance made on Monday from Alexandria in the direction of Fairfax Court House, resulted in the discovery of a body of secessionist cavalry drawn up in line. Two of their pickets were captured and sent to Washington. They confirm the report that a force of 700 rebel infantry had arrived within a few miles of Alexandria on Saturday.

AFFAIRS AT NORFOLK AND PORTSMEN MONROE.

General Butler is at Fortress Monroe, and will probably move on Norfolk as soon as he has the requisite force. Three regiments of secessionists, under Colonel Mallory, commander of the rebel forces near Hampton, were brought to the Fort by the Union troops, and are now occupying the escape to avoid being sent further South. A flag of truce was sent from the rebels for the surrender of the forces under the Putative State Law, but General Butler informed the messenger that he could not recognize the validity of any ordinance passed by the seven secession States which had already seceded. Twenty-one rebels arrived there on Saturday. Intelligence received on Saturday. Intelligence received confirms the report that there are 3000 rebel troops at Richmond, under Generals Lee and Johnston, and 12,000 at Fredericksburg, under General Ruggles. Gen. Davis and General Beauregard are expected at Richmond.

POSITION OF AFFAIRS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Our dates from Cairo are to the 23d. The building of fortifications was still progressing. Several heavy thirty-two pound cannon had just arrived, and a number of rifled cannon. Captain Prime, the Engineer-in-Chief of the camp had visited Bird's Point, across the river. The point was considered by Government forces when it was necessary; but as present occupied by rebels, who are using their guns to command the river below. There are 4500 rebel troops at Columbus, under Major-Gen. Polk. Troops are still arriving at Fort Jackson, Mississippi, 1500. They are poorly fed, poorly clad, and badly armed. Provisions are scarce.

The position of rebel troops left New Orleans on the 20th, according to reports, was:

THE REBEL FORCES IN TENNESSEE.

An order, issued by General Pillow, commanding the forces in Tennessee, directs that all the volunteers from the counties of Shelby, Fayette, Madison County, in that State, for immediate service. Jackson is a great railroad centre, and one of the roads leads direct from that place to Columbus, on the Mississippi, only twenty miles below Cairo.

AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

By a compact entered into between General Harney, of the United States forces, and Governor Jackson, commanding the State militia, the latter forces, comprising 4000 men, are to disband and disperse to their homes. The St. Louis Democrat of the 24th says: "Reports from Jefferson City that Gen. Harney has ordered troops organized under the requisition of Governor Jackson to disband, and that Governor Jackson has refused to accept of agreement between General Harney and General Price, for the disbandment of the State troops, and has ordered by the secessionists at the arrangements minded to." The same paper states that considerable excitement prevails at Jefferson City in consequence of the discovery of a secret league of rebel State troops, by pulling arsenic in the flour from which their bread is made. The discovery is Union man is taken up the troops, and a secessionist, in order to effect his design, had mixed the poisonous ingredient with the flour to poison the bread. She informed against him, and spoke very highly of the kind and motherly conversation between him and the woman, who he was arrested and placed in jail. He protested his innocence of being him, but it was overruled.

CONDITION OF AFFAIRS AT FORT PICKENS.

By the arrival of the transport steamer Philadelphia we have advices from Pensacola to the 19th and Key West to the 22nd inst. All was tranquil at Pensacola officers. All vessels with fuel and supplies for the Confederate forces are detained at Key West, and are all to be sent. They were constructing a railroad so as to evade the blockade, which they were also constructing a railroad to the 19th. It is stated by one of the passengers on the Philadelphia that one of the Confederate officers at Pensacola had declared that General Bragg would not be ready to attack Fort Pickens before the 1st of May. It was also generally believed that he would abandon the attack and march North with his forces, believing that Fort Pickens could be properly equipped, and with only a portion of their batteries mounted. The Confederate forces had arrived before the blockade, they can not get them until the railroad is completed.

SOUTHERN PRIVATEERS AT WORK.

Jeff Davis's privateers are reported as already at work on the Atlantic coast and also in the Gulf of Mexico. The brig Etelka Isaacs, which arrived at Boston yesterday from Savannah, Georgia, reports having been captured by a privateer schooner and taken to Brunswick. She was, however, released by order of General Pillow, for some reason not stated. The Captain of the Isaacs reports that the schooner had been seized and confiscated as a prize.

SOUTHERN VESSELS SEIZED.

The Niagara and Huntsville have taken several prizes and rent them North, and the United States fleet at Key West have taken other prizes. A Northern vessel has been taken by the rebels at Apalachicola, Florida, and it is reported also by the Confederates at Pensacola. The navy appointed Admiralty Judge and District Attorney of the Confederate States at Key West for the purpose of organizing their Court, but finding the place so thoroughly loyal to the United States, they did not attempt it, but made a precipitate retreat from the city.

STOPPAGE OF THE MAILS.

The Postmaster-General has changed the location of the sending States by forbidding the transmission of all mail matter, except letters, by river, or by land route, to each and every one of the rebellious States. Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, Missouri, and Tennessee are exempt from this proscription.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT LOAN.

The Treasury Department, immediately after the opening of the proposals on 25th, commenced informing the successful bidders of the result. The Secretary accepted all for the bonds placed at 85 and upward, and awarded the remainder to those who offered the Treasury notes at or above par. There were awarded of the bonds $6,753,000, and of the Treasury notes $8,241,000.

ARMS FROM BALTIMORE.

The War Department was on 27th offered a battalion and battery of four 12-pounders by a gentleman from Baltimore. They will probably be accepted.

NEGRO INSURRECTION IN ARKANSAS.

A negro insurrection was recently discovered in Des Arc, Arkansas. The punishment of the offenders was summary and severe. One white man and three negroes were hung, three negroes were banished, and a number of others were severely whipped.

SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS IN KENTUCKY.

The Legislature of Kentucky adjourned on the 24th. By laws just enacted the courts of the State are suspended until the 1st of January next, and the banks are allowed to suspend specie payments.

WHY THE KENTUCKY LEGISLATURE PASSED NO ORDINANCE OF SECESSION.

The Cleveland Plaindealer tells the following incident, which reveals the secret of the Kentucky Legislature:

A venerable old farmer from a neighboring county, one of that kind for which Kentucky has an instinctive veneration, appeared in the Legislature. The rage for secession was then at its highest. He crept in the first day, and for half an hour he sat in one of the benches, apparently dazed and bewildered. Finally, he arose slowly and said he had a word to say, but was aware he was out of order for him to speak before the Legislature while in session. He was gently dissuaded, and the venerable appearance retreated attention, and "Go on!" "Go on!" from several voices, seemed to keep him on his feet. Again expressing his diffidence at speaking out of propriety, "Hear! hear!" resounded gratifyingly from all sides. The member of curiosity as well as respect for the appearance and manner of the man rose to a dead silence followed the "Hear! hear!" when the old hero delivered the following eloquent but simple speech:

"Gentlemen,—I am delegated by my county to inform you that if you take a fool-hardy secret course, and threaten to do, not one stone of this Capitol will rest upon another twenty-four hours after you secede." And he left.

AN IMMENSE GUN FOR FORTRESS MONROE.

An enormous rifle cannon is just being finished at Pittsburg for Fortress Monroe. The gun is to be 16 feet 6 inches long, of bore 14 inches, diameter of the gun at the breech 48 inches, diameter at the muzzle 25 inches. The ball will be 12 inches in diameter, and the weight of the projectile 1000 pounds. The charge of the gun weighs 75,000 pounds; finished, it will weigh 60 pounds. The chamber has 1 pound.

MEAN THEFT OF A SECESSIONIST.

An officer who recently resigned from the Mississippi steam-frigate, while he was stationed at the Navy-Yard, purchased some repairs made to her machinery, and when he left the vessel he took away with him the old delivery-pipe, and replaced it with guns and cowans. The pipe was found in his bed-room last week, but escaped for a short distance when the pipe gave way, and a large quantity of water poured down into the room. The engines were immediately stopped, the break was temporarily repaired, and the ship towed to the Navy-yard.

PERSONAL.

Colonel John C. Fremont has been appointed a Major-General.

The friends of Mr. Douglas in Washington are in receipt of letters from him, justifying his course in the past, and especially he restored to his usual good health.

Mr. Joseph Jefferson, the well-known actor of his name, is residing, as a man living in his possession a secession flag-staff, which he has converted into a clothes-prop. Rumor says, where Colonel Ellsworth was so barely assassinated, and where Joseph lives still.

Lieutenant Slemmer and his late command, of Fort Pickens, arrived at New York last week on board of the steam-transport Philadelphia, which brought also the rebel prisoners between seamen and children.

George N. Sanders has become a prominent character in Montgomery, Alabama. The Montgomery Advertiser thinks that if it were not for the pretentious and boastful manner which by high officials he would receive an invitation to leave.

Governor Sprague has temporarily left the Rhode Island Regiment, which he accompanied to Annapolis, and visited at home.

Colonel J. Circo, Sub-Treasurer in this city, has been requested by the President to withdraw his letter of resignation, and to resume the duties of the office, the duties of which he has so ably discharged during the last eight years.

Henry T. Blow is appointed Minister to Venezuela. He was the only Republican voter in Jacquair County but a full, consistent, and thorough Union man. He is a Whig, and is a thoroughly true-worthy Union man.

The Virginia officers of the regular army will be commanded as follows: Richmond, Jeff Davis' Norfolk, Lee; Harper's Ferry, Johnston; Alexandria, Beauregard; Johnston.

Captain Wilcox, of the Michigan Regiment, in command at Alexandria, graduated at West Point in 1817; served in the Mexican war, and was engaged in active service until two or three years since, and re-entered when the country called.

Governor Banks will be tendered a Brigadier-Generalship, and the command of the forces at the Capital of the master-General. This is regarded by the President and his Cabinet as the best means to preserve the efficient position connected with the service. Governor Banks's great character and great ability will command this selection to the country as one most happily and eminently made.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE QUEEN'S PROCLAMATION.

The proclamation of the Queen has been issued by the Privy Council, warning all British subjects from interfering, at their peril, with the affairs of the American colonies, or giving aid and comfort in any way, by personal service or by supplying munitions of war, to either party. The proclamation announces it as the intention of the British Government to observe the strictest neutrality in the contest between the Government of the United States and the Government of States attempting themselves the Confederate States of America.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE AS PROPHESYERS.

The London correspondent of the New York Evening Post states most positively that many of Jeff Davis's private letters of marque have been taken in London and Liverpool, by Spanish hoxers, and that from steamers have been fitted out for the purpose of preying on the commerce of the North. This correspondent asserts that the master of a vessel just arrived from Liverpool had large numbers of American ships have changed hands at ruinous prices, and other ships have been fitted out with guns in such vessels.

NEW SUBMARINE LINES TO SOUTHERN PORTS.

The British and American Southern Steamship Company advertise that their first vessel for New Orleans direct will be the Melbourne—to leave Liverpool on 7th August, to be followed on the 4th September by the Rangoon, and thereafter every alternate Wednesday by screw steamers now being built.

FRANCE.

SECESSION FLAGS NOT RECOGNIZED.

Secession flags do not find favor in French ports. The ship Matilda, from Savannah, bound to Palermo, attempted to enter the harbor of Havre on the 29th of April, but was not allowed to do so, until she hauled down the rebel abortion, and hoisted in its place the "Stars and Stripes."

SPAIN.

THE ANNEXATION OF ST. DOMINGO.

In the British House of Lords, on the 14th ult., Lord Wodehouse, in reply to Lord Brougham, stated that Spain, at the request of the inhabitants, had accepted the annexation of the eastern portion of St. Domingo; but the Spanish Government had informed Her Majesty's Government that slavery should not be re-established in that portion of the island.

ELLSWORTH.

A BATTLE HYMN FOR ELLSWORTH'S ZOUAVES.

AIR—"Bruce's Address to his Army."

Who is this ye say is slain?
Whose voice answers not again?
Ellsworth, shall we call in vain
On thy name to-day?
No! from every vale and hill
One response all hearts shall thrill:
"Ellsworth's fame is with us still,
Ne'er to pass away!"

Bring that rebel banner low,
Hoisted by a treacherous foe:
'Twas for that they dealt the blow,
Laid him in the dust.
Raise aloft, that all may see,
His loved flag of liberty.
Forward, then, to victory,
Or perish if we must!

Hark to what Columbia saith:
"Mourn not for his early death;
With each patriot dying breath
Strength renewed is given
To the cause of truth and right,
To the land for which they fight.
After darkness cometh light,
Such the law of Heaven."

So we name him not in vain,
Though he comes not back again:
For his country he was slain;
Ellsworth's blood shall rise
To our gracious Saviour-King—
'Tis a holy gift we bring;
Such a sacred offering
God will not despise.

THE MURDER OF COLONEL ELLSWORTH.

WE publish herewith a Portrait of THE LATE COLONEL ELLSWORTH, and another of PRIVATE BROWNELL, who avenged his murder; and on page Illustrations of the CAMP OF THE ELLSWORTH ZOUAVES at Washington.

The following sketch of Colonel Ellsworth's life is by his friend, Mr. Duncan:

"Colonel Elmer E. Ellsworth was born at Mechanicville, New York State, and was, at his death, between twenty-three and twenty-four years old. He received at Mechanicville a common school education, and came to this city about nine years since. He was engaged in business here for about four years, and then went to Chicago. While here, all his time, when not in business, was spent in studying, preparing himself to enter West Point. He made many endeavors to secure a cadetship at West Point, but, being without influential friends, was unable to do so. After being compelled to relinquish his pet project of going to West Point, he went to Chicago, and there formed his celebrated company of Chicago Zouaves. His parents are now both living at Mechanicville, in this State. His younger brother, a young man of great promise, died at Chicago at the time when his ZOUAVES first started for this city, and his remains were brought on and interred at Mechanicville by Colonel Ellsworth. Colonel Ellsworth was the only remaining son of his parents. Mechanicville is a small town on the Hudson River, twelve miles above Troy, in Saratoga county."

The following "last words" of Colonel Ellsworth were read in one of the churches on Sunday. It was written on the eve of the battle in Virginia:

"HEAD-QUARTERS FIRST ZOUAVES,
CAMP LINCOLN, WASHINGTON, May 23, 1861.

"MY DEAR PARENTS AND BROTHERS,—The regiment is ordered to move across the river to-night. We have no means of knowing what reception we are to meet with. I am inclined to the opinion that our entrance to the city of Alexandria will be hotly contested, as I am just informed a large force has arrived there to-day. Should this happen, my dear parents, it may be my lot to be injured in some manner. Whatever may happen, cherish the consolation that I was engaged in the performance of a sacred duty; and to-night, thinking over the probabilities of the morrow and the occurrences of the past, I am perfectly content to accept whatever my fortune may be, confident that He who noteth even the fall of a sparrow will have some purpose even in the fate of one like me. My darling and ever-loved parents, good-by. God bless, protect, and care for you.

ELMER."

The following account of Colonel Ellsworth's murder is from the pen of MR. HOUSE, the Tribune correspondent, who actually had his hand on Colonel Ellsworth's shoulder when Jackson shot him:

"On entering the open door, the Colonel met a man in his shirt and trowsers, of whom he demanded what sort of a flag it was that hung above the roof. The stranger, who seemed greatly alarmed, declared he knew nothing of it, and that he was only a boarder there. Without question, ing him further the Colonel sprang up stairs, and we all followed to the topmost story, whence, by means of a ladder, he clambered to the roof, cut down the flag with Winner's knife, and brought it from its staff. These were two men in bed in the garret whom we had not observed at all when we entered, their position being somewhat concealed, but who now rose in great apparent amazement, although I observed that they were more than half dressed. We at once turned to descend. Private Brownell leading the way, and Colonel Ellsworth immediately following him with the flag. As Brownell reached the first landing-place, or entry, after a descent of some dozen steps, a man jumped from a dark passage, and hastily noticing the private, leveled a double-barreled gun muzzle at the Colonel's breast. Brownell made a quick pass to turn the weapon aside, but the fellow's hand was firm, and he discharged one barrel straight to its aim, the slugs or buckshot with which it was loaded entering the Colonel's heart, and killing him at the instant. I think my hand was just resting on poor Ellsworth's shoulder at the moment. At any rate, he seemed to fall almost from my own grasp. He was on the second or third step from the landing, and he dropped forward with that heavy, horrible, headlong weight which always comes of sudden death inflicted in this manner. His assailant had turned like a flash to give the contents of the other barrel to Brownell, but either he could not command his aim or the Zouave was too quick with him, for the slugs went over his head, and pierced through the panels and wainscot of a door which sheltered some sleeping lodgers. Simultaneously with this second shot, and sounding like the echo of the first, Brownell's rifle was heard, and the assassin staggered backward. He was hit exactly in the middle of the face, and the wound, as I afterward saw it, was the most frightful I ever witnessed. Of course Brownell did not know how fatal his shot had been, and as, before the man dropped, he thrust his rifle barrel through and through the body, the force of the blow sending the dead man violently down the upper section of the second flight of stairs, at the foot of which he lay with his face to the floor. Winner ran from above, crying: 'Who is hit?' but as he glanced downward by our feet, he needed no answer.

"Bewildered for an instant by the suddenness of this attack, and not knowing what more might be in store, we for bore to proceed, and gathered together defensively. There were but seven of us altogether, and one was without a weapon of any kind. Brownell instantly reloaded, and while doing so perceived the door through which the assailant's shot had passed beginning to open. He brought his rifle to the shoulder, and menaced the occupants, two travelers, with immediate death if they stirred. The three other privates guarded the passages, of which there were quite a number converging to the point where we stood, while the chaplain and Winner looked to the staircase by which we had descended, and the adjoining chambers. I ran down stairs to see if anything was threatened from the story below, but it soon appeared there was no cause for fear that quarter. However, we were not at all disposed to move from our position. From the opening doors and through the passages we descried a sufficient number of forms to assure us that we were decidedly in the minority. I think now that there was no danger, and that the single assailant acted without concert with any body; but it is impossible to know accurately, and it was certainly a doubtful question then. The first thing to be done was to look to our dead friend and leader. He had fallen on his face, and the streams of blood that flowed from his wound had literally flooded the way. The chaplain turned him gently over, and I stooped and called his name aloud, at which I thought then he murmured inarticulately. I presume I was mistaken, and I am not sure that he spoke a word after being struck, although in my dispatch I repeated a single exclamation which I had believed he uttered. It might have been Brownell, or the chaplain, who was close behind me. Winner and I lifted the body with all the care we could apply, and laid it upon a bed in a room near by. The rebel flag, stained with his blood and purified by this contact from the baseness of its former meaning, we laid about his feet. It was at first difficult to discover the precise locality of his wound, for all parts of his coat were equally saturated with blood. By cautiously loosening his belt and unbuttoning his coat, we found where the shot had penetrated. None of us had any medical knowledge, but we saw that all hope must be resigned. Nevertheless it seemed proper to summon the surgeon as speedily as possible. This could not easily be done, for, secluded as we were in that part of the town, and uncertain whether an unfriendly sight or be awaiting us also, no man could volunteer to venture forth alone, and to go together, and leave the Colonel's body behind, was out of the question. We wondered at the long delay of the first company, for the advance of which the Colonel had sent back before approaching the hotel, but we subsequently learned that they had mistaken a street, and gone a little out of their way. Before they arrived we had resigned some of the unsightly stains from the Colonel's features, and composed his limbs. His expression in death was beautifully natural. The Colonel was a singularly handsome man, and, excepting the pallor, there was nothing different in his countenance now from what all his friends had so lately been accustomed to ghastly recognize."

SOLEMAN'S RUSE, POINT OF ROCKS, HARPER'S FERRY, THROWN DOWN BY THE REBELS TO OBSTRUCT THE BALTIMORE TRAIN.

Private BROWNELL, who shot Jackson, is a native of Troy. The Troy Times says:

"He is a son of Charles Brownell, County Superintendent of the Poor, and is as modest as he has proved himself to be brave and cool. He is a member of Engine Company No. 1 of this city, and gave up a lucrative situation to enter the ranks of Colonel Ellsworth's regiment as a private soldier. All honor to him and to the cause in which he is engaged. He telegraphed to his father, immediately after the death of the lamented Ellsworth, in the following laconic dispatch:

"FATHER,—Colonel Ellsworth was shot dead this morning. I killed his murderer. FRANK."

OUR MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR.

ON pages 360 and 361 we publish a large BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA and the neighborhood, which will enable our readers to follow the march of the armies intelligently. We subjoin a few memoranda of some of the principal points in Virginia:

The city of Norfolk is on the right bank of Elizabeth River, just below the confluence of its two branches, eight miles from Hamp'on Roads, and thirty-two miles from the ocean. It contains a United States Navy-yard, in which is a dry-dock, constructed of hewn granite, which cost $274,476. The Dismal Swamp Canal connects Norfolk Bay with Albemarle Sound, and opens an extensive water communication with Norfolk to the South. The population of the city is about 20,000.

Lynchburg is situated 116 miles west of Richmond and 191 from Washington, on the south bank of James River, at the junction of the Petersburg and Lynchburg Railroad with the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. It has a variety of manufacturing establishments, such as cotton and tobacco factories, and an iron foundery. The city enjoys many natural advantages for military defence, and the climate is quite healthy. At present a military column of rebels is concentrated at this point, awaiting orders from head-quarters. Some accounts say there are fully 25,000 men at that point.

Fredericksburg is situated on the right bank of the Rappahannock River, at the head of tide water, one hundred and ten miles above the Chesapeake, and on the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac Railroad, sixty miles from the former place, and seventy miles from Washington. The population of the city is between six and eight thousand. Fredericksburg enjoys good natural facilities for military defence, from its contiguity to the Potomac, and is now being used as the concentrating point for a large body of rebel troops. It is on a line of railroad leading to Washington. Fredericksburg, Richmond, Lynchburg, and Petersburg compose a quadrilateral of no mean military significance; its importance has already been appreciated by the rebel chiefs.

Petersburg is a port of entry, on the south bank of the Appomattox River, twelve miles above its entrance into James River, at City Point. The city contains about 18,000 inhabitants. It has good railroad facilities to Washington, which is 140 miles distant.

Yorktown is a port of entry, 185 miles from Richmond. It is a small village, and memorable as the place where Lord Cornwallis surrendered the British army to General Washington, October 19, 1781, which event terminated the Revolutionary War. It derives importance at the present time from the fact that the Southern rebel forces are establishing a camp there, apparently to counter any land movement of United States troops from Fortress Monroe, which is seventeen and a half miles distant. It is not unlikely that, from present appearances, a second battle of Yorktown may be fought.

Winchester is the capital of Frederick County, Virginia. It is 120 miles north-northwest of Richmond, and 71 miles west by north of Washington. It is the terminus of the Winchester and Potomac Railroad, thirty miles long, connecting with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Harper's Ferry, and it has a number of turnpike roads radiating in all directions, which attract a large amount of trade and travel. Population in 1850, 4500.

GEN. CADWALLADER'S CAMP AT BALTIMORE.

We publish herewith a picture, from a photograph by Weaver, of GENERAL CADWALLADER'S Camp of Federal troops at Locust Point, opposite Baltimore city. A correspondent of the Tribune thus described it when it was first established:

"This encampment, which may very appropriately be called Camp Cadwallader, is only temporary. It does well in dry weather, but is too low when it rains. Thousands of people visited the spot to-day, and the rickety old ferry-boat from the foot of Broadway on Fell's Point to Locust Point groaned beneath its astonished load of visitors. There are sixty rows of tents in the encampment, numbering some 500 in all. The men all bathed this morning by companies in the basin, at a proper distance from the crowds. Last night they went through regimental drill, to the great delight of the by-standers. The officers of the regiments have their quarters in a fine brick house called the Vineyard, in close proximity to the camp. General Cadwallader's head-quarters are in an outhouse within the fort grounds, but will be removed to-morrow to the Hospital, just within the outer gate."

THE ADVANCE INTO VIRGINIA.

SHORTLY after midnight, on the morning of March 24, the "Advance Guard of the great Army of the United States" entered the State of Virginia opposite Washington, crossing by the Long Bridge at Alexandria, and the Iron Bridge at Georgetown. We publish on page 356, from a drawing by our special artist, an engraving of the ARMY CROSSING THE LONG BRIDGE. The following description of the scene is from the Herald:

"The order to march for Virginia at two o'clock this morning was communicated to the officers of the different regiments at the evening parades, but it was kept from the men until shortly before midnight, when it was generally promulgated. It was received by the various corps with true martial enthusiasm. The men having been kept in readiness since the night before last, the final parading up did not require much time. At midnight all were ready to move. The Fifth and Twenty-eighth New York regiments, having the longest distance to march to the rendezvous from the Capitol to Georgetown, commenced moving at half-past twelve. They came down the avenue with, as barrelstore, rush-driving, fire-assaulting martial strains, but with quiet tread, more like that of hundreds than thousands of men. Soon after they had passed, the New Jersey brigade, the Michigan regiment, and the Twelfth and Seventh of New York, crossed the avenue with equal quietness. So little noise did they cause that barely any of the denizens of Washington were awakened from their peaceful slumbers.

"The scene at the bridges was grand and impressive beyond description, and one that the writer will ever remember. The night was cool and clear, thousands of men were drawn up in line and defiling past, but hardly a whisper was heard from among them. They all preserved a solemn silence, as though sensible of the momentousness of the occasion; but the rumbling of artillery, the clatter of cavalry, the muskets and ordnance glittering in the moonlight, the supposed commands of the officers, imparted, nevertheless, a liveliness to the imposing spectacle.

"The troops took rations for only two days along, but large quantities of provisions will be conveyed across the river to-day. All the troops carried their knapsacks, blankets, canteens, etc., with the exception of the Seventh, which went without knapsacks. From this it was inferred that the latter corps would make but a short stay on the right bank of the Potomac.

"The main body of the troops were all across the two bridges in two hours after they commenced entering upon them. Three or four companies marched over at a time, in broken rigs."

THE GARIBALDI GUARD.

We publish on page 362 a picture of the GARIBALDI GUARD in the street, marching in double-quick time, and another of the presentation of colors to them, which took place last week. They are a very gallant regiment, consisting chiefly of Italians, Hungarians, and Germans. The following description of the presentation of colors appeared in the Herald:

"The first flag presented was from Mrs. A. H. Stephens. It is a beautiful silken American standard. The borders are delicately ornamented with gold tassels and fringe, elaborately worked. A golden eagle site proudly on the top of the staff. The centre of the flag is inscribed 'Garibaldi Guard,' in plain gilt letters; and beneath this are the words, 'Presented by Mrs. A. H. Stephens, May 23, 1861.'

"A speech was made, to which Colonel Lomeyer responded in appropriate terms, and the flag was passed into the custody of the standard-bearer.

"The next flag presented was a rich Hungarian standard—green, red, and white stripes. On one side was the motto, within a wreath, 'Vivecore aut morire;' and on the opposite side, in English, the same motto, 'Conquer or die.' The regimental name appeared on each side, over and underneath the motto, in English. The elegant presentation was from Miss Grinnell. It had four beautiful silk pendants of colors and inscription, the latter embroidered, as follows: White, 'Sylvia Grinnell;' red, 'Presented to the Garibaldi Guard;' blue, 'New York, 23d May, 1861;' red, white, and blue, 'Brethren before, brethren again.'

"The next flag attracted much attention from the fact that it is surrounded by Revolutionary and sanguinary memories. This was the tricolor standard which the patriot Garibaldi bore in triumph through the campaign of 1848 and 1849, and with his own hand planted on the battlements of one of the castles of the Eternal City—a triumphant emblem of liberty and power. The flag is composed of the Italian colors—green, red, and white—and is inscribed in Italian in the centre, 'Dio E Popolo'—God and the People.

"In presenting the flag to the regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel Bogelli came to the front, leading by the hand a very beautiful young lady, the daughter of General Avezzana, and addressed the regiment in Italian language. He, in substance, said:

"'OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS OF THE GARIBALDI GUARD,—It is with very great pleasure that I accept the duty of presenting to you the memorable flag—a flag which Garibaldi himself has consecrated to the cause of liberty. It is the gift to the regiment of his young lady, the daughter of one of the most intimate friends of our beloved General. Let her gift be dear to every one of you, and as, wherever danger is thickest, this flag shall wave, there shall be your place to defend it. Soldiers of the Garibaldi Guard—Italians, Germans, Hungarians, Italians, Frenchmen, Spaniards, and men of every other nationality—take this standard, and swear to defend it through every peril. Swear!' [Loud cries of 'We swear!']

"Loud applause followed, the band playing the 'Marseillaise' as the flag was given over to the regiment."

THE GUTHRIE GRAYS.

We publish on page 363, from a sketch kindly sent by Mr. Bierstadt, a picture of the Guthrie Gray Regiment, Colonel Bosley commanding, passing through Cincinnati on the morning of May 17, 1861. They left Camp Harrison that morning, and took the cars, after passing through the city, for Camp Dennison. The Cincinnati Times said of them:

"Every house had a welcome for them, and large numbers of friends, in carriages and on horseback, escorted them. The regiment was followed by a crowd, which kept constantly increasing. At Ninth Street Master's band, which marched at the head of the regiment, struck up a lively air, and the spectators were soon multiplied by thousands. Some fifteen or twenty of the companies were in the new uniform. The remainder loose gray overshirts, and while they did not look either so soldierly as the rest, were in better trim to stand the fatigue, and indeed made the better appearance. Company D, under Captain Bell, highly commended by the spectators. The buildings on either side of Fourth Street and the sidewalks were crowded with people, including a great many ladies, who greeted the Grays with the waving of handkerchiefs, hats, and flags, clapping of hands, and cheers. The Post-office corner sent up a rousing cheer. The brave fellows seemed to forget in a moment the fatigues of their march, amidst this splendid demonstration of the people."

THE EXCELSIOR BRIGADE.

We publish on page 363 a picture of the BRIGADE OF THE EXCELSIOR BRIGADE at the Red House, Harlem. This is General Sickles's brigade, which has been recruited at 444 Broadway, and is said to be destined for active service at the South. They are a fine body of men, and will doubtless give a good account of themselves.

THE FUNERAL OF COLONEL VOSBURGH.

ON page 364 we publish a picture of the FUNERAL CEREMONIES OF COLONEL VOSBURGH, late Commander of the 71st Regiment, N. Y. S. M. Colonel Vosburgh died of hemorrhage of the lungs at Washington last week, and was buried here on 23d instant. CHAPTER XLIV.

TURNING from the Temple gate as soon as I had read the warning, I made the best of my way to Fleet Street, and there got a late hackney chariot and drove to the Hummums in Covent Garden. In those times a bed was always to be got there at any hour of the night, and the chamberlain, letting me in at his ready wicket, lighted the candle next in order on his shelf, and showed me straight into the bedroom next in order on his list. It was a sort of vault on the ground-floor at the back, with a despotic old monster of a four-post bedstead in it, straddling over the whole place, putting one of his arbitrary legs into the fire-place and another into the door-way, and squeezing the wretched little washing-stand in quite a Divinely Righteous manner.

As I had asked for a night-light, the chamberlain had brought me in, before he left me, the good old constitutional rush-light of those virtuous days—an object like the ghost of a walking-cane, which instantly broke its back if it were touched, which nothing could ever be lighted at, and which was placed in solitary confinement at the bottom of a high tin tower, perforated with round holes that made a stunningly wide-awake pattern on the walls. When I had got into bed, and lay there footsore, weary, and wretched, I found that I could no more close my own eyes than I could close the eyes of this foolish Argus. And thus, in the gloom and death of the night, we stared at one another.

What a dismal night! How anxious, how dismal, how long! There was an inhospitable smell in the room of cold soot and hot dust, and as I looked up into the corners of the tester over my head, I thought what a number of blue-bottle flies from the butchers, and cat-wigs from the market, and grubs from the country must be holding on up there, lying by for next summer. This led me to speculate whether any of them ever tumbled down, and then I fancied that I felt light falls on my face—a disagreeable turn of thought, suggesting other and more objectionable approaches up my back. When I had lain awake a little while, those extraordinary voices with which silence seems to begin to make themselves audible. The closet whispered, the fire-place sighed, the little washing-stand ticked, and one guitar-string played occasionally in the chest of drawers. At about the same time the eyes on the wall acquired a new expression, and in every one of those staring rounds I saw written, Don't go NOW.

Whatever night-fancies and night-noises crowded on me, they never warded off this Don't go NOW. It plaited itself into whatever I thought of, as a bodily pain would have done. Not long before I had read in the newspapers how a gentleman unknown had come to the Hummums in the night, and had gone to bed, and had destroyed himself, and had been found in the morning weltering in blood. It came into my head that he must have occupied this very vault of mine, and I got out of bed to assure myself that there were no red marks about; then opened the door to look out into the passages, and cheer myself with the companionship of a distant light, near which I knew the chamberlain to be dozing. But all this time, why I was not to go home, and what had happened at home, and when I should go home, and whether Provis was safe at home, were questions occupying my mind so busily that one might have supposed there could be no room in it for any other theme. Even when I thought of Estella, and how we had parted that day for ever, and recalled all the circumstances of our parting, and all her looks and tones, and the action of her fingers while she knitted—even then I was pursuing, here and there and every where, the question, Don't go home. When at last I dozed, in sheer exhaustion of mind and body, it became a vast shadowy verb which I had to conjugate. Imperative mood, present tense: Do not thou go home, let him not go home. Let us not go home, do not ye or you go home. Let them go home; then, potentially: I may not and I can not go home; and I might not, could not, would not, and should not go home; until I felt that I was going distracted, and rolled over on the pillow, and looked at the staring rounds upon the wall again.

I had left directions that I was to be called at seven; for it was plain that I must see Wemmick before seeing any one else, and equally plain that this was a case in which his Walworth sentiments only could be taken. It was a relief to get out of the room where the night had been so miserable, and I rejoiced in no second knocking at the door to startle me from my uneasy bed.

The Castle battlements arose upon my view at eight o'clock. The little servant happening to be entering the fortress with two hot rolls, I passed through the postern and crossed the drawbridge in her company, and so came without announcement into the presence of Wemmick as he was making tea for himself and the Aged. An open door afforded a perspective view of the Aged in bed.

"Hallos, Mr. Pip!" said Wemmick. "You did come home, then?"

"Yes," I returned; "but I didn't go home."

"That's all right," said he, rubbing his hands. "I left a note for you at each of the Temple gates, on the chance. Which gate did you come to?"

I told him.

"I'll go round to the others in the course of the day and destroy the notes," said Wemmick; "it's a good rule never to leave documentary evidence if you can help it, because you don't know when it may be put in. I'm going to take a liberty with you,—World you mind toasting this sausage for the Aged P. P.?"

I said I should be delighted to do it.

"Then you can go about your work, Mary Anne," said Wemmick to the little servant; "which leaves us to ourselves, don't you see, Mr. Pip?" he added, winking, as she disappeared.

I thanked him for his friendship and caution, and our discourse proceeded in a low tone, while I toasted the Aged's sausage and he buttered the crumb of the Aged's roll.

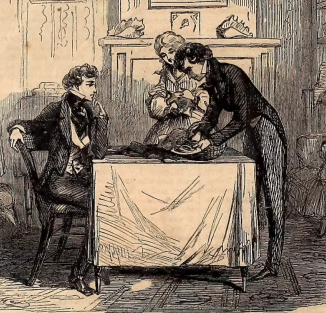
"Now, Mr. Pip, you know," said Wemmick, "you and I understand one another. We are in our private and personal capacities, and we have been engaged in a confidential transaction before to-day. Official sentiments are one thing. We are extra official."

I cordially assented. I was so very nervous that I had nearly lighted the Aged's sausage like a torch, and been obliged to blow it out.

"I accidentally heard yesterday morning," said Wemmick, "being in a certain place where I once took you—even between you and me, it's as well not to mention names when avoidable—"

"Much better not," said I. "I understand you."

"I heard there, by chance, yesterday morning," said Wemmick, "that a certain person not altogether of uncolonial pursuits, and not unpossessed of portable property—I don't know who it may really be—we won't name this person—"



"LOOK HERE," SAID HERBERT.

Wemmick looked very grave. "I couldn't undertake to say that of my own knowledge, mean, I couldn't undertake to say it was at first. But it either is, or it will be, or it's in great danger of being."

As I saw that he was restrained by fealty to Little Britain from saying as much as he could, and as I knew with thankfulness to him how fast of his way he went to say what he did, I could not press him. But I told him, after a little meditation over the fire, that I would like to ask him a question subject to his answering or not answering, as he deemed right, and sure that his course would be right. He paused in his breakfast, and crossing his arms, and pinching his shirt-sleeves (his notion of in-door comfort was to sit without any coat), he nodded to me once, to put my question.

"You have heard of a man of bad character, whose true name is Compeyson?"

He answered with one other nod.

"Is he living?"

One other nod.

"Is he in London?"

He gave me one other nod, compressed the post-office exceedingly, gave me one last nod, and went on with his breakfast.

"Now," said Wemmick, "questioning being over"—which he emphasized and repented for my guidance—"I come to what I did after hearing what I heard. I went to Garden Court to find you; not finding you, I went to Clarriker's to find Mr. Herbert."

"And him you found?" said I, with great anxiety.

And him I found. Without mentioning any names or going into any details, I gave him to understand that if he was aware of any body—Tom, Jack, or Richard—being about the chambers, or about the immediate neighborhood, he had better get Tom, Jack, or Richard out of the way while you were out of the way."

"He would be greatly puzzled what to do?"

"He was puzzled what to do; not the less because I gave him my opinion that it was not safe to try to get Tom, Jack, or Richard too far out of the way at present. Mr. Pip, I'll tell you something. Under existing circumstances there is no place like a great city when you are once in it. Don't break cover too soon. Lie close. Wait till things slacken before you try the open, even for foreign air."

I thanked him for his valuable advice, and asked him what Herbert had done.

"Mr. Herbert," said Wemmick, "after being all of a heap for half an hour, struck out a plan. He mentioned to me as a secret, that he is counting a young lady who has, as no doubt you are aware, a bedridden Pa. Which Pa having been in the Forest line of life, lies shed in a bow-window where he can see the ships sail up and down the river. You are acquainted with the young lady, most probably?"

"Not personally," said I.

The truth was, that she had objected to me as an expensive companion, so my old Harbero as an expensive companion, so my old Herbert and I had himself obliged to confide the state of the case to me, with a view to the passage of a little time before I made her acquaintance. When I had begun to advance Herbert's prospects by stealth, I had been able to bear this with cheerful philosophy; he and his affianced, with cheerful philosophy; he and his affianced, for their part, had naturally not been very anxious to introduce a third person into their interviews; and thus, although I was assured that I had risen in Clara's esteem, and although the young lady and I had long regularly interchanged messages and remembrances by Herbert, I had never seen her. However, I did not trouble Wemmick with these particulars.

"Not necessary," said I.

"—had made some little stir in a certain part of the world where a good many people go, not always in gratification of their own inclinations, and note the particular irrespective of the government expense—"

In watching his face I made quite a fire-work of the Aged's sausage, and greatly discomposed both my own attention and Wemmick's; for which I apologized.

"—by disappearing from such place, and being no more heard of thereabouts. From which," said Wemmick, "conjectures had been raised and theories formed. I put these things to you at your chambers in Garden Court, Temple, had been watched, and might be watched again."

"By whom?" said I.

"I wouldn't go into that," said Wemmick, evasively, "it might clash with official responsibilities. I heard it, as I have in my time heard other curious things in the same place. I don't tell it you on information received. I heard it."

He took the toasting-fork and sausage from me as he spoke, and set forth the Aged's breakfast neatly on a little tray. Previous to placing it before him he went into the Aged's room with a clean white cloth, and laid the same under the old gentleman's chin, and propped him up, and put his night-cap on one side, and gave him quite a rakish air. Then he placed his breakfast before him with great care, and said, "All right, sir! you. Aged P. ?" To which the cheerful Aged replied, "All right, John, my boy, all right!" As there seemed to be a tacit understanding that the Aged was not in a presentable state, and was therefore to be considered invisible, I made a pretense of being in complete ignorance of these proceedings.

"This watching of me at my chambers (which I have once had reason to suspect)," I said to Wemmick when he came back, "is inseparable from the person to whom you have adverted; is it?"

"The house with the bow-window," said Wemmick, "being by the river-side, down the East there between Limehouse and Greenwich, and being kept, it seems, by a very hospitable widow who has a furnished upper floor to let, Mr. Herbert put it to me, what did I think of it as a temporary tenement for Tom, Jack, or Richard? Now I thought very well of it, for three reasons I'll give you. That is to say: Firstly, It's altogether out of all your beats, and is well away from the usual heap of streets great and small. Secondly, Without going near it yourself, you could always hear of the safety of Tom, Jack, or Richard, through Mr. Herbert. Thirdly, After a while, and when it might be prudent, Mr. Herbert would wash up Tom, Jack, or Richard on board a foreign packet-boat, there he is—ready."

Much comforted by these considerations, I thanked Wemmick again and again, and begged him to proceed.

"Well, Sir: Mr. Herbert threw himself into the business with a will, and by nine o'clock last night he hooked Tom, Jack, or Richard—whichever it may be now you and I don't want to know—quite successfully. At the old lodgings it was understood that he was summoned to Dover, and, in fact, he was taken down to the Dover mail and cornered out of it. Now, another great advantage of all this is, that it was done without you, and when, if any one was concerned to himself about your movements, you must be known to be over so many miles off and quite otherwise engaged. This diverts suspicion and confuses it; and for the same reason I recommended that even if you came back last night you should not go home. It brings in more confusion, and you want confusion."

Wemmick, having finished his breakfast, here looked at his watch, and began to get his coat on.

"And now, Mr. Pip," said he, with his hands still in the sleeves, "I have probably done the most a can do; but if I can ever do more—from a Walworth point of view, and in a strictly private and personal capacity—I shall be glad to do it. Here's the address. There can be no harm in your going here to-night and seeing for yourself that all is well with Tom, Jack, or Richard, before you go home—which is another reason for your not going home last night. But after you have gone home, don't go back here. You are very welcome, I am sure, Mr. Pip;" his hands were now out of his sleeves, and I was shaking them; "and let me finally impress one important point upon you." He laid his hands upon my shoulders, and added in a solemn whisper: "Avail yourself of this excellent time to hold of his portable property. You don't know what may happen to him. Don't let any thing happen so the portable property."

Quite despairing of making my mind clear to Wemmick on this point, I forbore to try.

"Time's up," said Wemmick, "and I must be off. If you had nothing more pressing to do than to keep here till dark, that's what I should advise. You look very much worried, and it would do you good to have a perfectly quiet day with the Aged—he'll be up presently—and a little bit of—you remember the pig?"

"Of course," said I.

"Well; and a little bit of him. That sausage you toasted was his, and he was in all respects a first-rater. Do try him, if it is only for old acquaintance sake. Good-by, Aged Parent!" in a cheery shout.

"All right, John; all right, my boy!" piped the old man from within.

I soon fell asleep before Wemmick's fire, and the Aged and I enjoyed one another's society by falling asleep before it more or less all day. We had loin of pork for dinner, and greens grown on the estate, and I toasted the Aged with a good intention whenever I failed to do it accidentally. When it was quite dark, I left the Aged preparing the tea for toast; and I differed from the number of tea-cups, as well as from his glances at the two little doors in the wall, that Miss Skiffins was expected.

CHAPTER XLV.

EIGHT o'clock had struck before I got into the air that was scented, not disagreeably by the chips and shavings of the long-shore boat-builders, and mast, oar, and block makers. All that water-side region of the upper and lower Pool below bridge was unknown ground to me, and when I struck down by the river, I found that the chief thing I was not where I had supposed it to be, and was any thing but easy to find. It was called Mill Pond Bank, Chinks's Basin; and I had no other guide to Chinks's Basin than the Old Green Copper Rope-Walk.

It matters not what stranded ships repairing in dry docks I lost myself among, what tall hulk of ships in course of being knocked to pieces, what ooze and slime and other dregs of tide, what yards of ship-builders' timber-baskets, what rusty anchors blindly biting into the ground though for years off duty, what mountainous accumulations of sanitated casks and timber, and how many rope-walks that were not the Old Green Copper. After several times falling short of my destination and as often overshooting it, I came unexpectedly round a corner upon Mill Pond Bank. It was a fresh kind of place, all circumstances considered, where the wind from the river had room to turn itself round; and there were two or three trees in it, and there was the stump of a ruined wind-mill, and there was the Old Green Copper Rope-Walk—whose long and narrow vista I could trace in the moonlight, through a series of wooden frames set in the ground, that looked like infirm hay-making rakes which had grown old and lost most of their teeth.

Selecting from the few queer houses upon Mill Pond Bank a house with a wooden front and three stories of bow-windows (not bay-windows, which is another thing), I looked at the plate upon the door, and read there, Mrs. Whimple. That being the name I wanted, I knocked, and an elderly woman of a pleasant and thriving appearance responded. She was immediately deposed, however, by Herbert, with his finger on his lip, who led me into the parlor and shut the door. It was an odd sensation to see his very familiar face established quite at home in that very unfamiliar room and region; and I found myself looking at him, much as I looked at the corner cupboard with the blue and white china, the shells upon the chimney-piece, and the colored engravings on the wall, representing the death of Captain Cook, and the visit of his Majesty King George Third in a coachman's wig, leather-breeches, top-boots, and profile, on the terrace at Windsor.

"All is well, Handel," said Herbert, "and he is quite satisfied, though eager to see you. My dear girl is with her father; if you'll wait till she comes down I'll make you known to her, and then we'll go up stairs. That's her father!"

I had become aware of a warning growl rolling overhead, and had probably expressed the fact in my countenance.

"I am afraid he is a sad old rascal," said Herbert, smiling, "but I have never seen him. Don't you smell rum? He is always at it."

"At rum?" said I.

"Yes," returned Herbert, "and you may suppose how mild it makes his gust. He persists, too, in keeping all the tobacco he incurs in his room, and serving them out. He keeps them on shelves over his head, and will weigh them all. His room must be like a chandler's shop."

While he thus spoke, the growling noise became a prolonged roar, and then died away.

"What else can be the consequence," said Herbert, in explanation, "if he will eat the cheese? A man with the gout in his right hand as well as every other—and I expect to get through a Double Gloucester without hurting myself."

He seemed to have hurt himself very much, for he gave another furious roar.

"To have Provis for an upper lodger is quite a godsend to Mrs. Whimple," said Herbert, "for of course gout is generally a stand that noise. A curious place, Handel; isn't it?"

It was a curious place, indeed; but remarkably well kept and quiet.

"Mrs. Whimple," said Herbert, when I told him so, "is the best of housewives, and I really do not know what poor Clara would do without her motherly help. For Clara has no mother of her own, Handel, and no relation in the world but old Gruffanduff, Junior."

"Surely that's not his name, Herbert?"

"No, no," said Herbert, "that's my name for him. His name is Bailey. But what a blessing it is for the son of my father and mother to love a girl who has no relations, and who can never bother herself, or any body else, about her family!"

Herbert had told me on former occasions, and now reminded me, that he first knew Miss Clara Barley when she was completing her education at an establishment at Hammersmith, and that an her being confined home to nurse her father, he and she had confided their affection to the motherly Mrs. Whimple, by whom it had been fostered and regulated with equal kindness and discretion, ever since. It was understood that nothing of a tender nature could possibly be confided to Clara, by reason of his having unequal to the consideration of any subject more psychological than Gout, Rum, and Purser's stores.

As we were thus conversing in a low tone while Old Barley's sustained growl vibrated in the beam from above, the door was softly opened, and a very pretty slight dark-eyed girl of twenty or so came in with a basket in her hand: whereupon Herbert was relieved of the basket, and presented blushing, as "Clara." She really was a most charming girl, and might have passed for captive Iris in the new tricolored Ogre, Old Barley, had pressed into his service.

"Look here," said Herbert, showing me the basket with a smile after we had talked a little; "here's poor Clara's supper, served out every night. Her father allowances her to cook and broil her slice of cheese, and here's her rum—which I drink. This is Mr. Barley's breakfast for tomorrow, and not to be touched. Two mutton-chops, three potatoes, some split pease, a little flour, two ounces of butter, a pinch of salt, and all this black pepper. It's stewed up together and taken hot, and it's a nice thing for the gout, I should think!"

There was something so natural and winning in Clara's resigned way of looking at these stores in detail, as Herbert pointed them out, and something so ewedoing, so young, and innocent in her modest manner of yielding herself to Herbert's embracing arm—and something so gentle in her, so much needing protection—all Pond Bank, by Chinks's Basin and the Old Green Copper Rope-Walk, with Old Barley growling in the beam—that I would not have undone the engagement between her and Herbert for all the money in the pocket-book I had never opened.

I was looking at her with pleasure and admiration when suddenly the growl swelled into a roar again, and a frightful bumping noise was heard above, as if a giant with a wooden leg were trying to bore it through the ceiling to come at us. Upon this Clara said to Herbert, "Papa wants me, darling!" and ran away.

"There's an unconscionable old shark for you!" said Herbert. "What do you suppose he wants now, Handel?"

"I don't know," said I. "Something to drink?"

"That's it!" cried Herbert, as if I had made a guess of extraordinary merit. "He keeps his grog ready-mixed in a little tub on the table. Wait a moment, and you'll hear Clara lift him up to take some. There he goes!" Another roar, with a prolonged shake at the end. "Now," said Herbert, as it was succeeded by silence, "he's drinking. Now," said Herbert, as the growl resounded in the beam once more, "he's down again on his back!"

Clara returning soon afterward, Herbert accompanied me up one pair more for our charge. As we passed Mr. Barley's door, he was heard hoarsely muttering within, in a strain that rose and fell like wind, "Bill Barley, Bill Barley," which I substitute good wishes for something quite the reverse.

"Ahoy! Bless your eyes, here's old Bill Barley! Here's old Bill Barley, bless your eyes! Here's old Bill Barley on the flat of his back, by the Lord! Here's old Bill Barley on the flat of his back, like a drifting old dead flounder, here's your old Bill Barley, bless your eyes! Ahoy! Bless you!"

In this strain of considering Herbert informed me the invisible Barley would commune with himself by the day and night together; often, while it was light, having at the same time one eye at a telescope which was fitted on his bed for the convenience of sweeping the river.

In his two cabin rooms at the top of the house, which were fresh and airy, and in which Mr. Barley was less audible than below, I found Provis exceedingly well. He expressed no alarm, and seemed to feel none that was worth mentioning; but it struck me that he was softened—somehow. What not have been I was sad how, and could never afterward recall how, when I tried; but certainly.

The opportunity of this day's rest had given me for reflection had resulted in my fully determining to say nothing to him respecting Compeyson. But when I saw him in his animosity toward the man might otherwise lead to his seeking him out and rushing on his own destruction, this unreserved manner, and I was pressed with him by his fire, I asked him first of all whether he relied on Wemmick's judgment and sources of information.

"Ay, ay, dear boy!" he answered, with a grave nod, "Jaggers's knows."

"Then, if you trust him, Wemmick," said I, "and have come to tell you what caution he gave me, and what advice."

This I did accordingly, with the reservation just mentioned; and I told him how Wemmick had heard, in Newgate prison (whether from officers or prisoners I could not say), that I was under some suspicion, and that my chambers had been watched; how Wemmick had recommended that keeping close for a time, and not keeping away from him; and what Wemmick had said about getting him abroad. I added, that of course, when the time came, I should go with him; and would follow close upon him, as might be safest in Wemmick's judgment. What was to follow that I did not touch upon; neither indeed was at all clear or comfortable about it in my own mind, now that I saw him in that softer condition, and in declared peril for my sake. As to money, and the way of living, by enlarging my expenses, I put it to him whether, in our present unsettled and difficult circumstances it would not be simply ridiculous, if it were no worse?

He could not deny this, and indeed was very reasonable throughout. His coming back was a venture, he said, and he had always known it to be a venture. He would do nothing to make it a desperate venture, and had very little fear of his safety with such good help.

Herbert, who had been looking at the fire and pondering, here said that something had come into his thoughts arising out of Wemmick's suggestion, which it might be worth while to pursue. "If we are both getting away, Handel, and could take him down the river ourselves when the right time comes, No boat would then be hired to be put under suspicion, and that would save at least a chance of suspicion, and any chance is worth saving. Never mind the seeming risk I may think it might be a good thing if you began at once to keep a boat at the Temple stairs, and were in the habit of rowing up and down the river? You'll fall into habit, and then who notices or minds? Do it twenty times or fifty times, and there is nothing special in your doing it the twenty-first or fifty-first."

I liked this scheme, and Provis was quite elated by it. We agreed that it should be carried into execution next day, and Herbert should recognize us if we came below-bridge and rowed past Mill Pond Bank. But we further agreed that he should pull down the hill in that part of his window which gave upon the east, whenever he saw us and all was right.

Our conference being now ended, and every thing arranged, I rose to go; remarking to Herbert that he and I had better not go home together, and that I would leave him the first start of him. "I don't like to leave you here," I said to Provis, "though I can not doubt your being safer than myself. Good-by!"

"Dear boy," he answered, clasping my hands, "I don't know when we may meet again, and I don't like Good-by."

"Good-night! Herbert will go regularly between us, and when the time comes you may be certain I shall be ready. Good-night, Good-night!"

We thought it best that he should stay in his own room, and that I, with the landlord at my side his door, holding a light over the stair-rail to light us down stairs. Looking back at him, I thought of that first night of his return when our positions were reversed, and when I little supposed my heart could ever be as heavy and anxious at parting from him as it was now.

Old Barley was growling and swearing when we repassed his door, with no appearance of having ceased, or of meaning to cease. When we got to the foot of the stairs, I asked Herbert whether he had preserved the name of Provis? He replied, certainly not, and that the lodger was Mr. Campbell. He also explained that the utmost known of Mr. Campbell there was, that he (Herbert) had Mr. Campbell consigned to him, and felt a strong personal interest in his being well cared for and living a secluded life. So when we went into the parlor, where Mrs. Whimple and Clara were seated at work, I said nothing of my own interest in Mr. Campbell, but kept it to myself.

When I had taken leave of the pretty, gentle, dark-eyed girl, and the motherly woman who had not outlived her honest sympathy with a little affair of true love, I felt as if the Old Green Copper Rope-Walk had grown quite a different place. Old Barley might be as old as the hills, and might swear like a whole field of reapers, but there was a delicious feeling of trust and hope enough in Chinks's Basin to fill it to overflowing. And then I thought of Estella, and of our parting, and went home very sadly.

All things were as quiet in the Temple as ever I had seen them. The windows of the rooms on that side, lately occupied by Provis, were dark and still, and there was no lounger in Garden Court. I walked past the fountain twice or thrice before I descended the steps that were between me and my rooms, but I was quite alone. Herbert coming up to me outside when he came in—for I went straight to bed, dispirited and fatigued—made the same report. Opening one of the windows after that, he looked out into the moonlight, and told me that the pavement was as solemnly empty as the pavement of any cathedral at that same hour.

Next day I set myself to get the boat. It was soon done, and the boat was brought round to the Temple stairs, and by me, where I could reach her within a minute or two. Then I began to go out, as for training and practice; sometimes alone, sometimes accompanied by Herbert. I was often out in cold, rain, and sleet, but nobody took much note of me after I had been out a few times. At first I kept above Blackfriars Bridge; but as the hours of the tides changed I took toward London Bridge. It was Old London Bridge in those days, and at certain states of the tide there was a race and fall of water there which gave it a bad reputation. But I knew well enough how to "shoot" the bridge after seeing it done, and so began to row about among the shipping in the Pool, and down to Erith. The first time I passed Mill Pond Bank, Herbert and I were pulling a pair of oars; and, both in going and returning, we saw the blind toward the east come down. Herbert was ready then to keep time with me toward Mason's head that any black mark on its surface might be his pursuers, going swiftly, silently, and surely to take him.

Lloyd's Railroad Map of America,

Having been engraved on a new plan entirely, and printed and colored on a POWER PRESS, we can make and color it so low as to defy competition. The usual price of a map of this size is from $5 to $8.

IT IS FOUR FEET SQUARE,

Printed on an entire sheet of strong white linen paper, and shows to the reader, at one glance, from CANADA to TEXAS, and is acknowledged by all railroad men to be the most CORRECT Map ever offered to the people of this country, and is used by them altogether.

LLOYD'S MAP SHOWS EVERY RAILROAD IN RUNNING ORDER UP TO MAY 10, 1861. Every station is marked down on the roads, and the distances between each station, and the total length of the road, and also the names of its officers and their places of residence, and the running time of the trains on every Railroad in America are given. Every River in America is traced out, and the Towns and Cities on the Ohio and Mississippi, and other Rivers, are marked down plainly. ALL THE STRONGHOLDS IN THIS COUNTRY ARE LAID DOWN PROMINENTLY: the reader can see at a glance the situation of the NORTHERN and SOUTHERN STATES, and can comprehend at a glance the immense extent of territory owned by the South which is washed by the sea for more than two thousand miles.

30,000 CITIES, TOWNS, AND STATIONS ARE LAID DOWN ON LLOYD'S MAP.

As there is so much deception practiced upon the public, we have thought it advisable to submit evidence of the correctness of this Map.

Publisher's Notice.

Of the last number of Harper's Weekly we published ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN THOUSAND COPIES.

This extraordinary circulation, and the character of Harper's Weekly, render it superior as an Advertising medium to any other journal published in the United States. It is probable that each number of Harper's Weekly is read by at least ten adults. It circulates among the classes which advertisers desire to reach. A very large proportion of its circulation is preserved for future reference and bound. The space allotted to advertisements is very limited: the price, 75 cents a line on the last page; 50 cents a line on the page preceding.

THE MURDER OF ELLSWORTH.

We publish herewith a picture showing the manner in which Colonel Ellsworth was murdered. It is from a rough sketch by Brownell, the gallant young Zouave who avenged his Colonel's death. The circumstances of the murder were fully detailed in our last number.

We also give a view of the MARSHALL HOUSE AT ALEXANDRIA, where the murder took place. It is, as our picture shows, a second-rate tavern: its keeper Jackson, who murdered Ellsworth, and was so instantly punished for the deed, was notorious as a secessionist leader, and a man of violent habits. He had been engaged in several street frays growing out of the secession question, and like too many Southerners, was prompt with the knife and pistol. We notice that he is becoming a martyr among the Southerners; at Mobile alone, $1100 have been collected for his widow.

Accompanying these pictures we publish a portrait of a secessionist prisoner caught at Alexandria with a rifle of preposterous length and make.

All these pictures are from sketches by our special artist accompanying the troops into Virginia.

SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1861.

THE UNION—IN THE FUTURE.

A FAVORITE argument of the enemies of the American people, at the present crisis, is to say that civil war and bloodshed render the reconstruction of the Union impossible.

The argument, such as it is, has done service. While the Gulf States were declaring in the most binding form of words they could frame that they never, never would reconstruct the Union, Virginia still protested against "coercion," because it would render separation final. While a new Government was being deliberately established at Montgomery, and every trace of the Government of the United States was being obliterated by its pseudo-successor, New York politicians still denounced force, because bloodshed would alienate us forever. And even now, foreign observers as well as domestic traitors whine at the outbreak of a war which, they say, must render a reunion of the States utterly hopeless.

These gentlemen should read history, and take heart. Civil war, we beg to assure them, is not an invention of the nineteenth century. It has occurred before, once or twice, in most countries, and, surprising as it may seem to the critics we address, it has hardly ever ended in a final suppression of the belligerents, but has almost invariably terminated in the victory of one side and the submission of the other. Nay, more, after the lapse of a few years, the sometime enemies have been better friends than ever.

The history of England has been an endless succession of civil wars. Over one quarter of the fifteenth century was consumed in the war of the Roses; yet the people quietly acquiesced in the Government of Henry VII. At least half the kingdom supported Charles the First against the Commonwealth, and fought for him bravely; but when he was fairly overthrown and executed, they submitted, and were loyal to Cromwell. Half a dozen times, after the abdication of James the Second, the people of various parts of the kingdom rose in arms to restore "the Pretender;" at many times during the reign of William the people of Great Britain must have been equally divided between the rival kings; yet Anne's reign was unusually peaceful and happy. Since then Ireland has been in arms ever so often, and her leaders have proclaimed as loudly as our Southrons do, that they would never submit; yet there is now no part of the British dominions more contented or more loyal than Ireland.

It would be tedious to recount the endless civil wars which preceded the establishment of the great French monarchy, or those which had the effect of consolidating it afterward. But there probably never was a war prosecuted with more bitterness or more fury on both sides than the religious war which began with the massacre of Saint Bartholomew and only ended with the coronation of Louis XIV., a sovereign, however, was singularly free from domestic troubles. It may be remarked also that even the reservation of the Edict de Nantes, which probed the old sores to the bottom, did not revive the war; so false it is to suppose that time will not tame the warlike spirit of minorities. Nothing could be fiercer than the spirit with which the republicans of France denounced the encroachments of Bonaparte; yet they became his willing soldiers long before the Expedition to Russia. So in our time: ten years ago in France was secretly execrating the author of the coup d'etat of the 2d December, and the subsequent massacres; now the difficulty is to find a Bonapartist who is not a Napoleonist.

Spain, like France and England, was, in the first centuries of modern history, a congeries of small kingdoms. Of these, in the thirteenth century, there remained, Aragon, Castile, and Granada. How Castile conquered and absorbed the other two the history of Spain relates; but Mr. Prescott says nothing in his history of Philip the Second about any remains of the old hostile feeling at that time. It had in fact died out long before. During Wellington's campaign in Spain the Spanish people were divided, and fought with bitterness on both sides; yet they all submitted to Ferdinand VII. Again, almost in our own day, the Carlist war divided half the households of Spain; yet no monarch is more universally popular among her people than Queen Isabella.

We might go on to show that the history of Germany, Italy, Russia, Sweden, and all the other nations akin to ourselves, has been similar to that of Great Britain, France, and Spain. We might especially refer to the affair of the Sonderbund in Switzerland, which was so graphically related in the columns of the Lounger a couple of weeks since. But we have probably said enough to prove that civil wars have been common in all countries, that they have hardly ever led to permanent divisions between the hostile sections, but that, after a fair fight, one side has generally been beaten and has succumbed to the other.

It will be so in our case. It is impossible that this Union can be divided. Peaceable separation would be organized anarchy. And now that both sections are armed for the fight, the war will take its course, and in the nature of things one will be beaten and will succumb to the other.

We hear many boasts from the South of their willingness to fight to the last man before they yield. This is what every people says at the beginning of a war. Nobody—no nation—ever contemplates surrender at the beginning of a fight. We must let time and the discomforts of war do their work. If we are true to ourselves, defeats in the field, isolation from the civilized world, blockaded ports, want of money, food, clothing, and all the comforts and luxuries of life, will do their work in the most wonderfully beneficial effect upon the temper of our enemy, now so obdurate. It is hard to yield, no doubt. But it is a good deal harder to starve or be killed. This reflection will by-and-by occur to the "unconditional enemies of reconstruction."

☞ The Albion censures us because, in reply to a direct charge of falsehood brought against us by W. H. RUSSELL, Esq., LL.D., correspondent of the London Times, we ventured to assure our readers that he had spoken the truth. Apparently, if Mr. RUSSELL had accused the Albion of falsehood, that journal would have remained silent under the imputation.

Of the taste of the Albion's interference in the matter, in ignorance of the facts, it is not fitting to speak. When Dr. RUSSELL himself comes North, he may lament that his volunteer champion had not shown less zeal and more discretion in his cause.

THE LOUNGER.

A REASONABLE WORD.

JUDGE BOYER Postmaster Blair closed the postal communication between the rebellious States and the North, the Lounger received a long and courteous letter from Mississippi, partly criticising some things which had been said in these columns, and partly endeavoring to justify the treason of Jefferson Davis and his fellow-conspirators.

M. thinks the Lounger is a "desperate bad politician," because he admits the right of revolution, and denies that the discontented themselves must be the judges of the right. He says, also, that the complaints that the rebellious citizens did not exhaust all peaceful means before they invoked war. The logic here does not seem to be very clear. But as M. holds views that are elsewhere held, and openly put forth by a few papers in the loyal part of the country, it is well for us while to again precisely what we understand by the right of revolution.

It is the natural right of self-defense, belonging to society as to the individual. It is the right of any community which suffers intolerable oppression from its government, and is without hope of remedy in the peaceful order of law, to appeal to arms to change the government and secure the redress. But as the right of self-defense is inherent in every individual, so every member of society has an equal claim to the remedy; and, consequently, the right of revolution belongs to the whole people.

When, therefore, any nation, intolerably oppressed by its government, has exhausted every peaceful means of settlement, has appealed to God and to the world for the justice of its cause and the necessity of a struggle, succeeds in overthrowing that government and establishing another, it has willsorted to revolutionary redress, and the world admits its claim. But since there will never be absolute unanimity in any such struggle—for, in instance, the officers of the government and their friends—will oppose the revolution, the word "people" must be construed to mean the majority number of them. The "people" can not mean a minority of them. The "people" of the people of the city of New York, in the struggle, are the people of the people of the United States is the will of the majority. Until, therefore, a majority of the people of the country, whether by force of arms or indirectly by their acquiescence having vainly appealed to every lawful method and failed to rid themselves of intolerable oppression, take up arms to right themselves, there is no revolution. If a few people try it, it is a riot. If enough to make the effort formidable, it is a rebellion. And as the greatest good of the greatest and not of the smallest number is the true aim of government, such a movement has always had the dignity of a revolution wants also its justification.

Now does M., or any body else, pretend that the general mass of the people of the United States suffer any intolerable oppression which they wish to remove by force of arms?

"ANOTHER LOUNGER."

Now comes "Another Lounger," and asks the present one—"Who ought to be the judges of the cause for revolution?" The reply to this question is very simple. When people reasonably risk their necks they do not do it without what seems to them adequate occasion. But meanwhile other people retain their conscience and common sense; and if they see a revolution begun, as in the present instance, for a base and inhuman purpose, they do not therefore justify it. Revolutions are justified, not by their success, but by their results.

"Another Lounger" asserts that the theory of our system is that the majority shall rule: that the minority are therefore the governed, and that the "legitimate deduction" from this is that the majority section is the governing and the minority section the governed section: but that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. He adds that our fathers so regarded the question between them and Great Britain.

How can a shrewd man be guilty of so much sophism and error in one sentence? Our fathers did not complain that they were in a minority or outvoted, but that they were not allowed to vote at all; that they were taxed without asking their consent, just as at this moment the Southern people are taxed by Jeff Davis's Government, which has never said to them "lay your leave." And the word "consent" in this discussion has no relevance. In a Government where the citizens have all equal political power either the majority or minority must govern—which shall it be? That the minority happen to live in one part of the country can not affect the question. That the minority think the majority worse to their interests is inevitable; otherwise they would be with the majority. But they are one people; the question, therefore, upon which their fate is decided is numerical, and the greater number of the people think it should be settled in one way rather than in another. To fever are entitled to the arm? If they resist, they can only justify their resistance by the plea that the wrong consequent upon the majority's decision will be so immediate and disastrous that it is better to take the chance of anarchy than to wait for legal redress. And of this history and mankind will be the judges.

"Another Lounger" speaks of "our late Southern brothers" as resolved to fight rather than be ruled against their consent. But it is not the opposition in every popular government ruled, in this sense, against its consent? And is that a justification for rebellion and war? Is the citizen of the city of New York whom Fernando Wood rules against their consent—and there are several of them—justified in levying war on the city government by force because they did not vote for Mr. Wood, and had no faith in him? These citizens have much reason to complain, for they call themselves the oppressed minority wards because they can not coerce the greater number of people who live in other wards? May they ask to retire and form another city government?

No fellow-Lounger; when our fathers said that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, they did not mean the consent of every individual citizen, but the great mass of the people. Nor did they mean the consent of the governed in any particular mile or miles. They meant the consent of the people, in a common-sense use of the word. Now there are more than thirty millions in this country. Does "Another Lounger" suppose that there are four millions of them who seriously wish this revolution?

Your next question we can take in another paragraph.

ANOTHER QUESTION.

IT is another, but it belongs to the same general topic we have been considering. "Does," asks Another Lounger, "in your opinion, the fact that no far as the Federal political action is concerned, the South States have heretofore approved and consented to a constitutional and supreme rule to those States themselves, and to the people of North States, the ruling States, shall also give their consent that the former no longer obey? If this is claimed, what right has the Pope to have claimed it for them] have the people of Rome, who for centuries have consented that the Pope shall be supreme temporal ruler in Rome, and who have asked him to assume that power, to attempt to free themselves from their self-assumed yoke?"

The "consent" of the United States" are not parties to this Government. The Constitution of the United States was made by "the people," and the people of the several States by accepting the Constitution renounced the separate sovereignty of their States so far as was necessary to form a nation. No method was provided for the restoration to the States of those sovereign powers; but the Constitution can be amended in a prescribed manner. If an amendment so introduced should provide for that restoration, the State may become a sovereign power again, but not otherwise. If the people of any State desire that sovereignty again, but the people of the United States decline to give it to them, there is an end of the matter, unless they choose to try to get it by force, in which case it is either a civil war, rebellion, or, in any case it is the armed action of a few against many.

Of course, each generation of American citizens must decide for itself what it wishes to maintain the present system of government or not. No generation can bind another. Politically the word "forever" gets its force from common consent. Whenever, therefore, the people of this country wish to be bound no longer by the Constitution of the United States, they have a right to do it; and if force is necessary to form a new and independent Government, it will be a revolution. But the people of any State desire that sovereignty again, but the people of the United States decline to give it to them, there is an end of the matter, unless they choose to try to get it by force, in which case it is either a civil war, rebellion, or, in any case it is the armed action of a few against many.

As for Rome, the Pope was not chosen by the people as their temporal ruler, as Another Lounger seems to suppose. And even if they had chosen him, and were wearing "a self-assumed yoke"—that is, had provided no means for shaking that yoke, and were intolerably and irremediably oppressed by it, they would, when they felt themselves strong enough, throw it off. The Pope has always had the yoke fast, not by popular consent but by foreign bayonets.

THE COMEDIAN COBB.

A YEAR ago the Treasury of the United States was at the mercy of Howell Cobb, of happy memory. An officer of the Government, sworn to be faithful to it, and paid by it, he was using every method he could command to impoverish the Treasury, destroy the Government, and ruin the country. Of Cobb it may be said that, on the one hand, he was a fit associate of Floyd, and on the other, a proper pendent to Thompson. Does it not seem as if Divine Providence meant to inspire an unfailing faith in the perpetuity of our Government by showing us that it might be for months and years in the hands of such men, and then emerge unharmed and with eyes lifted heavenward, as Daniel came out of the lions' den?

Every body knew Cobb's incapacity: every body knew his treason; but nobody ever suspected him of humor. Yet Cobb has been making it of late. He addressed his fellow-traitors at Atlanta on the 20th May. The object of the speech was the raising of money to support the rebellion. The meeting was worthy of Cobb. The financial devising was also worthy of Cobb. He said: "We not only need soldiers, we must have treasure to carry on the war." True enough, was the natural response of every listening rebel; and how on earth are we to get it?

The sly Cobb, knowing perfectly well what was in the hearts of his hearers, suggestively continued, in a "will-you-walk-into-my-parlor" vein: "Private contributions have been offered to a vast amount. I will mention an instance," etc. "Offers of this sort," he added, "come pouring in upon the Government from all parts of the country."

It is easy to fancy the relief afforded by this last sentence to those who were mortally alarmed by the opening allusion to private contributions. Ah, well! we may have them saying with a sigh of relief, these offers are pouring in, or are not. To deepen this feeling the cunning Cobb says, as it were, "Exactly; you're safe enough; you needn't contribute;" for, he continues in his speech, "The Government does not require contributions from individuals; she has the means within herself of sustaining the war." Good! was the audience in their souls. "No donations are necessary except for the equipment of your own volunteers, and those you can and will provide for," quoth Cobb. Of course, the cheerful crowd answer in their hearts. "But," continues the comical Cobb —and this is the joke which betrays the artist—"but humor he has so long concealed—"but I tell you what you may do. Those of you who raise large crops of cotton, turn some of your land by for market, give it to your Government at its market value, receive its bonds, and let it sell your produce to pay for the specie to be sunken in the ocean." So said Virginia. This was agreed on at Montgomery, and we promised to throw out the suggestion that the people might think about it.

In other words: "Gentlemen, Jeff must have money; but he doesn't require contributions from you. Jeff thinks he can sustain himself as long as he goes. He distinctly does not ask you to give any thing whatsoever. But, look here, giving is one thing and lending is another thing. Couldn't it be lovely in you to give Jeff your cotton, which he can sell for specie in Europe, and let him give you his bonds—Jefferson Davis's bonds, and Mississippi might indorse them—which you can sell for specie—whenever you can find a buyer. Above all things, don't ask for dividends to the contribution. Yet contributions are pouring in, and he only asks of you to give him your cotton and take his bonds."

If this is not clear enough for nothing, what is? Cobb is not only a traitor, forsworn before God and man, but he is also a wag.

JEFF TOPPS.

THAT best use of red tape is to hang people who perplex public affairs by it. Regiment after regiment of ardent, brave, patriotic citizens is gathering in this State, and are literally starving in the nightmare. They can not move hand or foot. They wonder, and every body wonders, why they can not go. They cannot march every man as fast as he can be had, and still they do not go. Men throw up their business at the call of the country and State; they leave their families to look out for them, and still they stay. Not a regiment leaves without a prolonged and disgraceful squabble among the civil officers and committees and contractors. If any disgusted and impatient citizen tries to find the cause of the delay, it turns out that nothing is ready because of the cowardly inattention of nobody quite because half of a committee owns railway stock, and wants to send the troops by rail; and the other half owns steamboats, and wants to send them by water. Somebody declines to give answers; somebody else clogs the movement because his son or cousin is not made captain or major. There is no end of petty annoyances and delays; and the one great characteristic of the military movement of the Empire State so far as the authorities are concerned, is inefficiency.

Why could not New York have been as prompt as Massachusetts? Why were there no proper equipments for our soldiers? Men from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania were fully armed before a New York soldier had marched. Did they march as soon as they received orders? Orders from where?

It is war. The first condition of war is a single head. What is the great State of New York doing at such a time as this with a military head? She does not even member resign, and leave the Governor to deal directly with the Department of War? The Governor of the United States requires a certain number of regiments. They are to go either into service or into camp. The requisition is made upon the Governor. If more men offer than are had the larger the army the sooner the peace; and the money will have been economically spent. Washington was told that five thousand men would put down Shay's rebellion. "Very well," said he, "then I will send fifteen thousand." If you would beat, said Napoleon, have just twice as many men as your enemy at each point.

It is high time that the Government of the State of New York and the Union Defense Committee had done wrangling. The difficulty lies with somebody or somebodies. Let their manner and the facts of the controversy be held up to public reprobation.

ENGLAND UPON PRIVATEERS.

PEOPLE are still talking of England, and wondering what she will finally do. For the present it is very clear that she will repose upon the proclamation of neutrality, and await events. Meanwhile she discusses the nature of privateers and blockades.

As for the Southern privateers, they are ships commissioned by a man in open rebellion against his Government to prey upon the ships of loyal citizens. In the consequent struggle loyal citizens may be murdered while engaged in defending their own property. There can be no question that such a privateer is as much a pirate as a ship of Lafitte's. Any ship-master who sails the sea has the same right to commission himself to seize prizes that Mr. Jefferson Davis has to commission him. Mr. Davis, indeed, claims to represent a government. But the Government against which he is in rebellion refuses to see in him any thing but a rebel. No other power in the world has recognized him and Jefferson Davis and William Kidd are equally pirates.

Now comes England, and says, "Mr. Davis may, for the purpose of privateering, be considered a belligerent. But every Englishman sailing under his commission does so at his peril." This so far helps Mr. Davis that he can carry his prizes into English ports and sell them.

If England had recognized the authority which sends the privateers as a Government, that authority might plead a national character. But England has not done that, for she is not ready for a war with the United States. She therefore winks at piracy. The case would have been less flagrant if the English had maintained their cause so long and so successfully that the issue were doubtful. The letters of marque granted by our Revolutionary Congress were recognized soon thus before our independence was conceded by any other power. But we had held our own, and it was fair to presume that we should at last triumph. England assumes the success of this rebellion before it has struck a single significant blow. Nevertheless, any English subject found upon a Davis-privateer which had killed American citizens defending their property would be incontinently hung as a pirate, nor could England remonstrate. Any subject who serves upon either side has given over, by absence, to his fate. She will not call privateering piracy, but she allows her privateering subjects to be hung as pirates.

Lord Derby, the Tory leader in the Lords, proposes that the Government shall not abide by the proclamation in this respect. His suggestion is not likely to be adopted.

As for the blockade, it is one of those international questions upon which governments will always differ. The treaty of Paris requires that a blockade must be effective. But what is an effective blockade? If a few ships pass in or out is the blockade raised? and, if so, must the blockading Government issue a new proclamation, and give the usual three days? This is undoubtedly the view Great Britain would prefer to take, but it is precisely the one that the United States will not allow.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HARDNESS OF THE TIMES.

SWELL OUT OF LUCK. "What do you charge for blacking a gentleman's boots?"

ONE OF THE POLICE BRIGADE. "Never more than a penny, sir."

SWELL. "A penny, eh? Well, youngster, since there are two heels, that's a half-penny a heel, I suppose—isn't it?"

SHOEBLACK (proud of displaying his arithmetic). "In course it is, Sir."

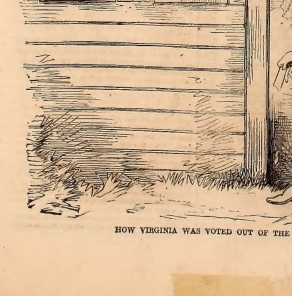
SWELL. "Well, then, black my right boot—I've only got a half-penny."

"My party, sir, will not be in idleness," said a politician. "Very true, Sir," replied his supporter, "your party never chargeable either with lying in idleness or with idleness in lying."



HOW VIRGINIA WAS VOTED OUT OF THE UNION.

THE WEATHER LAST WEEK.

What is that faint and melancholy note,
Borne feebly on the sharp East wind,
Whose pauper blast bites through our overcoat,
With doom of ester thickly lined?
It sounded forth at early closing of oak,
Darkling beneath the leaden sky:
Through the bare twigs some plaintive creature spoke,
'Twas the Cuckoo's cry!

That timid trill outpoured from yonder brake!
Ah! can it be the Nightingale?
That broken jug! That interrupted shake!
The breeze cuts short the poor bird's tale,
The throttle, too, as though for cold in pain,
It's perched upon the leafless tree,
Attempts a fitful and a dreary strain,
Song in a minor key.

There's one, an only Swallow to be seen;
With feeble wing the straggler flies.
What can be the use to this as to him,
Unless he flies for exercise?
Or, what's a day or June to wild air for him!
All insects fast if much too cool:
He would not have one midge, were he to skim
The nearly frozen pool.

The redbreast shivers over her callow brood;
The whole kingdom of birds is in distress;
Cockparrows can not find their children food;
No refrigitor for a nest!
The badger, dormouse, hedgehog, squirrel, creep
All into their respective holes:
The merry May seeks all such things to sleep,
A May as at the Poles!

Ah, boy! I pity him and hasten their room
Unbuttered save by fern and brier!
I know what I shall do, shall go home,
Draw down the blinds; make up a roaring fire;
Command a basin of hot egg, and dine
On Christmas beef; and, having fed,
Have for supper a roasted pullet of spiced wine;
Have that, and go to bed.

THE SUMNER'S LOSS.—"Can I be of any use?" asked a young Ossawan of a distressed female at the Alewick station, on the occasion of the passage of Col. Wright and the Ossawan. "That I give my bucket to a man!" Courageous. "Mighty sensible!" "He said so." "He's off with it. He's a thief, a robber; he's an impostor, another in a military uniform or one. He's off with my greatest treasure!" "Compose yourself, madam." "Me compose myself, indeed! Me? Why, you're unreasonable, sending his way through the crowd: 'If what you have lost can be found, and you have paid a dollar to one of our policemen, perhaps some compensation.'" "Compensation!" she exclaimed. "Brute, mercenary brute! There is no compensation for a lost bucket." "Of what nature is that loss?" said another relying officer. "A very serious nature, Sir—be one of a irregular nature," she replied. "That bucket contained much, very much, my self remained my father." He said so.

COMPANY OF SECESSION CAVALRY SURRENDERING TO COLONEL WILCOX, OF THE FIRST MICHIGAN REGIMENT, IN FRONT OF THE SLAVE-PEN AT ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.—[DRAWN BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

MY LITTLE SWEET-HEART.

Ah! sad are they of whom no poet writes,
Nor ever any story-teller hears—
The childless mothers who on lonesome nights
Sit by their fires and weep, having the chores
Done for the day, and time enough to see
All the wide floors
Swept clean of playthings, they, as needs must be,
Have time enough for tears.

But there are griefs more sad
Than ever any childless mother had—
You know them, who do smother nature's cries
Under poor masks
Of smiling, slow despair—
Who put your white and unadorning hair
Out of your way, and keep at homely tasks
Unblest with any praises of men's eyes,
Till death comes to you with his piteous care
And to unmarriageable belts you go,
Saying, "It is not much—'tis well, if so
We only be made fair,
And looks of love awake us when we rise."

My cross is not as hard as theirs to bear,
And yet alike to me are storms or calms:
My life's young joy,
The brown-cheeked farmer boy,
Who led the daisies with him like his lambs—
Carved his sweet picture on my milking-pail,
And cut my name upon his thrashing-flail,
One day stopped singing at his plowing—alas!
Before that summer-time was gone, the grass
Had choked the path which to the sheep-field led,
Where I had watched him tread
So oft on evening's trail—
A shining oat-sheaf balanced on his head,
And nodding to the gale.

Rough wintry weather came, and when it sped,
The emerald wave
Swelling above my little sweet-heart's grave,
With such bright, bubbly flowers was set about,
I thought he blew them out,
And so took comfort that he was not dead.

For I was of a rude and ignorant crew,
And hence believed whatever things I saw
Were the expression of a hidden law;
And with a wisdom wiser than I knew
Evoked the simple meanings out of things
By childlike questionings.

And he they named with shudderings of fear
Had never, in his life, been half so near
As when I sat all day with cheeks unkissed,
And listened to the whisper, very low,
That said our love, above death's wave of woe,
Was joined together like the seamless mist.

God's yea and nay
Are not so far away,
I said, but I can hear them when I please;
Nor could I understand,
Their doubting faith, who only touch his hand
Across the blind, bewildering centuries.

And often yet, upon the shining track
Of the old faith, come back
My childish fancies, never quite subdued,
And when the sunset shuts up in the wood
The whispery sweetness of uncertainty,
And night, with misty locks that loosely drop
About his ears, brings rest, a welcome boon,
Playing his pipe with many a starry stop
That makes a golden snarling in his tune;

I see my little lad
Under the leafy shelter of the boughs,
Driving his noiseless, visionary cows,
Clad in a beauty I alone can see:
Laugh, you, who never had
Your dead come back, but do not take from me
The harmless comfort of my foolish dream,
That these, our mortal eyes,
Which outwardly reflect the earth and skies
Do introvert upon eternity:

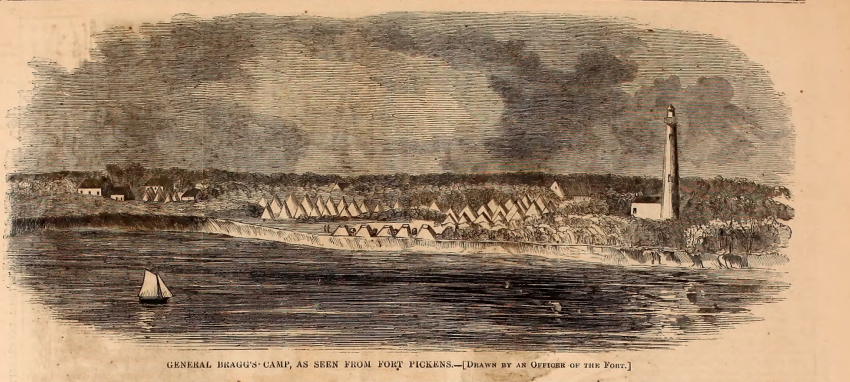
And that the shapes you deem
Imaginations, just as clearly fall;
Each from its own divine original,
And through some subtle element of light,
Upon the inward, spiritual eye,
As do the things which round about them lie,
Gross and maternal on the external sight.

CAPTURE OF SECESSION CAVALRY AT ALEXANDRIA.

WE publish herewith, from a drawing by our special artist, an engraving of the CAPTURE OF FORTY SECESSION CAVALRY AT ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA, on the morning of 24th ult., when the advance into Virginia was made. His correspondent of the Herald thus described the affair:

One of the most unexpected features of this morning's military adventures into Virginia was the capture of a company of four officers and thirty-six men, composed of the "Black Horse Cavalry," of Fairfax County, Virginia, who had been enrolled into a brilliant and dashing cavalry corps. This secession company were early alarmed by the arrival of the Government forces in Alexandria; and, mounting their horses, began a precipitate retreat, riding till they believed themselves far beyond the reach of pursuit. They were rejoiced to see troops advancing from the west, whom they supposed to be reinforcements to their aid. Pushing hastily forward, they found themselves surrounded by the Michigan volunteers, and surrendered without a blow.

They were taken on board the steamer Baltimore, Captain West, and conveyed as prisoners of war to the Navy-yard. We found them gayly attired, with feathered chapeaus, apparently unconscious of the fate to which their treason naturally consigns them. Some of them were anxious to convince those with whom they conversed that their friends and relations, as well as their own unbiased sympathies, were on the side of the flag of our Union. They were a crest-fallen troop indeed, for some had already doffed their feathered chapeau for the simple felt. The captain was a man of fine physique and carriage. His plume was still aloft, and spurs in place, and haversack marked "U. W. Ball." Doubtless his admirers and friends are still in a maze at his sudden trip across the Potomac.



GENERAL BRAGG'S CAMP, AS SEEN FROM FORT PICKENS.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF THE FORT.]

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS OF FORT PICKENS.

WE publish on page 374, from a sketch by an officer in Fort Pickens, a view of a MORTAR BATTERY LATELY ERECTED ON SANTA ROSA ISLAND by the Federal troops, and on this page a VIEW OF GENERAL BRAGG'S CAMP, from a drawing by the same officer, and a drawing of the interior of one of the SAND-BAG BATTERIES BEARING ON FORT PICKENS, from a sketch by our artist who has been traveling with W. H. Russell, Esq., LL.D., Correspondent of the London Times.

The officer to whom we are indebted for the two first-mentioned pictures thus writes us concerning them:

FORT PICKENS, May 11, 1861.

With this you will receive a sketch of part of one of the Federal Mortar Batteries on Santa Rosa Island, near Fort Pickens.

This battery, a portion of which is seen in the sketch, was recently built by Lieutenant Tidball, of the 2d Artillery. The central object in the view is a bomb-proof shelter, used as a retreat from a heavy fire, the mass of sand on its roof forming a perfect security against shells of the largest calibre. The powder and loaded shells are kept in similar shelters, according to the usage of war. The ruin of brick-work on the left, and but a few feet in its rear, is all that remains of a large redoubt once held by the English. Whether they built it or no I can not tell, as in those days there was a proverb that the "Spanish built forts, the English held them, and the French took them." When General Jackson came down to Pensacola in 1814, to look after Federal interests in his unauthorized but energetic way, he found the Spanish occupying several points about the place, all protected by a net-work of friendly relations with the Home Secretary in England, who was well represented on the occasion by a fine body of English troops fresh from the Peninsula. A portion of these occupied the redoubt whose ruins are seen in the sketch. Jackson cut the net-work by opening fire without orders—an example that might be followed with advantage by some Federalists of the present day. The Spanish and English withdrew after blowing up the forts and redoubt. In 1819 they returned again, but again the Federalists ousted them. It is a curious coincidence that our Government should occupy these points immortalized in history—that it should be here building up new works to teach its rebellious children a lesson that they might have learned on the site of the old. I looked with curious feeling upon some old nine-pound shot that the workmen turned up the other day while building the battery. These shot were fired by Jackson, in all probability, and conveyed by some long "thirty-two," which now lie on some old logs at the left of the battery. Many years have rolled by since their hoarse voices were heard by Jackson as he threw off the dead weight of official ignorance and drove the intruders from Florida. You can still see the big "G. R." on the reinforce of the guns, but time has strewn huge vases from their muzzles amidst the grass where they have lain neglected so long.

This battery is only a part of the defenses outside of the fort. This side of it the ground rolls off in a series of sand hills, which form excellent natural traverses, and would well conceal from the enemy as many as ten or fifteen regiments.

In sending us the view of General Bragg's camp, he says:

FORT PICKENS, May 13, 1861.

Inclosed I send you a sketch of the encampment west of the light-house and nearly opposite Fort Pickens. In front of the tents, near the shore, is seen one of their sand batteries, in which they have mounted several Columbiads. It is reported that they have now 10,000 men here; but I imagine 6000 is much nearer the exact number. This battery commands the entrance to the harbor, but is too far off to do much injury to the fort, the distance being nearly 1¼ miles. The light-house seen on the right is a very fine one, but has not been lighted since the night of April 12, when it was suddenly extinguished during a great snow of the secessionists, caused by the firing of a few guns from the Wyandotte, which led them to suspect the fleet was coming in. They immediately extinguished the light and lighted up their batteries. In the mean time, Captain Vodges's company landed, captured one of their guard-boats, which, as soon as the troops were in the fort, was allowed to go back, and convey to General Bragg the gratifying intelligence that the fort was reinforced.

COLONEL MOREHEAD'S CAMP AT BALTIMORE.

WE publish on page 374 a VIEW OF THE ENCAMPMENT OF UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS, UNDER COLONEL MOREHEAD, on the land adjoining Patterson's Park, Baltimore. Patterson's Park will be seen on the left of the tents in the picture. If the late accounts from Baltimore be correct, this encampment will possess remarkable interest before long.

CAMP ANDERSON.

A CORRESPONDENT has sent us a sketch of CAMP ANDERSON, the original encampment of the Twelfth Regiment N. Y. S. M., at Washington, and we herewith reproduce it, in order that our friends who have relatives in the Regiment may see how they are situated.

OCCUPATION OF ALEXANDRIA.

WE publish on this page an engraving of the OCCUPATION OF ALEXANDRIA by the Michigan Regiment, and Sherman's Battery of Artillery. The latter is the splendid battery which was the first to turn out on the occasion of the recent alarm at Washington. Mr. George Wilkes saw them pass up the Avenue, and thus described the scene in a letter to the Tribune:

Cheers rose from the crowds as the dragoons went by; but before those cheers were done a vast rumbling was heard in the same direction which the dragoons had come from, and in the next instant Sherman's famous battery, with six horses to each gun, were seen tearing around into the Avenue at fearful speed, the troopers and cannoneers screaming wildly, like so many madmen, as they went. Their rate of progress was so swift that in turning the Fourteenth Street corner the whirl of the gun-carriage spun off a left-hand wheel, and dashed the vehicle against an iron post, flinging the men off the caissons, and knocking down two of the horses. But the remaining horses were whipped on, dragging the fallen animals on their sides along the road, and the naked axle doing duty for the missing wheel. They passed shouting out of sight, and the accelerating hurrahs of the equally crazy multitude went after them as long as their wheels and voices could be heard.

FORT WAYNE, MICHIGAN.

WE publish on next page a view of FORT WAYNE, ON THE DETROIT RIVER, MICHIGAN, now in possession of the Michigan Volunteers. The following description is from the Detroit Advertiser:

Fort Wayne was commenced under the supervision of Captain Meigs about 1840, and brought to its present state in 1850. Thus far it has cost the Government $170,000, and the finishing it will probably involve an expense of at least $50,000 more. The timber used in its construction is red cedar and hyraized oak. It is an earth-work, and square shaped, with bastion corners, surrounded by a ditch. On the water side is an out-work separated from the main by a trench; this out-work will contain fifteen guns. The main work is reached from the out-work by an underground passage, which is guarded at each end by heavy iron doors. The entire work will mount forty-seven heavy guns and sixteen light pieces for sweeping the ditch; of these latter there are four on each bastion. On the east side is the main entrance to the fort, which is another tunnel also guarded with iron doors.

UNITED STATES PICKETS CHASING AND SHOOTING REBEL PROWLERS NEAR ALEXANDRIA.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

SHOOTING REBEL PROWLERS.

We publish above a picture of SHOOTING REBEL PROWLERS near Alexandria. Our special artist writes:

On Monday night, May 27, a picket guard of United States cavalry were stationed some two or three miles from Alexandria on a country road. They were fired upon, and seeing some one moving behind the fence, one of the guards fired his carbine and killed one of the rebels. A few minutes afterward they were again fired upon, the party firing taking to his heels immediately afterward. Two of the pickets pursued and shot him, while the third remained on guard by the body of the man previously shot. On examination papers were found on both, which they had obtained the day before on some plausible pretext from Captain Whittlesey, Provost-Marshal at Alexandria, and had used for the purpose of getting outside the town with intent to murder some of our soldiers, and commit other dastardly acts.

REBEL STEAMBOATS OVERHAULED BY UNITED STATES MEN-OF-WAR IN THE GULF.—[SKETCHED BY A UNITED STATES OFFICER.]

CAPTURE OF REBEL STEAMERS.

WE publish on the preceding page a picture representing the capture of two high-pressure steamboats by the United States steamers Pocahontas and Brooklyn on 7th ult., from a sketch by an officer of the Brooklyn. The author of the sketch writes us as follows concerning them:

> UNITED STATES STEAMER "BROOKLYN," OFF PENSACOLA, May 11, 1861.
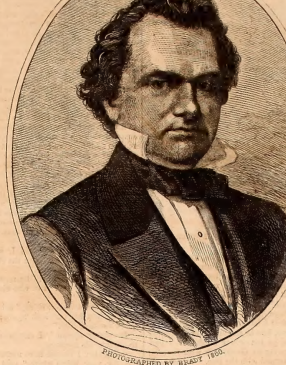
> This sketch represents the capture of two high-pressure steamboats by the United States steamers Brooklyn and Pocahontas, on the afternoon of the 7th. A rigid blockade is now enforced at this point, and no vessels except those in ballast are allowed to enter or leave the harbor. On the afternoon above mentioned the smoke of two steamers was seen in the distance, and thinking they might be armed, or perhaps contain reinforcements or provisions, the Pocahontas and Brooklyn immediately went to intercept them. The Pocahontas having received orders first, succeeded in getting under way before us, and had captured them before we came up. They proved to be the steamers Dick Keys and Henry Lewis. The Keys tried to give us the slip. She started in toward the harbor under a very high pressure of steam. The gunner Grinnell fired a shot at her, but she kept on. One of our guns was then brought to bear and a shot fired forward of her bows. This was unheeded; another followed, and this time nearly grazing her stern, she stopped immediately and returned alongside. The Lewis then attempted to do the same thing. She started off, but a shell from a small howitzer on board checked her course. An armed boat's crew and an officer was sent on board of each to take charge. They were then brought near the flag-ship. After having been overhauled, and no arms or ammunition being found on board, their cargoes consisting only of hay, oats, and flour, consigned to a private house in Pensacola, they were permitted to return to Mobile whence they came.



DOUGLAS.

BORN APRIL 23, 1813. DIED JUNE 3, 1861.

At twenty feeble, friendless, and almost pennyless, seeking bread and a career in the Great West; at twenty-one admitted to the bar; at twenty-two placed at the head of the profession in his district; at twenty-three a member of the Legislature; at twenty-six unfairly defeated for nomination for Congress—his only political defeat in his adopted State; at twenty-seven Secretary of State; at twenty-eight Judge of the Supreme Court; at thirty a member of Congress; at thirty-two chosen to the Senate of the United States—thence forward the recognized leader of the great Democratic party; at forty-three a leading candidate for the Presidential nomination; at forty-six fairly nominated, and losing his election only through that treachery to party which was a portion of the greater treason against the nation; at forty-seven the one to whom all eyes were turning as the head of the regenerated nation; at forty-eight dead, with so much done, and so much more that must have been done had life been prolonged. No statesman at such an early age has left so broad a mark upon our history. He was a born leader. His untiring energy, unfailing dexterity, and indomitable courage would have given him pre-eminence in any sphere. The youth of sixteen, looking like a boy of twelve, was in his native Green Mountain village the companion and associate of men. The stalwart men of Illinois recognized at first sight their leader and champion in the slight youth, effeminate in look, save for the massive head which crowned the feeble body, who came a stranger among them; and they never lost an opportunity of heaping upon him every honor in their gift. He grew to the greatness of every occasion. The keen Lawyer became at once the able Judge; the acute Politician developed with marvelous rapidity into the far-seeing Statesman; the dexterous Partisan became the bold and uncompromising Patriot. When the occasion demanded he sprang to the support of the President whose election was gained by his own defeat. It is too early for us fully to appreciate the loss which the nation has sustained by his untimely death at a moment when a nobler career was opening before him than has been presented to any American since the time of the Father of our Country. Of all these glorious possibilities we can now only say, "They might have been." The portrait which we give—the latest authentic one ever taken—is that by which he himself wished to be remembered by posterity. It presents the man, in his best mood, at the culminating point of his life, before the cares and illness of the last weary months had left their traces upon his noble face.

THE WHITWORTH GUN SENT FROM ENGLAND.

WE publish herewith an engraving of one of the Whitworth guns which have been presented to our Government by loyal Americans in England. Two of the guns have already arrived. The following description will enable our readers to understand this beautiful piece:

> The guns are made by the Whitworth Ordnance Company of Manchester, are nine feet long, bore as the bench, and weigh 1100 pounds. The bore is 3 inches, and the twist such as to turn the ball three times in the gun. The ball is a double cone of iron 9½ inches long, weighs 12 pounds, and has grooves cast in it which fit the twist of the gun. There is no leaden band on it. The charge of powder required to throw it five miles is 2½ pounds; for three miles only ten ounces. The barrel is of wrought iron, the breech-screw and breech-cap of steel. The battery of six pieces cost $12,000, including freight, or $2000 for each gun.
> When charged, the breech of the gun is closed by the breech-cap, which is screwed on. This cap works in a loop which swings on a hinge, so as to allow it, when unscrewed, to move back like a door. The cap is screwed and unscrewed by a handle. When uncovered, the projectile is pushed in, and behind it is inserted a canister or cartridge shaped to fit the bore. The powder is kept in the cartridge by a wad of lubricating material. After the insertion of the cartridge, and the screwing on of the breech, an ordinary friction fuse is inserted in the vent, made, as stated, in the centre of the breech-cap, and the piece is discharged generally in less than a minute from the time of beginning to load, and that without any attempt to hurry. When the piece is discharged, there is no escape of gases from the breech; and when the cap is unscrewed and swung aside, the end of the tin cartridge case is seized by hand, or by a suitable gripping instrument, and is withdrawn from the gun. The case then brings away all the fouling deposite, and as the barrel is completely lubricated by the lubricating wad, no sponging nor cleaning by water is required. The shots as they issue cleanse the gun.

A REBEL BIVOUAC IN TEXAS.

WE publish on page 375 a picture of a REBEL ENCAMPMENT IN TEXAS, from a sketch sent us by a gentleman whose secessionist views are beyond question. He writes:

> After the surrender of San Antonio by General Twiggs, State troops were organized in order to take possession of the forts occupied by the U. S. Army. The above is a true picture of a portion of said State troops encamping on the Las Moras, near Fort Clark, on their way to the upper posts (Hudson, Lancaster, and Davis). The picture ought to speak for itself. We need not remind that the "U. S.'s" and the "Q. M. D.'s" imply their former owners; and only, furthermore, that no white man in these diggins will be astonished to see the poor Mexicans do all the "hauling of wood and drawing of water," the Dons being engaged in smoking cigarettes, eating melons, drinking Pulu "Senorita," superintending the killing of a stray pig, etc., etc. A lively detachment of Montezuma streets scouring, by order No. 1: "Put none but true Southerners on guard to-night!"

CAIRO FROM THE CAMP.

WE publish on pages 376 and 377 a VIEW OF CAIRO FROM THE CAMP, which will enable our friends throughout the country who have relatives there to realize the spot. The St. Charles Hotel, the large building on the right of the picture, is the head-quarters of General Prentiss. The latest rumor respecting Cairo is that it is to be attacked by Southern troops under the command of General Beauregard. Our picture is from a drawing by Mr. Sinclair. In the last number but one of Harper's Weekly we gave a plan and description of the Camp at Cairo.

GALLANT CHARGE OF UNITED STATES CAVALRY.

WE illustrate on pages 376 and 377 the GALLANT CHARGE OF LIEUTENANT TOMPKINS OF the Second Cavalry at Fairfax Court House, on the morning of June 1. The Washington Star gives the following account of the affair:

> Last night company B of the Second Cavalry, forty-seven privates, under Lieutenant Tompkins and Second Lieutenant Gordon, and three members of the New York Fifth Regiment—Quarter-master Fearing, Assistant Quarter-master Carey, and Adjutant Frank, reconnoitering within 300 yards of Fairfax Court House, by the Winchester road, were fired on by two of a picket of the Virginia troops. They took one of the two a prisoner, and the other escaped though fired at. The cavalry company then charged into the village from the north side, and were fired on from the Union Hotel, formerly kept by James Jackson who killed Colonel Ellsworth. The man firing on them was instantly shot down. The cavalry then charged down through the principal street of the village, and were fired on from many windows and from platoons behind fences. Having passed thus to the end of the village, they wheeled about and immediately charged back, and were met by a very considerable detachment with a field-piece. Turning, they cut through a third detachment in the rear, and left the village, bringing with them five prisoners, and killing throughout the engagement twenty-one men.
> Two of the United States cavalry are missing, two are killed, and Assistant Quarter-master Carey of the New York Fifth Regiment is wounded in the foot. Lieutenant Tompkins had two horses shot under him—the last one falling on his leg, injuring it slightly.

A Herald correspondent thus describes the return of the cavalry:

> I was at the head-quarters of General M'Dowell, on Arlington Heights, when a portion of the Federal cavalry that had the skirmish at Fairfax Court House, eighteen miles west of Alexandria, at two o'clock this morning, rode up with their five prisoners and other trophies. The cavalry company that made the attack consisted of dragoons lately returned from Texas. They have seen years of hard Indian fighting on the frontier, and are reckless, dare-devil fellows, headed by Lieutenants Tompkins and Gordon. They rushed upon the rebels, who had hastily gathered in the only street of the village, upon hearing the report of the guns of the pickets, with terrific yells. The reconnoissance scattered in all directions before the dragoons could get a fair chance at them. The Federal loss was caused by the firing from the windows of a tavern and the Court House. The bold troopers rode right up to the windows, and discharged their sabre's rifles and revolvers at their assailants. The Federal cavalry being hailed by a guard, just before entering the village, Lieutenant Tompkins rode up to the rebels and replied, "Cavalry," to the challenge. The sentinel then asking, "What cavalry?" the Lieutenant sang out, "United States cavalry," simultaneously bringing the rebel to the ground by a shot from his revolver.

NEWPORT NEWS, NEAR FORTRESS MONROE, NOW OCCUPIED BY GENERAL BUTLER.

NEWPORT NEWS.

WE publish herewith a view of NEWPORT NEWS, near Fortress Monroe, Virginia, which General Butler has just occupied, and is now fortifying. A Virginian writer, speaking of the spot, says: "Newport News, so named after Captain Christopher Newport, the commodore of the little fleet of three vessels, of the aggregate burden of one hundred and sixty tons, which brought over the adventurers, and who returned for England with news' the 15. of June 1607,' is the sister promontory to Jamestown. Its pine-clad spit divides James River from Hampton Roads. The waterview at this point, east, south, and northwest, is superb. When 'Master Gookin, out of Ireland, with fifty men of his owne, and thirty Passengers' baptized the shamrock in its blue and teeming waters, it was deemed a small paradise. 'The cotten-trees in a years grow so thicke as one's arme, and so high as a man; here any thing that is planted doth prosper as well as in no place better.' The soil is deathless as good as it ever was, since the moisture from the neighboring ocean prevents land in this region from being permanently exhausted, even on the most reckless system of tillage; but we hear of no such growth now. Cotton-planting has given place to oyster-planting, as the leading staple. Master Gookin must have shared the hydrophobic propensities of his countrymen, or he would have delved in the waves for fishes and comfort."

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

CHAPTER XLVI.

SOME weeks passed without bringing any change. We waited for Wemmick, and he made no sign. If I had never known him out of Little Britain, and had never enjoyed the privilege of being on a familiar footing at the Castle, I might have doubted him; not so for a moment, knowing him as I did.

My worldly affairs began to wear a gloomy appearance, and I was pressed for money by more than one creditor. Even I myself began to know the want of money (I mean of ready money in my own pocket), and to relieve it by converting some easily spared articles of jewelry into cash. But I had quite determined that it would be a heartless fraud to take more money from my patron in the existing state of my uncertain thoughts and plans. Therefore, I had sent him the unopened pocket-book by Herbert, to hold in his own keeping, and I felt a kind of satisfaction—whether it was a false kind or a true, I hardly know—in not having profited by his generosity since his revelation of himself.

As the time wore on, an impression settled heavily upon me that Estella was married. Fearful of having it confirmed, though it was all but a conviction, I avoided the newspapers, and begged Herbert (to whom I had confided the circumstances of our last interview) not to speak of her to me. Why I hoarded up this last wretched little rag of the robe of hope that was rent and given to the winds, how do I know? Why did you read this, commit that not dissimilar inconsistency of your own last year, last month, last week?

It was an unhappy life that I lived, and its one dominant anxiety, towering over all its other anxieties like a high mountain above a range of mountains, never disappeared from my view. Still, no new cause for fear arose. Let me start from my bed as I would, with the terror fresh upon me that he was discovered; let me sit listening as I would, with dread, for Herbert's returning step at night, lest it should be fleeter than ordinary, and winged with evil news; for all that, and much more to like purpose, the round of things went on. Condemned to inaction and a state of constant restlessness and suspense, I rowed about in my boat, and waited, waited, waited, as I best could.

There were states of the tide when, having been down the river, I could not get back through the eddy-chafed arches and starlings of old London Bridge; then, I left my boat at a wharf near the Custom-house, to be brought up afterward to the Temple stairs. I was not averse to doing this, as it served to make me and my boat a commoner incident among the water-side people there. From this slight accession sprang two meetings that I have more to tell of.

One afternoon, late in the month of February, I came ashore at the wharf at dusk. I had pulled down as far as Greenwich with the ebb tide, and had turned with the tide. It had been a fine bright day, but had become foggy as the sun dropped, and I had had to feel my way back among the shipping pretty carefully. Both in going and returning I had seen the signal in his window, All well.

As it was a raw evening and I was cold, I thought I would comfort myself with dinner at once; and as I had hours of dejection and solitude before me if I went home to the Temple, I thought I would afterward go to the play. The theatre where Mr. Wopsle had achieved his questionable triumph was in that water-side neighborhood (it is nowhere now), and to that theatre I resolved to go. I was aware that Mr. Wopsle had not acted since the memorable night of his noble birth, and a monkey. And Herbert had seen him as a predatory Tartar, of comic propensities, with a face like a red brick, and an outrageous hat all over bells.

I dined at what Herbert and I used to call a Geographical chop-house—where the walls were maps of the world in porter-pot rims on every half-yard of the table-cloths, and charts of gravy on every one of the knives—to this day there is scarcely a single chop-house in the Lord Mayor's dominions which is not Geographical—and wore out the time in dozing over crumbs, staring at gas, and baking in a hot blast of dinners. Bymand-by I roused myself and went to the play.

There I found a virtuous boatswain in his Majesty's service—a most excellent man, though I could have wished his trowsers not quite so tight in some places and not quite so loose in others—who knocked all the little men's hats over their eyes, though he was very generous and brave, and who wouldn't hear of any body's paying taxes on any account, though he was very patriotic. He had a bag of money in his pocket, like a pudding in the cloth, and on that property married a young person in bed-furniture with great rejoicings; the whole population of Portsmouth (nine in number at the last Census) turning out on the beach to rub their own hands and shake every body else's, and sing "Fill, fill!" A certain flat-complexioned fellow, however, who wouldn't fill, or do any thing else that was proposed to him, and whose heart was openly stated (per the boatswain) to be as black as his figure-head, proposed to two other Swabs to get all mankind into difficulties; which was so effectually done (involving considerable political influence) that it took half the evening to set things right, and then it was only brought about through an honest fellow (once with a white hat, black gaiters, and red nose, getting into a clock with a gridiron, and listening, and coming out, and knocking every body down from behind with the gridiron whom he couldn't confuse with what he had overheard. This led to Mr. Wopsle's being the only (real head of before) coming in with a star and garter on, as a plenipotentiary of great power direct from the Admiralty, to say that the Swabs were all to go to prison on the spot, and that he had brought the boatswain down like Union Jack, as a right acknowledgment of his public services. The boatswain, unmanned for the first time, respectfully dried his eyes on the Jack, and then cheering up and addressing Mr. Wopsle as Your Honor, solicited permission to take him by the fin. Mr. Wopsle conceding his fin with a gracious dignity, was immediately shoved into a dusty corner while every body danced a hornpipe; and, from that corner, surveying the public with a discontented eye, became aware of me.

The second piece was the last new grand comic Christmas pantomime, in the first scene of which it pained me to suspect that I detected Mr. Wopsle, with red worsted legs under a highly magnified phosphoric countenance and a shock of red fringe for his hair, engaged in the manufacture of thunder-bolts in a mine, and displaying great cowardice when his gigantic master came home, very hoarse, to dinner. But he presently presented himself under worthier circumstances; for, the Genius of Youthful Love being in want of assistance—on account of the parental brutality of the Ogre—that former was opposed the choice of his daughter's heart, by purposely falling upon the object in a flour sack, out of the first-floor window—summoned a sententious Enchanter; and he, coming up from the antipodes rather unteasily, after an apparently violent struggle, presented to Mr. Wopsle in a high-crowned hat, with a necromantic work in one volume under his arm. The business of this enchanter consisting principally of to be talked at, sung at, butted at, danced at, and flashed at with fires of various colors, he had a good deal of time on his hands. And I observed with great surprise that he devoted it to staring in my direction as if he were lost in amazement.

There was something so remarkable in the increasing glare of Mr. Wopsle's eye, and he seemed to be turning so many things over in his mind and to grow so confused, that I could not make it out. I sat thinking of it long after he had ascended to the clouds in a large watchcase, and still I could not make it out. I was still thinking of it when I came out of the theatre an hour afterward, and found him waiting for me near the door.

"How do you do?" said I, shaking hands with him as we turned down the street together. "I saw that you saw me."

"Saw you, Mr. Pip?" he returned. "Yes, of course I saw you. But who else was there?"

"Who else?"

"It is the strangest thing," said Mr. Wopsle, drifting into his lost look again; "and yet I could swear to him."

Becoming alarmed, I entreated Mr. Wopsle to explain his meaning.

"Whether I should have noticed him at first but for your being there," said Mr. Wopsle, going on in the same lost way, "I can't be positive; yet I think I should."

Involuntarily I looked round me, as I was accustomed to look round me when I went home; for these mysterious words gave me a chill.

"Oh! He can't be in sight," said Mr. Wopsle. "He went out before I went off. I saw him go."

Having the reason that I had for being suspicious, I even suspected this poor actor. I mistrusted a design to entrap me into some admission. Therefore I kept quiet at him as we walked on together, but said nothing.

"I had a ridiculous fancy that he must be with you. As I say, till I saw that you were quite unconscious of him sitting behind you there, like a ghost."

My former chill crept over me again, but I was resolved not to speak yet, for it was quite consistent with his words that he might be set on to tempt me to counter-these references with Provis. Of course I was perfectly sure and safe that Provis had not been there.

"I dare say you wonder at me, Mr. Pip; indeed I see you do. But the fact is so very strange! You'll hardly believe what I am going to tell you. I could hardly believe it myself if you told me."

"Indeed?" said I.

"No, indeed. Mr. Pip, you remember in old times a certain Christmas-day, when you were quite a child, and I dined at Gargery's, and some soldiers came to the door to get a pair of handcuffs mended?"

"I remember it very well."

"And you remember that there was a chase after two convicts, and they were joined in it, and that Gargery took you on his back, and that I took the lead, and you kept up with me as well as you could?"

"I remember it all very well." Better than he thought—except the last clause.

"And you remember that we came up with the two in a ditch, and that there was a scuffle between them, and that one of them fell being severely handled and much mauled about the face by the other?"

"I see it all before me."

"And that the soldiers lighted torches, and put the two in the centre, and that we went on to see the last of them, over the black marshes, with the torch-light shining on their faces—I am particular about that; with the torch-light shining on their faces, when there was an outer ring of dark night all about us?"

"Yes," said I. "I remember all that."

"Then, Mr. Pip, one of those two prisoners sat behind you to-night. I saw him over your shoulder."

"Steady!" I thought. I asked him then, "Which of the two do you suppose you saw?"

"The one who had been mauled," he answered readily, "and I'll swear I saw him! The more I think of him the more certain I am of him."

"This is very curious!" said I, with the best assumption I could put on, of its being nothing more to me. "Very curious indeed!"

I can not exaggerate the enhanced disquiet into which this conversation threw me, or the special and peculiar terror I felt at Compeyson's having been behind me like a ghost. For, if he had ever been out of my thoughts for a few moments together since the hiding had begun, it was in those very moments when he was closest to me; and to think that I should be so unconscious and off my guard after all my care, was as if I had taken an avenue of a hundred doors to keep him out, and then had found him at my elbow. I could not doubt either that he was there, because I was there, and I had discover slight an appearance of danger there might be about us, danger was always near and active.

I put such questions to Mr. Wopsle as, When did the man come in? He could not tell me that; he saw me, and over my shoulder he saw the man. It was not until he had spoken him for some time that he began to identify him; but he had from the first vaguely associated him with me, and known him as somehow belonging to me in the old village time. How was he dressed? Prosperously, but not noticeably otherwise; he thought in black. Was his face at all disfigured? No, he believed not. I believed not too, for, although in my brooding state I had taken no especial notice of the people behind me, I thought it likely that a face at all disfigured would have attracted my attention.

When Mr. Wopsle had imparted to me all that he could recall or I extract, and when I had treated him to a little appropriate refreshment after the fatigues of the evening, we parted. It was between twelve and one o'clock when I reached the Temple, and the gates were shut. No one was near me when I went in and went home.

Herbert had come in, and we held a very serious council by the fire. But there was nothing to be done, saving to communicate to Wemmick what I had that night found out, and to remind him that we waited for his hint. As I thought that I might compromise him if I went too often to the Castle, I made this communication by letter. I wrote it before I went to bed, and went out and posted it; and again no one was near me. Herbert and I agreed that we could do nothing else but be very cautious. And we were very cautious indeed—more cautious than before, if that were possible—and I, for my part, never went near the Basin, except when I rowed by, and then I only looked at Mill Pond Bank as I looked at any thing else.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE second of the two meetings referred to in the last chapter occurred about a week after the first. I had again left my boat at the wharf below Bridge; the time was an hour earlier in the afternoon; and, undecided where to dine, I had strolled up into Chesapside, and was strolling along it, surely the most unsettled person in all the busy concourse, when a large hand was laid upon by shoulder by some one overtaking me. It was Mr. Jaggers's hand, and he passed it through my arm.

"As we are going in the same direction, Pip, we may walk together. Where are you bound for?"

"For the Temple, I think," said I.

"Don't you know?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"Well," I returned, glad for once to get the better of him in cross-examination, "I do not know, for I have not made up my mind."

"You are going to dine?" said Mr. Jaggers. "You don't mind admitting that, I suppose?"

"No," I returned, "I don't mind admitting that."

"And are not engaged?"

"I don't mind admitting, also, that I am not engaged."

"Then," said Mr. Jaggers, "come and dine with me."

I was going to excuse myself, when he added,

"Wemmick's coming." So I changed my excuse into an acceptance—for few words I had uttered serving for the beginning of either—and we went along Cheapside and shunted off to Little Britain, while the lights were springing up brilliantly in the shop-windows, and the street lamps-lighters, scarcely finding ground enough to paint their ladders on in the confusion of the afternoon's bustle, were skipping up and down and running in and out, opening more red eyes in the gathering fog than all the link-boys together at the Hummums had opened white eyes in the ghastly wall.

At the office in Little Britain there was the usual letter-writing, hand-washing, candle-snuffing, and safe-locking, that closed the business of the day. As I stood idly by the fire, Jaggers's fire, its rising and falling flame made the two casts on the shelf look as if they were playing a diabolical game at bo-peep with me; while the pair of coarse fat office-candles that dimly lighted Mr. Jaggers as he wrote in a corner, were decorated with dirty winding-sheets, as if in remembrance of a host of hanged clients.

We went to Gerrard Street, all those together, in a hackney-coach; and as soon as we got there dinner was served. Although I should not have thought of making, in that place, the most distant reference to my situation, I felt it was not to be done. He turned his eyes on Mr. Jaggers when ever he raised them from the table, and was as shy and distant to me as if there were twin Wemmicks, and this was the wrong one.

"Did you send that note of Miss Haviham's to Mr. Pip, Wemmick?" Mr. Jaggers asked, soon after we began dinner.

"No, Sir," returned Wemmick; "it was going by post when you brought Mr. Pip into the office. Here it is." He handed it to his principal instead of to me.

"It's a note of two lines, Pip," said Mr. Jaggers, handing it to me, "sent up to me by Miss Haviham on account of her not being sure of your address. She tells me that she wants to see you on a little matter of business you mentioned to her. You'll go down?"

"Yes," said I, casting my eyes over the note, which was exactly in those terms.

"When do you think of going down?"

"I have an impending engagement," said I, glancing at Wemmick, who was putting fish on the post-office, "that renders me rather uncertain of my time. At once, I think."

"If Mr. Pip has the intention of going at once," said Wemmick to Mr. Jaggers, "he needn't write an answer, you know."

Receiving this as an intimation that it was best not to delay, I settled that I would go tomorrow, and said so. Wemmick drank a glass of wine and looked with a pensively satisfied air at Mr. Jaggers, but not at me.

"So, Pip!" our friend the Spider," said Mr. Jaggers, "has played his cards. He has won the pool."

It was as much as I could do to assent.

"Hah! he's a promising fellow—in his way —but he may not have it all his own way. The stronger will win in the end, but the stronger has to be found out first. If he should turn to, and beat his—"

"Surely," I interrupted, with a burning face and heart, "we do not seriously think that even he is scoundrel enough for that, Mr. Jaggers?"

"I didn't say so, Pip. I am putting a case. If he should turn to and beat her, he may possibly get the strength on his side; if it should be a question of intellect, he certainly will not. It would be a clear case of evidence and opinion how a fellow of that sort will turn out in such circumstances, because it's a toss-up between two results."

"May I ask what they are?"

"A fellow like our friend the Spider," answered Mr. Jaggers, "either beats or cringes. He may cringe and growl, or cringe and not growl; but he either beats or cringes. Ask Wemmick his opinion."

"Either beats or cringes," said Wemmick, not at all addressing himself to me.

"So here's to Mrs. Bentley Drummle," said Mr. Jaggers, taking a decanter of choicer wine from his dumb-waiter, and filling for each of us and for himself, "and may the question of supremacy be settled to the lady's satisfaction! To the satisfaction of the lady and the gentleman it never will be. Now, Molly, Molly, Molly, Molly, how slow you are to-day!"

The action of her fingers was like the action of knitting. She stood looking at her master, not understanding whether she was free to go, or whether he had more to say to her and would call her back if she did go. Her look was very intent. Surely, I had seen exactly such eyes and such hands on a memorable occasion very lately!

He dismissed her, and she glided out of the room. But she remained before me, as plainly as if she were still there. I looked at those hands, I looked at those eyes, I looked at that flowing hair; and I thought of them with the hands, other eyes, other hair, that I knew of, and with what those might be after twenty years of a brutal husband and a degraded life. I looked again at those hands and eyes of the housekeeper, and thought of the inexplicable feeling that had come over me when I last walked alone—in disturbed garden and through the deserted brewery. I thought how the same feeling had come back when I left her sharpening at the mill, and a hand waving to me, from a stage-coach window; and how it had come back again and had flashed about me like a mystery when I had passed in a carriage—not alone—through a sudden glare of light in a dark street. I thought how one link of association with her had been identification in the theatre, and how such a link, arising in a foe, had been riveted for me now, when I had passed by a common door with Estella's name to the fingers with their knitting action, at the attentive eyes. I felt absolutely certain that this woman was Estella's mother.

Mr. Jaggers's hand was out with Estella, and was not likely to have missed the sentiment I had been at no pains to conceal. He nodded when I said this to him, clapped me on the back, put round the wine again, and went on with his dinner.

Only twice more did the housekeeper reappear, and then her stay in the room was very short, and Mr. Jaggers was sharp with her. But her hands were Estella's hands, and her eyes were Estella's eyes, and if she had reappeared a hundred times I could have been neither more sure nor less sure that my conviction was the truth.

It was a dull evening, for Wemmick drew his wine when it was handed round, as a matter of business—just as he might have drawn his salary when that came round—and with his eye on his client, as if mentally casting up his readiness for cross-examination. As to the quantity of wine, his post-office was as indifferent and enough as the famous Hunderby one. A quantity of letters. From my point of view he was a wrong twin all the time, and only exceptionally like Wemmick of Walworth.

We took our leave early, and left together. Even when we were groping among Mr. Jaggers's stock of boots in search of our hats, I felt that the tight twin was on his way back; and we had not gone half a dozen yards down Gerrard Street in the Walworth direction, before I found that I was walking arm in arm with the right twin, and that the wrong twin had evaporated into the evening air.

"Well!" said Wemmick, "that's over. He's a wonderful man, without his living likeness; but I feel that I am more myself up when I dine with him—and I dine more comfortably unscrewed."

I felt that this was a good statement of the case, and told him so.

"Wouldn't say it to any body but yourself," he answered, "for it might be what is said between you and me goes no further."

I asked him if he had ever seen Miss Haviham's adopted daughter Mrs. Bentley Drummle? He said no. To avoid being too abrupt, I then spoke of the Aged, and of Miss Skiffins, looked rather sly when I mentioned Miss Skiffins, and repeated in the street of how his nose with a roll of the head and a flourish, not quite free from latent boastfulness.

"Wemmick," said I, "do you remember telling me before I first went to Mr. Jaggers's private house, to notice that housekeeper?"

"Did I?" he replied. "Ah, I dare say I did. Deuce take me," he added, suddenly, "I know I did. I find I am not quite unscrewed yet."

"And the last time you called on me," said I, "you asked me if I had her?"

"The same. How did Mr. Jaggers tame her, Wemmick?"

"That's his secret. She has been with him many a long year."

"I wish you would tell me her story. I feel a particular interest in being acquainted with it. You know that what is said between you and me goes no further."

"Well!" Wemmick replied, "I don't know her story—that is, I don't know all of it. But what I do know, I'll tell you. We are in our private and personal capacities, of course."

"Of course."

"A score of years ago that woman was tried at the Old Bailey for murder, and was acquitted. She was a very handsome young woman, and I believe had some gipsy blood in her. Anyhow, it was hot enough when it was up, as you may suppose."

"But she was acquitted."

"Mr. Jaggers was for her," pursued Wemmick, with a look full of meaning, "and worked the case in a way quite astonishing. It was a desperate case, and it was comparatively early days with him then, and he worked it to general admiration; in fact, it may almost be said to have made him. He worked it himself at the police-office, day after day for many days, contending against even a committal; and at the trial, where he couldn't work it himself, sat under Counsel, and—not any one knew—put in all the salt and pepper. The murdered person was a woman—a woman a good ten years older, very much larger, and very much stronger. It was a case of jealousy. They both led trampling lives, and this woman in Gerrard Street here had been married very young, over the broomstick (as we say), to a tramping man, and was a perfect fury in point of jealousy. The murdered woman—more a match for the man, certainly, in point of years—was found dead in a barn near Hounslow Heath. There had been a violent struggle, perhaps a fight. She was bruised and scratched and torn all over, and had been held by the throat at last and choked. Now there was no reasonable evidence to implicate any person but this woman, and on the improbabilities of her having been able to do it, Mr. Jaggers principally based his case. You may be sure," said Wemmick, touching me on the sleeve, "that he never dwelt upon the strength of her hands then, though he sometimes does now."

I had told Wemmick of his showing us her wrists that day of the dinner party.

"Well, Sir!" Wemmick went on; "it happened—happened, don't you see?—that this woman who had been carefully dressed from the time of her apprehension, that she looked much slighter than she really was; in particular, her sleeves are always understood to have been so skilfully contrived that her arms had quite a delicate look. She had only a bruise or two about her face, and those, it was thought, the backs of her hands were lacerated, and the question was, was it with finger-nails? Now, Mr. Jaggers showed in Court that struggled through a great lot of bramble which were not as high as her face; but which she could not have got through and kept her hands out of; and bits of those brambles were actually found in her skin and put in evidence, as well as the fact that the brambles in question were found on examination to have been broken through, and to have little shreds of her dress and little spots of blood upon them here and there. But the boldest point he made was this. It was attempted to be set up in proof of her jealousy, that she was under strong suspicion of having, at about the time of the murder, frantically destroyed her child by this man—some three years old—to revenge herself upon him. Mr. Jaggers worked that in this way. 'We say these are not marks of finger-nails but marks of brambles, and we have you there, with the brambles. You say they are marks of finger-nails, and you set up the hypothesis that she destroyed her child. You must accept all consequences of that hypothesis. For any thing we know she may have destroyed her child, and the child in clinging to her may have scratched her hands. What then? You are not trying for the murder of her child; why do you? As to this case, if you will have scratches, we say that, for any thing we know, you may have accounted for them, assuming for the sake of argument that you have not invented them?' To sum up, Sir," said Wemmick, "Mr. Jaggers put it together too many for the Jury, and they gave in."

"Has she been in his service ever since?"

"Yes; how she got out of that," said Wemmick, "She went into his service immediately after her acquittal, tamed as she is now. She has since been tamed more and more, and another in the way of her duties, but she was tamed from the beginning."

"Do you remember the sex of the child?"

"Said to have been a girl."

"You have nothing more to say to me tonight?"

"Nothing. I got your letter and destroyed it. Nothing."

We exchanged a cordial Good-night, and I went home, with new matter for my thoughts, yet with no relief from the old.

NAPOLEON'S MAXIMS OF WAR.

A MANUAL FOR OFFICERS, SOLDIERS, AND ALL INTERESTED IN THE ART OF WAR.

It contains a collection of Maxims which directed the military operations of the greatest Captain of modern times, and which will be found invaluable to military officers as really doubts a knowledge of the art of War. The Maxims are illustrated by instances drawn from the campaigns of Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, Frederick, and Napoleon.

RECOMMENDATION.

"After refreshing my memory by looking over again the Military Maxims of Napoleon, I think I may safely recommend the republication, in America, of the work by Jomini, to be called for by many officers, regular, and volunteer. The study of the book can not fail to aid all young officers in a course of inquiry and reflection, greatly to their improvement.

Freckles.

Of all the effects that exposure of the skin to the sun or sun produces, the most disagreeable is called freckles, or tan. If spread over the entire surface of the parts exposed, it is called tan; if scattered at intervals, freckles. The finest skins are most subject to them. The Sallation prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston, contains a peculiar evasive property which will remove those disagreeable stains. It is at the same time perfectly harmless, always a tendency to inflammation, and renders the complexion clear and beautiful.—Boston Herald.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

A complete Set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE will be a desirable acquisition to any Library. Besides the Tales, Poems, and Essays which form the leading features of Periodical Literature, each Number of the Magazine has contained articles of permanent value. Nearly Two Hundred Papers, illustrated by more than Two Thousand Engravings, have been devoted to American History, Biography, Industry, Art, and Invention. Each of our great Agricultural Staples has been made the subject of elaborate articles. The results of the exploration of travelers in regions heretofore undescribed have been carefully epitomized. The "Literary Notices" embody impartial criticisms of more than two thousand books, comprising almost every work of any value which has been issued from the American press during the last ten years. The "Monthly Record of Current Events" fills a small space in each Number, contains matter sufficient to fill several volumes. Every page of historical interest is here noted; it furnishes a more complete history of the last ten years than can be found in any other publication.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, aware of its permanent value, have determined to print Only Enough to Supply Orders, which may be sent by Mail, post-paid, or to any Bookseller or Periodical Dealer.

Lloyd's Railroad Map of America,

Having been engraved on a new plan entirely, and printed and colored on a POWER PRESS, we can make and color it as low as to defy competition. The usual price of a map of this size is from $5 to $8.

IT IS FOUR FEET SQUARE,

Printed on an entire sheet of strong white linen paper, and shows to the reader, at one glance, from CANADA to TEXAS, and is acknowledged by all railroad men to be the most CORRECT Map ever offered to the people of this country, and is used by them altogether.

LLOYD'S MAP SHOWS EVERY RAILROAD IN RUNNING ORDER UP TO MAY 10, 1861. Every station is marked down on the roads, and the distance between each station, and the total length of the road, and also the names of the officers and their places of residence, and the running time of the trains on every Railroad in America are given. Every River in America is traced out, and the Towns and Cities on the Ohio and Mississippi, and other Rivers, are marked down plainly. ALL THE STRONGHOLDS IN THIS COUNTRY ARE LAID DOWN PROMINENTLY; in the blank space of the entire map South is inserted a splendid Map of Peninsula Bay, showing Fort Pickens and Bragg's Batteries, and the entire counties of Santa Rosa and Escambia, Florida—drawn by order of the Secretary of War in 1856, from actual survey—all for 25 cents. The reader can see, at a glance, the situation of the NORTHERN and SOUTHERN STATES, and can comprehend at a glance the immense extent of territory owned by the South which is washed by the sea for more than two thousand miles.

30,000 CITIES, TOWNS, AND STATIONS ARE LAID DOWN ON LLOYD'S MAP.

As there is no such deception practiced upon the public by humbug "Maps of the Seat of War," we have thought it advisable to submit evidence of the correctness of this Map, which we know to be the only reliable map offered to the public.

WILLIAM H. RUSSELL, LL.D.

THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.

WHILE vouching for the fidelity of the annexed likeness, we regret to be unable to furnish our readers with more than a rough outline of this distinguished gentleman's career. And yet, while it is always instructive to trace the origin of an author, and his path from the school-house to distinction, we think it may be said of Dr. Russell that, as the motions of the satellite are regulated and computed by the orbit of the planet, so may his track be said to have been marked by the campaigns of which his pen has so graphically, and almost epically, chronicled the victories and the reverses.

Dr. Russell was born, we believe, in 1822, and now lacks a year of being forty. From Trinity College, Dublin, he was transferred before graduation to Cambridge University, where he obtained his degree, and whence he betook himself to the "Inns of Court," where in due time he exchanged the toga virilis for the wig and gown of a barrister-at-law. Human experience, or human prejudice, is apt to measure legal qualifications by the silver hair and the wrinkles of age rather than by the freshness and enthusiasm of youth: and we may presume that to prevent "the horse from starving while the grass was growing," the briefless barrister formed his first connection with Printing-house Square, where he seems to have won his first laurels as "Our Special Correspondent" in a mission to Ireland, for the purpose of verifying some of the Thunderer's strictures upon Mr. O'Connell's statements of the condition of things in his neighborhood. We next find him reporter of the proceedings before the Parliamentary Railway Committees in the apogee of King Hudson's reign—a delicate and ungrateful office for truth and impartiality, which constrained him to perform it without any of those lateral benefits which, not improperly, perhaps, enriched the pockets of many of his confrères. The following year he abandoned the arena of contending railroad routes for the more congenial one of the Court of Queen's Bench, always with a view to his ultimate absorption by the profession he had embraced with zeal and entered not without sacrifices.

After acquitting himself admirably of the duties of law reporter the toga was sacrificed to arms, and he was dispatched to the scene of the Schleswig - Holstein hostilities, where, in his description of the battle of Idstedt, he evinced for the first time his photographic power of picturing the movements of armies and the phases of battle. On his return from Holstein we believe that he went on to the Times as one of its regular staff of leader writers, and remained there until detailed to the Crimea, whither he accompanied, ex Malta and Gallipoli, Major-General Brown's division, the foremost of the Allied forces in the march to Sebastopol.

Dr. Russell remained in the Crimea until the end of the war, sharing all the hardships and many of the perils of the soldiery. It was not required of the "Times Correspondent" that he should volunteer for the trenches or the rifle-pits, but his glowing descriptions of the battles of Alma and Inkermann, and the evidence of contemporaries, show him to have been in the midst of these engagements. We have heard it said that his letter describing the battle of Alma, which made his first "mark" in England, was written in the field, with ink improvised out of gunpowder, and upon an empty powder-keg.

After the peace Dr. Russell scoured the interior of Russia, and on the following year was dispatched as "Special Correspondent" to recount the majestic ceremonies of the Emperor Alexander's coronation at Moscow. Our readers will remember his glowing description of that semi-Oriental pageant.

Dr. Russell's "Diary in India"—a production entirely distinct from his masterly narrations to the Times of Sir Colin Campbell's reconquest of that vast and menaced appendage to the British Crown—has been extensively read in this country.

On his return from the East he engaged in the publication of the Army and Navy Gazette, a successful hebdomadal devoted to the contemporaneous history and progress of the English Volunteer movement, and to every new discovery or improvement in the art of war by sea or by land. From his editorial duties and a variety of concurrent literary pursuits, Dr. Russell was detailed by "the Thunderer," to whose service he has never ceased to be attached, to inspect the melancholy political condition of our distracted country, whose shores he reached on the 16th March, and where we find him, at the New York St. Patrick's dinner of the day following, expressing his regret that his presence had too often been like that of the Stormy Petrel, the harbinger of trouble; and his hope that, in the present case, the experience of the past might be falsified, and his pen employed to record the circumstances of a reconciliation so precious, rather than those of a fratricidal war so deplorable, to the feelings and interests of humanity.

In his personal intercourse Dr. Russell unites the charms of experience, genius, and sincerity. A willing conversationalist, he rushes into a discussion with the fearlessness of conviction and the generosity of one who feels that he has ideas and knowledge to spare. As an observer, while endowed with a keen relish for enjoyment, nothing seems to escape him.

Mr. Russell arrived in this country about three months since, and after spending a short time in New York and Washington, proceeded to the South. He has by this time made the tour of the Gulf States, and is on his way back to Washington. From Charleston he sends the following curious intelligence, under date of April 20:

"Nothing I could say can be worth one fact which has forced itself upon my mind in reference to the sentiments which prevail among the gentlemen of this State. I have been among them for several days. I have visited their plantations; I have conversed with them freely and fully; and I have enjoyed that frank, courteous, and graceful intercourse which constitutes an irresistible charm of their society. From all quarters have come to my ears the echoes of the same voice; it may be feigned, but there is no discord in the note, and it sounds in wonderful strength and monotony all over the country. Shades of George III., of North, of Johnson, of all who contended against the great rebellion which tore these colonies from England, can you hear the chorus which rings through the State of Marion, Sumter, and Pinckney, and not clap your ghostly hands in triumph? That voice says, 'If we could only get one of the royal race of England to rule over us, we should be content.' Let there be no misconception on this point. That sentiment, varied in a hundred ways, has been repeated to me over and over again. There is a general admission that the means to such an end are wanting, and that the desire can not be gratified. But the admiration for monarchical institutions on the English model, for privileged classes, and for a landed aristocracy and gentry, is undisguised and apparently genuine. With the pride of having achieved their independence is mingled in the South Carolinians' hearts a strange regret at the result and consequences, and many are they who 'would go back to-morrow if we could.'"

In Georgia, it seems, Mr. Russell found less warlike ardor than in little Carolina. He writes, on May 2:

"There is much said concerning 'Our President's' Message; and there is a suddenness of admiration for pacific tendencies which can with difficulty be accounted for, unless the news from the North these last few days has something to do with it. Not a word now about an instant march on Washington! no more threats to seize on Faneuil Hall! The Georgians are by no means so keen as the Carolinians on their border—nay, they are not so belligerent to-day as they were a week ago. Mr. Jefferson Davis's Message is praised for its 'moderation,' and for other qualities which were by no means in such favor while the Sumter fever was at its height. Men look grave, and talk about the interference of England and France, which 'can not allow this thing to go on.' But the change which has come over them is unmistakable, and the best men begin to look grave. As for me, I must prepare to open my lines of retreat—my communications are in danger."

People here generally seem to think that Mr. Russell's letters are more favorable to the South than to the North. His later letters certainly read as though there was a spice of irony in his compliments to the rebels.

WILLIAM H. RUSSELL, LL.D., CORRESPONDENT OF THE LONDON "TIMES."—[FROM A DRAWING BY THEODORE R. DAVIS, ESQ.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1861.

HOW TO KEEP ENGLAND STRAIGHT.

WE still cling to the hope, that the people of Great Britain will not stultify their own record and alienate our good-will by active sympathy with the Southern rebels. We are bound to say that, just at present, the press and the speakers of England decidedly lean to the Southern side. Leading journals, from the London Times to the Saturday Review and Punch, either sneer at the North or urge the claims of the rebels to the independence which they pretend to seek; great anti-slavery apostles like Lord Brougham choose this moment for denouncing abolition; the Government adopts a policy which will enable Southern privateers to take prizes into Liverpool and sell them there. Look which way we will, we find no encouragement for a friendly Government struggling to maintain itself against traitors, and not even a word of censure of slavery—so long the object of England's fiercest rebuke.

We shall not undertake to account for the phenomenon. There must be reasons, of course, for such unfriendly conduct toward our Government, and for such gross inconsistency on the slavery question. But it is not worth while for us to seek them. Whether it be the Morrill tariff or the cotton question, or the desire of English politicians to see this country divided, which stirs up Englishmen to sympathize with slaveholding traitors, and to aid in the establishment of a nation "based on the corner-stone of human slavery," it is fast becoming idle to inquire. It is high time to deal with the facts as they are, and to see what we can do if as now seems possible, England's sympathies are actively engaged on the side of our insurgents.

One-fifth of England's foreign trade is carried on with the United States. No nation in the world has so much of England's trade as so much to her as we do. And our trade with England is more profitable to her than her foreign trade with any other nation; for we send her food and raw material, and we buy her manufactures in return. One year with another we take annually from Great Britain $140,000,000 worth of manufactured goods: or, in other words, assuming the profit in sale to be correct, the United States spend every year $70,000,000 in encouraging the industry of Great Britain. Of these manufactured goods over one-half comes to this country in British vessels, thus giving employment to an enormous fleet of steamers and sailing craft. We sell to Great Britain, on the average, $175,000,000 worth of domestic produce every year, a large proportion of which is destined for consumption on the continent of Europe. Of this, again, over one-third goes to Europe in British vessels. Our exports to Great Britain consist almost exclusively of articles of prime necessity—cotton, tobacco, flour, corn, provisions, and the like—without which British industry must languish, and the cost of living —to the working classes—would be gravely enhanced.

These simple statements of fact suggest a method of reprisal upon Great Britain which would prove quite as effective and much less inconvenient than a war. An embargo upon trade with England would very quickly bring John Bull to his senses. It would speedily teach the manufacturers of the $140,000,000 of British goods, which we have been in the habit of consuming every year, that sympathy with traitors is an expensive luxury. It would give the Tories—who are gloating over the supposed failure of republican institutions — something more practical for the shop-girls and bread riots, to occupy their minds with at home. It would warn the free-traders that, bad as the Morrill tariff is, it is a mere trifle to what this country can do if we be driven to the wall.

Such an embargo would either lead to war with England or it would not. If it did not, we should go on exporting food, etc., to France, and buying our manufactured goods from the French; so that, in the course of a year or two, we should build up Havre, Bordeaux, Lyons, and Rouen, as we have built up Liverpool, London, Birmingham, and Manchester. Instead of the French importing from the United States through Liverpool, as they now do, England would then import through Havre. *

If the embargo led to war it could not injure us much more than active British sympathy with, the rebels would. England has not men enough to effect a landing on our coast. In the Crimean war she could not raise an army of 50,000 men. New York could take care of any army she might send out. She would of course blockade many, if not all of our ports. But the same result will practically be reached if privateers are fitted out in England; already our insurance companies have raised the war risk to a point which absorbs the profit of shippers; the amount of shipping laid up has reached a formidable figure, and increases daily. On the other hand, a war with England would this time insure the annexation of Canada—no mean gain to us in view of the future. We might inflict more severe injuries on our antagonist if we secured the alliance of France, or aroused an insurrectionary movement among the Irish or the Chartists. But these are considerations of small moment. The really important point is, that a war with England would not injure us more than such British sympathy with the rebels as is foreshadowed in the Queen's proclamation, the declarations of the Ministry, and the tone of the London press.

It may be said, of course, that we have no control of the cotton crop, and that if Great Britain declared war upon us she would raise her blockade of the Southern ports. In order to need much discernment to perceive that this would be the last cotton crop England would get, or the South would have to export.

The world will bear witness to the tenderness and delicacy with which the Federal Generals are dealing with the peculiar institution. General Butler, deviating from the precedents established by Generals Taylor and Gaines, who set free negroes seized as prisoners of war, offers to restore fugitive slaves to any owner who takes the oath of allegiance; General McClellan declares that he will put down servile insurrections "with an iron hand;" General Patterson warns his troops to respect all kinds of "property;" the kind of proclamation which generals would issue to their troops the day after England raised our blockade of the Southern ports and made common cause with the Confederacy based on the corner-stone of human slavery, will suggest itself to every one who understands human nature.

OUR FOREIGN MINISTERS.

WHY is it that the Government of the United States so often contrives to send the wrong men to represent it abroad? What fatality is it which renders our diplomatic corps so frequently a failure? There are always plenty of good men in the country who are willing to represent the United States abroad; what evil genius is it which contrives to set these systematically aside, and to send abroad men who are either unfit, or distasteful, or positively disgraceful?

One might have supposed that the shame and disgrace brought upon the country by the Ostend Manifesto, and by the conduct of Soulé, Saunders, Daniels, etc., would have served as a warning to future Administrations, and that hereafter our Foreign Ministers would have been selected with care. But how does the case stand?

Our minister to France, Mr. Dayton, a high, Fy respectable man, does not speak a word of French. Our minister to Russia, a brave and chivalrous gentleman, and excellently fitted to fight the present battle of the Union in Kentucky, has so little discretion that he can not pass through London without following the time-honored example of vain Americans, and writing a silly letter to the Times, which does us infinite mischief. To Austria we send a very good man indeed, but one who has not a claim to distinction in foreign politics rests upon the efforts he made to give aid and comfort to a rebellious Austrian province. To Spain—still a leading state—we have just sent a man of the Soulé—we send a European exile, a fierce revolutionist, who would have been the very man to send as a spokesman in the Hungarian Diet who can hardly expect a civil reception at the court of Queen Isabella. To the refined and polished court of the Hague we send a sound republican, rough as the side of a rhinoceros. By way of making a balance, we suppose, a strong democrat, great on matters of taste and dress, good to represent the republican Administration in commercial circles. In Belgium we send a man who turns out to be a rank traitor—at least, so his friends here confess.

It is hardly the part of patriotism to try to embarrass the Government at this juncture, and we will only add that we hope the military offices in the gift of the Administration will be filled with more discernment than the Foreign Missions we have mentioned.

The mischief which an indiscreet or unfit minister may do will counterbalance all the benefit the country may receive from the judicious diplomacy of such men as Adams, Corwin, Marsh, and Webb.

MORE SOUTHERN PICTURES.

WE continue in this number our illustrations of Scenes at the South, though there is no communication either by mail or express with that section of the country. On another page the reader will find an engraving of a BIVOUAC OF CONFEDERATE TROOPS at Warrington, Pensacola, from a photograph taken a few days ago. We venture to promise our readers that the interruption of mail and other intercourse with the Southern States will not prevent our receiving a regular supply of illustrations from thence. Notwithstanding the abuse of Southern journals, we seem to have friends left at the South, who promise to keep us supplied with sketches by smuggling them across the lines. Our late subscribers in that section may not know what they miss in being deprived of Harper's Weekly.

THE LOUNGER.

WHY WE TALK ABOUT ENGLAND.

We all naturally think and say a great deal about the position of England toward us, because she is, of all the great nations in the world, our natural ally. America is the child of England. The child left the ancestral house with indignation and violence, but she is none the less of the same blood, the same sympathy, of the same hope. The colonies were settled from many countries, but the dominant race and the controlling spirit were the Anglo-Saxon. The shock with the mother country was long in healing. There were jealousies, rivalries, sneers, haughty indifference. But all the glory of one was that—the glory. Carlyle and Macaulay, Wordsworth and Tennyson, Dickens and Thackeray, they were ours as they were England's; they were ours as the men of no other nation are. Speaking in the aggregate, England may have feared and hated us as a commercial rival—as a power likely to dispute with her the supremacy of the seas; but the best Englishmen and the best Americans met and stood upon a higher ground than that—the ground of common blood, civilization, and destiny.

That the English Government seems so coldly unfriendly to us does not sting and surprise. Yet as we say elsewhere, while the mass and the conscience of the two nations have been, upon the whole, in earnest, our own Government has doubtless hitherto misrepresented the truest sentiment of our people, and we ought to wait to hear whether the English Government is the official action of their Government. If there be no correcting public sentiment developed—if it shall finally appear that the Government represented by Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston, England will have disdained—and lost her most natural and valuable ally.

OUR NATIONAL REPUTATION.

NATIONS, like kings, it seems, have no friends. France owes us little for our old revolution, not because she loved the colonies, but because she hated the parent country. And we are now learning, not without bitterness, that, in a threatening moment, the "friendship" of a nation means suspicious neutrality.

Where is that capital story told about "presence of mind?" A Bishop and some friends were sailing in a small boat which was struck by a squall and the Bishop's mitre was thrown into the water. He grasped the gunwale to help himself back into the boat. "By Jove!" said the Bishop with great coolness, "I have lost my capsize au sil. But I had, providentially, presence of mind enough to recollect my umbrella, and seizing that, I rapped poor Tom Noddy on the head and so had the luck to be obliged to lie go, and sank; and we all got very comfortably to shore."

Yes! if we can save ourselves closely what right we had to expect friendship from other nations, we shall be obliged to confess that we had none at all. We have, on other occasions, as we have boasted, and swaggered, and sworn, in the great society of nations, very much as the representatives of our Yazoo Southern powers, and we have behaved in Congress. Metaphorically speaking, we have squirted tobacco juice over all the powers of Christendom. Think of the Mexican Manifesto. Remember that the chief signer was our accredited representative in England, and returned to us, after that performance, only to be made President. Think of our Cuba performances; of our conduct in the Peruvian guano difficulty; of our general tone in dealing with foreign powers, and of our haughtiness with which we have treated large ones. Our very existence was a pang to the monarchical system; and our late short "war of liberation." We were regarded as a phenomenon among nations, and the interest of the world in our fate was limited to a languid curiosity as to how much we should fall into the anarchy prepared for all republics.

The work we have in hand, therefore, is not merely the suppression of a rebellion, but it is to show the world that the characteristic spirit of the American people has been most grossly misrepresented before Europe. The great body of intelligent men in every nation are to learn that the same spirit which has every where belied the country—which through the mouths of our ambassadors has placed us in the ridiculous and wicked position of being the only government which professed to be based upon the rights of man, and yet the only one which denied them to many—is the spirit which, having been plainly exposed to the people of the country, has been expelled from power, and, feeling its expulsion to be intolerable, now seeks to destroy the government since it can no longer control it.

By-and-by enlightened men every where will perceive that it was because we were conscious of the disgraceful position we have been made to hold in the world by the misrepresentation of the anomalous feudal and aristocratic faction which has hitherto adroitly spoken and acted for the United States, that we have not sought help from the government. And they will see, also, that the faction maintained itself so long only by ingenious appeals to the prejudices and forbearance and love of peace of the great party by means of which it reached and retained power. And they will see further, that the mass of that party in concert with the other great party of the country, has now buried the Hatchet beneath the flag, and that both stand shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart to prove that a popular government can cope triumphantly with the most desperate rebellion, and conquer not only an unprecedented peace at home, but the intelligent and admiring sympathy of all who wish well to mankind.

THE QUESTION OF REBELLION.

REBELLIONS are not necessarily just or unjust. But hitherto, as they have generally been risings of the people against tyranny, they have inspired sympathy in all generous minds. The great rebellion in England was the rising of the English people against the despotic, irresponsible prerogative of the crown. The French Revolution was the despairing struggle of utterly oppressed and outraged human beings. The late risings in Italy, Garibaldi's landing in Sicily, the expulsion of the small Dukes from Tuscany, Modena, and Parma, were all rebellions, because they were movements against established governments; but they are justified by the heart of mankind, because they were struggles against intolerable oppressions, whose consequences were worse than the woes of war.

The insurrection of the slaveholding faction in this country is not criminal because it is a rebellion, but because it is the effort of a faction to overthrow the government of the whole people. It is precisely what a rebellion of the monarchists in Italy would be, after Italy had established a popular government with a constitution providing for its own amendment. Our fathers who undertook the Revolution were rebels; but they rebelled only when lawful redress of grievance was clearly impossible. They took up arms, at first, in defense of the rights of British subjects under the British constitution. James Otis constantly appealed to that constitution. The colonies petitioned the crown under the privileges of its constitution: and only when the positive wrongs they suffered were felt to be irremediable, did they appeal to God and man for the justice of their cause, draw the sword, and boldly take their stand as rebels.

It was not the success of their rebellion that justified it. That the English government had succeeded in quelling it, and Washington, Adams, and Franklin had hung separately, as Franklin jocosely remarked, the rebellion would still have been as noble in its aim as it was complete in its success—the great leaders would have been censured for want of wisdom in exposing people to the consequences of defeat; but those consequences would have been cheerfully accepted by the people. So if Garibaldi had miscalculated the unanimity of the Sicilians or the power of the Neapolitan government, and had failed a year ago when he touched Sicily with the torch of liberty and it flamed from end to end, he would still have been esteemed in history unfortunate, but not criminal.

Suppose that a powerful monarchical reaction in Italy by which the Italians should be again relegated to the despotic rule of their petty princes. Would success be converted justice? Does History, does the heart of mankind, honor only the successful? If Aaron Burr had divided the country and founded a Mexican empire in dispute with us the continent; if John André had returned safely within the British lines and Benedict Arnold had been promoted to command to overthrow, would our traditions despise them less? Would not History and mankind condemn them all the more?

Concede success to the Davis rebellion, still you can not save it from historical ignominy. The detection of a great nation upon which hang the hopes of the world, of whose government is just and firm, but flexible and mild, whose Constitution provides for the peaceful and equitable remedy of every grievance, and even, indirectly, for its own abrogation, the overthrow of a government ordained by the people of the United States to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquility, to provide for the common defense, to promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty, by a rebellion of some of those people aiming to establish a government which shall secure the perpetuity of slavery, and who can not truly plead a single injury or a solitary effort at peaceful remedy of their alleged wrongs, would be a misfortune without a parallel in history.

AN OBVIOUS QUESTION.

A POWERFUL party in England is engaged in suppressing a rebellion. England says to her: "I don't care in the least whether you put down the rebellion or the rebellion puts you down. The only thing I care about is cotton, and that I am going to have, anyhow."

Such we believe to be the strongest moral support of the revolt. What is likely to come of it?

In the first place, the rebellion will be prolonged until the time for the growing cotton of the entire England may openly and actively support it. If Jeff Davis is compelled to fall back from Virginia through the line from Montgomery again, he will not hesitate. He will hold out at any cost, to give England the opportunity to interfere.

That, in the second place, before the time arrives the Government of the United States will undoubtedly say to England:

"You call yourself a friendly ally of ours. We are crushing a rebellion. It survives still, and survives solely upon your sympathy. If you are a friendly power you will no longer encourage treason among our citizens. If you continue to encourage it you are not a friendly power, and we shall not consider you in the future negotiation, with a proper regard to their duty and dignity, the United States can not consent to the so-called neutrality of England."

Such a tone might be taken in no truculent spirit, but as a simple and obvious and justifiable necessity. If Ireland were in open rebellion against the British Government, for whatever cause, and the United States recognized Ireland as a belligerent, it is clear that the rebellion would receive its chief importance and danger from that sympathy. How long before Great Britain would ask the United States to explain its position?

THE WAY TO WAR.

IF is asked how the action of England, in merely recognizing the belligerent rights of the rebellion, can occasion war. The question is very easily answered.

Great Britain has not recognized the independence of the rebellious States. Victoria is not yet an acknowledged ally of Jefferson Davis. But her Government declares itself neutral, and concedes to him belligerent rights. By the decisions of her courts it is a right of belligerents to take prizes into neutral ports. Great Britain and the United States are at peace. But if a trading or passenger ship sails from Liverpool to New York—two open ports of two friendly nations—she may be seized when twenty miles out by one of Mr. Jeff Davis's privateers, taken back into Liverpool, and held until a prize court sitting in Charleston or Savannah has declared her forfeited to the captors. In the same way a ship sailing from New York or Philadelphia for any English port, may be seized and carried to any British colony, Nassau, for instance, and kept until condemned.

How long can such proceedings possible without war? How long while such things happen will the nation that consents to them call herself an ally of the nation whose commerce she thus helps destroy?

That a great nation should declare herself neutral in a war between two other Powers is to say merely that she is the friend of both. But to recognize the belligerent rights of a party in rebellion against an ally, within its own territory, is to declare against the ally. Can it be that for so desperate a chance as the success of this rebellion Great Britain has deliberately thrown away the friendship of the United States?

A BIT OF HISTORY.

FOUR of the Pennsylvania militia are now garrisoning Fort Washington upon the Potomac, opposite Mount Vernon, write to the Lounger describing Assembly the first of the first movement of Northern Volunteers. The four are members of the first companies accepted by Governor Curtin. They say:

"Our company, from Lewistown, Mifflin County, called the Logan Guards; the Washington Artillerists from Pottsville; Logan Infantry, Lewistown; Reading Artillerists, and Allentown Rifles, were the first companies of volunteers that left the Northern States and marched through Baltimore. We arrived at Harrisburg on Wednesday evening, the 17th of April, and at 7 o'clock on the following morning were mustered in. At 9 we started for Washington. We reached our destination the same day about 6 o'clock P.M., where we remained until the 30th of April, when we were removed to Fort Washington as a reinforcement. The commandant, Major Joseph A. Haskins, whom we had not however seen until the following day, where he lost an arm, has thoroughly strengthened his position. The 32-pounders are all ready; the furnaces for heating shot are in applique order; the magazine are full; the hand-grenades are ready for use at a moment's notice; the barracks are "ping around loose;" and the artillerists sleep nightly beneath their guns. It is the intention of the Government to erect a battery on the hill immediately behind the fort. The impression is that we can hold the fort against 30,000 rebels. Fort Washington is sixteen miles from the city, on the Maryland side. Three miles below us, on the Virginia side, we have a splendid view of Mount Vernon, the resting-place of the Father of our Country. We have been kept very busy since we have been here, cutting down trees and hauling brush, digging trenches, mounting cannon, etc. We are now prepared to meet any number of the rebels."

BLOWING HOT AND COLD.

CERTAIN worthy gentlemen in Kentucky and elsewhere are resolved to eat their cake and have it, if the thing can be done. When rebels take up arms to destroy the Government these gentlemen are of opinion that there is a great deal to be said upon both sides, and that the Government and the rebellion are about equally right and wrong. And we are very much distressed by the prospect of fighting. Fighting is to be avoided at all hazards. If bears and lions and sighs and platitudes will be of any service in this emergency, they will furnish any required quantity. If people could only be kept from fighting by surrenderings; every single man makes a man truly manly and a Government truly powerful, in the name of quiet and tears let it be surrendered. The sense sobbing and sighing patriots are not especially anxious that the Government of their country should be maintained; but the one thing that is generally desired is that, if any body is in danger of being hurt in maintaining it, the defense shall be abandoned.

These gentlemen announce that their States intend to take no part in the war. Suppose that every other State in the Union should do the same thing? The Government of the United States, threatened by a desperate rebellion, calls upon the citizens, in the constitutional and legal method, to defend the Government, and the citizens in each State reply, "No, thank you; we're going to stand off." It would be doing precisely what the people in the Confederate States have done—the national Government would disappear. The action of these gentry of the Border States is only less noble and less insidious than that of the Cotton States. The latter say, "We are going to overthrow the Government." The former reply, "Very well; we shall not hinder."

In the address to the people of Kentucky, these gentlemen say, "Hold fast to that sheet-anchor of republican liberty, that the will of the majority, constitutionally and legally expressed, must govern." In the address to the people of the United States they say, in effect, "But the majority will not submit—why then, 'tis very unfortunate, but you must let them have their way."

This is the inevitable and logical conclusion of that movement which, under the name of "Unionism," in our late political history, and its high-priest, Mr. Everett, now confesses it, through fear of traitors, insisted upon pandering to treason, by dividing the ranks of the citizens who were unconditional Union men. Let us learn from the Past. There is no need of recrimination, but we do not grow wiser by forgetting. When there is a debate of vital principle, whether political or not, there are but two sides. You are for it, heart and soul; or you are against it.

RUMORS OF THE DAY.

A C SONG.

Inscribed to SIGNOR TAMBERLIK after a hearing of his famous "ut de poitrine."

THE C! the C! the open C!
That cometh from the chest as free;
I'm charming as long as that high clear sound,
How it filleth the house, shows around,
It rings through the stalls, to joy it flies,
And e'en to the back of the gallery lies.
I love the C, the high-bred C,
Tis a tone above Sims Reeves his By;
It is pitched exactly as high to go,
And it taketh the shine out of Maria.
Through a storm in the storm and hand there be,
What matter their clothes? they ne'er can drown the C!

I love, O how I love to dwell
In thought on the stories of William Tell:
Where the shining lake and the silver moon
Seen in harmonies will with each oar's note tune:
When Tell's voice is heard in that grand trio,
And his chorus comes trooping from lonely and low.
I no find of Hery Fornes' deep bass roar,
But I love the high C more than before.
As upward it soareth so clear from the chest
As a skylarkingle's singing in the nest.
And a wonder it always hath been to me,
How a tenor can touch that high chest C.

The virgin sigh I have heard, so sweet,
In nervousness or weak lungs 'twas been:
And I hate the falsetto, though you do tell
That by it Robin made perks of gold.
Many queens and queens he must sound still,
But the high chest C just suits this child;
It stirreth the soul and it stirreth the air,
All the pulses that vibrate to love or strife.
I love wealth to spend, I love power to cause,
But from fame I love most to hear the big clause;
And if Arnold ever should call on me,
I'll get him to sing me the high chest C!

The action of these gentry of the Border States is only less noble and less insidious than that of the Cotton States. The latter say, "We are going to overthrow the Government." The former reply, "Very well; we shall not hinder."

In the address to the people of Kentucky, these gentlemen say, "Hold fast to that sheet-anchor of republican liberty, that the will of the majority, constitutionally and legally expressed, must govern." In the address to the people of the United States they say, in effect, "But the majority will not submit—why then, 'tis very unfortunate, but you must let them have their way."

This is the inevitable and logical conclusion of that movement which, under the name of "Unionism," in our late political history, and its high-priest, Mr. Everett, now confesses it, through fear of traitors, insisted upon pandering to treason, by dividing the ranks of the citizens who were unconditional Union men. Let us learn from the Past. There is no need of recrimination, but we do not grow wiser by forgetting. When there is a debate of vital principle, whether political or not, there are but two sides. You are for it, heart and soul; or you are against it.

The Rise, White, and Blue.—The red cheeks, the white teeth, and blue eyes of a lovely girl are as good a flag as a young soldier, in the field of love, need fight under.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

FIGHT AT BETHEL, VIRGINIA.

On the 9th General Butler dispatched a strong force to dislodge the rebels who had gathered at Bethel, on the Yorktown road, about twelve miles from Fortress Monroe. In the defence a New York Regiment and one from Alabama encountered, attacked each other for enemies, and fired upon each other, inflicting some loss. The error having been discovered, the Alabama regiment, with a large rebel force, made a sharp engagement ensued; the United States troops finally retreating, but not before they had succeeded, to carry the batteries, retained, carrying with them many prisoners—six of the latter, and one of the former. Our entire loss is about 75 killed and wounded, among whom is Lieutenant Greble, of the Regulars.

THE BATTERIES TAKEN.

A dispatch to the Herald, dated Washington, June 12, 3 P.M., says: "A special messenger arrived an hour since from Fortress Monroe, bringing the intelligence that General Butler successfully attacked with a large reinforcement to Great Bethel, and after a severe fight captured their batteries. The rebels fled, leaving masked battery of fourteen guns, and also took one thousand rebel prisoners."

THE ADVANCE ON HARPER'S FERRY.

The movement upon Harper's Ferry has fairly begun, and will soon be heard of through its results. It includes an advance from Cumberland down upon the Ferry, and is accepted by the clashing presence of Generals Butler and Patterson. The latter has a special mission to arrest the enemy from uniting its scattered forces. General Patterson is advancing from Chambersburg and Hagerstown with 10,000 men. General McClellan is advancing from Grafton with 7000 or 8000 men. And with these latitudes of the District of Columbia militia, together with two Connecticut regiments, the New Hampshire regiment, and the New York Ninth, left Washington, and united at a point three miles above Georgetown, and are advancing to a point between Point of Rocks and the Potomac, that way between Harper's Ferry and Washington.

GENERAL PATTERSON'S PROCLAMATION.

General Patterson has prepared an address for distribution among the troops at Chambersburg. After alluding to the aggressive acts of the rebels, he says: "You must bear in mind you are going for the good of the whole country, and that, while you do duty for a peaceful solution, you must protect the loyal, and, should the occasion offer, at once suppress armed opposition."

A MOVEMENT AT CAIRO.

From Cairo, we learn that General Prentiss sent on Thursday, to Camp Jackson, in Ballard's Mills, Kentucky, six miles from the former place, where the rebels had established a camp. When the troops reached the spot, however, the enemy had fled—as usual. Colonel Wickliffe rallied on General Prentiss, and pursued, on the part of Kentucky, against the occupation of her soil by Federal troops. The General assured him that he should arrest, by whatever direction, and on whatever soil the Government ordered him to march, and with this reply the rebel emissary was forced to be content.

ANOTHER BRUSH IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

The Harriet Lane has had another brush with one of the rebel batteries at Pig Point, nearly opposite Newport News, the headquarters of General Butler. She fired fifty shots and some shells at the battery, and was struck by two shots, wounding five of the crew—one rather seriously in the leg, and the others slightly.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF WASHINGTON.

It is said that the defences created by the Federal troops on the Virginia side of the Potomac, in which space, out of our New York regiments are now a part, are of a mountain kind, and extend for ten miles, from Alexandria to the Chain Bridge, surmounted with heavy batteries, a line of defense which renders Washington impregnable, and has enabled the Government to strengthen so many of the troops recently stationed there in the direction of Harper's Ferry, to carry the contemplated strategic movement in that quarter.

ANOTHER BALTIMORE OUTRAGE.

The Second Massachusetts Regiment went through Baltimore on 9th. A captain in the regiment states that a brick was thrown at a private of Company G, and that the man who struck him drew his revolver, whether he was killed or not it was not known.

TENNESSEE VOTED OUT OF THE UNION.

The vote in Tennessee last week on the secession question, so far as heard from, shows strongly in favor of secession.

UNION SENTIMENT IN VIRGINIA.

The recent action of Northwestern Virginia, appears to have wrought a change in the secession sentiment in that quarter. There are now about 7000 Federal troops stationed between Grafton and Philippi, and the best feeling existed between their and the people. It is said that a strong Union feeling predominates there. Colonel Kelly is slowly recovering from his wound, though not yet quite out of danger.

DEPLORABLE CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

A gentleman just arrived at Washington from New Orleans reports that the trade of the South is in a most deplorable condition. He states that Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas are suffering the most of any of the Southern States. In the latter provinces are becoming so scarce that the people will be in a starving condition when the blockade of New Orleans is complete.

RISING OF THE NEGROES AT RICHMOND.

The vote in Richmond city on the ordinance of secession, if it throws any thing conclusive, exhibits a complete reign of terror. There were cast in favor of the ordinance 300 votes and twenty-four against it, and among the greater number must be counted those which the soldiers who were encamped there from all parts of the State. At the Presidential election Richmond cast 2,000 votes without the aid of troops.

COTTON NOT TO COME NORTH BY RAIL.

Gideon J. Pillow, who commands the "secessers" of Tennessee, has issued general orders forbidding the transportation of cotton North by railroad, or by railroad, or by the Mississippi, Tennessee, or Cumberland River.

THE WHEELING CONVENTION.

The Wheeling Convention met on 11th. It is said to be decided that it will not attempt to organize the western from the eastern portion of the State, but will attack a Provisional Government. The first act will be to depose Governor Letcher and his kindred officers, in the place another Governor will be named, probably General Jackson, of Parkersburg; the Convention will then declare that Eastern Virginia is in rebellion against the General Government, and will call on loyal citizens to aid in restoring the Union; the Legislature chosen on the 23d of May will be declared to be illegally elected, and hence will be chosen by this Legislature. It is thought that the Convention will be the last of the most important peaceable demonstrations ever made in this country.

CAPTURE OF ARMS.

Colonel Abel Smith, of the 13th New York Regiment, on 10th, captured at Easton, Maryland, one thousand stand of arms. The rebels, however, one sloop, with a quantity of ammunition—the property of the secessionists. A private was accidentally killed by the accidental discharge of a musket.

LAST WORDS OF SENATOR DOUGLAS.

The last words of Senator Douglas's death he was waited on by the Catholic bishop, whose ministrations the dying man politely but firmly declined by the dying man, who said to him: "Sir, I respect it deeply, I will communicate with you freely." And on a subsequent occasion, when the bishop visited him in the last moments of life, the unfortunate victim to be administered, the reply was: "No; I have no fear of death. I have three things to do—to make a message to his two sons: "Tell them to obey the laws and support the Constitution of the United States."

PERSONAL.

It is related of Lord Lyons that, promenading with a beautiful American woman on the occasion of the reception of one of the Cabinet Ministers, he remarked upon the splendor of the dress, which was chaste blue silk, brilliantly spangled. "But I observe," he said, "that you have only thirty-four stars upon your dress, and there are many." "Oh no, my Lord," said the fair patriot, "the additional star is Cleaned."

The Hon. John Cochrane has been authorized to have authorized to raise a regiment of infantry, to be commanded by himself as Colonel.

Colonel Corcoran has arrived at Fort M'Henry on 19th, which he will make the head-quarters of his military district. General Schaffer has been promoted to Frederick to take command there.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL ON OUR CIVIL WAR.

In the House of Commons, on the 30th of May, Lord John Russell declared that the Government had not yet forced into the militia service at New Orleans, but that they had the power. He had obtained information, that similar circumstances of impressment, he said, had occurred in the West Indies, but that they opposed it as unauthorized, and assurance had been received from the Governors of those islands that they would not sanction such acts.

Touching his speech he also deprecated the exultation with which Sir John Ramsden had alluded to the hurrying of bodies of troops to the American shores, and he hoped the great bulk of his countrymen, America, with unprejudiced eyes, would see that the Government are deeply sensible of the friendship which has broken out in the United States, and which arose from the sentiments of the people of this country by England, and which had clung around them like a poisoned garment, in spite of the threat of their independence.

PRIVATEERS IN EUROPE.

The English Government has determined to forbid privateers of any nation to bring prizes into the ports of British ports, and France was to take a similar position.

ARMS AND MEN-OF-WAR COMING FROM ENGLAND.

Letters have been received from Major-General John C. Frémont, in London, stating that he has purchased 10,000 Enfield rifles and several batteries of rifled cannon for and will bring with him. At present he is delayed until a portion of his effects are finished. He states, further, that the Commissioners of the United States had instructions to purchase several steamers in England for the Government, but that they were delayed in getting the money; in fact, the needful had not arrived from Washington. However, he proceeded, in purchasing two steamers, for which they paid £70,000 sterling. The vessels, it appears, are to sail for a Southern port, under the British flag, and registered at Nassau, and will be used in carrying nothing contraband of war, but probably in ballast merely.

FRANCE.

GREAT UNION SENTIMENT OF AMERICANS.

The American citizens in Paris favorable to the Union breakfasted together in the Hotel du Louvre on the 20th of May. About one hundred and fifty attended, one third being ladies, including the wife of General Scott.

Mr. Cowles presided. A resolution was adopted, pledging the meeting to maintain the Union under any circumstances.

Mr. Dayton said since his arrival in Paris he could detect no sufficiently feeling for the cause of France to the United States, and certainly no French citizen would be found among the privateers.

He expressed the conviction that the rebellion would be put down.

Carolus M. Clay spoke at some length. He was energetic on the results of England, and the recognition of Southern belligerent rights. He declared if ever the flag of England became associated with the black flag of the South, the Star Spangled Banner of the United States and the tricolor of France would be seen floating over her, for France had not forgotten St. Helena.

Aaron Bretlingham spoke on the same subject.

Colonel Freemont was next called on, and was received with enthusiasm. He said he spoke with reluctance. He regretted the fanatical war, and could but feel confident that it would end in the triumph of right and justice. He had been called back to America, and lost no time in responding, and he was ready to give his best services to his country.

Rev. Dr. M'Clintock followed.

He said he did not attach any importance to the sentiments of the English press or of the Secretary of War. The people of England had not yet spoken, and when they did their voice would not be found on the side of piracy and slavery.

Captain Simmons, of the United States Army, on his way home at the commission of General Scott, Mr. Tucker, Mayor, Minister to Sweden, and Rev. Mr. Thayer also spoke.

All the speakers entertained not the slightest doubt of the final triumph of the North.

THE ELEVENTH INDIANA VOLUNTEERS SWEARING TO REMEMBER BUENA VISTA, AT INDIANAPOLIS, MAY, 1861.—SKETCHED BY MR. JAMES F. GOODRIDGE.—[SEE PAGE 389.]

REMEMBER BUENA VISTA.

ON page 388 we publish a picture of a most striking scene, which occurred at Indianapolis, in the inclosure surrounding the State Capitol, a few days since. The artist from whose sketch our picture was made, Mr. James F. Gookins, of Company I; 11th Regiment Indiana Volunteers (Zouaves), writes us as follows concerning it:

The Regiment was presented by the ladies of Indiana with a splendid stand of colors, after receiving which the whole Regiment, kneeling, with uplifted right hands, took an oath before God that, with His help, they would not only sweep themselves of the insults cast at the flag of the nation, but furthermore of the contumely and wrong received by the Indiana troops at the hands of Jeff Davis during the war with Mexico. To keep this oath more continually before them they have adopted the motto "Remember Buena Vista!" as their war-cry.

ROSS WINANS.

WE publish herewith a portrait of Mr. ROSS WINANS, of Baltimore, who was lately arrested on a charge of treason by the Federal troops. Mr. Winans is the head of the great Winans foundery and steamboat-building establishment, and is one of the leading citizens of Baltimore. He has been conspicuous in Europe as the contractor for many of the Russian railways; and made himself prominent in this country during the Crimean war by his expression of Russian sympathies. He is the inventor of the famous cigar-boat, which was illustrated in Harper's Weekly in 1858. Mr. Winans is charged with active sympathy with the rebels, though no distinct charge of treason was made against him when he was arrested, and he was consequently released.

"MAID OF THE MIST" SHOOTING THE NIAGARA RAPIDS.

WE illustrate herewith, from a sketch kindly sent us from Niagara, the perilous adventure of the far-famed Maid of the Mist. The following letter accompanied the sketch:

SUSPENSION BRIDGE, NEW YORK, June 8, 1861.

I inclose a sketch of an exciting occurrence which took place here this afternoon. It had been rumored about for some days that the well-known little steamer the Maid of the Mist had been sold to a party in Montreal, and would proceed thither via the rapids and whirlpool. This was at first looked upon as a good joke, and many were ready to stake their fortunes—firstly, that she would never start; and, secondly, that if she did, she would go to pieces before reaching the whirlpool.

However it leaked out that the attempt was to be made this afternoon, and a good number of the knowing ones were assembled on the bridge and in the vicinity.

Smoke and steam were seen rising, and this looked like earnest, although many still maintained that it was a hoax, and that it was only her first trial trip for the season. However about three o'clock the gallant little vessel shot off from her wharf, up the stream, and as suddenly headed round toward the rapids with a full head of steam on. As she neared them the excitement became intense, especially with those knowing their terrific speed and height. She met them bravely, and the first shock leveled her smoke-stack and shook every timber; but she soon righted, and spat on her way toward the whirlpool amidst the cheers of the crowd; this danger she safely passed, shooting round the head of the river out of sight.

In a wonderfully short space of time a telegraph was received saying that her brave crew had safely moored her at QUEENSTON. YOURS, R.

SENATOR DOUGLAS LYING IN STATE.

WE publish herewith a picture of THE LATE SENATOR DOUGLAS LYING IN STATE AT BRYAN HALL, CHICAGO, from a sketch kindly sent us by A. L. RAWSON, of Chicago. The following description of the scene is from the Chicago Tribune:

The appearance of the hall did great credit to the Committee. The principal feature was the erection of a large canopy heavily draped with black, relieved with a gilt border and surmounted on the centre peak, and at the four corners by gilt eagles. From the talons of the centre eagle the flag of the Union falls gracefully to the four columns supporting the canopy. At the foot of the coffin stands a broken column, emblematical of life cut off at the midst of promise and greatness; at its head stands a vase of beautifully variegated flowers.

Upon the front of the gallery the portraits of the Presidents, Mr. Healy, are festooned with black and white crape. The gallery itself is decorated with American flags. Around the middle of the stage are four large American flags looped in festoons with crape, in the centre of which hangs a portrait of Judge Douglas, painted by Healy, some fifteen years since. The front of the stage is beautifully ornamented with pots of living flowers from the Cemetery Nursery. The canopy occupies the centre of the hall. The pedestal for the reception of the coffin is dressed in black, ornamented with thirty-four stars, and placed under a canopy of black crape, trimmed with white and relieved with a gilt border, the whole surmounted by an eagle.

Beneath the canopy lay the honored remains, dressed in a full black suit. The entire lid of the burial case being removed, the whole figure was exposed. The hands were crossed upon the breast. The long and pale arms even a little taller than in life, but their expression was perfectly natural.

The body was embalmed shortly after death by the injection into the arterial system of a strong solution of arsenic, arresting the changes of nature. It will remain unaltered during its exposure at Bryan Hall.

Of the late Senator Douglas's last moments a letter says:

Soon after this, about five o'clock, he desired to have his position in bed changed, the blinds opened, and the windows raised. Mr. Rhodes lifted him to an easier posture, where he could look out upon the street, and drink in the fresh morning air. For a few moments he seemed to gain new life. Then he began to sink away; his eyes partially closed, and in slow and measured cadences, with considerable pauses between each accent, he uttered,

"Death!—Death!—Death!"

After this he seemed to revive slightly, and Mr. Rhodes asked him whether he had any message to send to his mother, or sister Sarah, or his boys, Robby and Stevie, to which he made no reply, evidently not understanding the question. Mrs. Douglas then placed her arm around his neck and said:

"My dear, do you know Cousin Dan?"

"Yes," he replied.

Mrs. Douglas continued:

"Your boys, Robby and Stevie, and your mother and sister Sarah—have you any message for them?"

The dying man replied:

"Tell them to obey the laws and support the Constitution of the United States."

At about five o'clock Dr. Miller came into the room, and, noticing the open shutters and windows, inquired,

"Why have you all these windows raised and so much light?"

Mr. Douglas replied:

"So that we can have fresh air."

At Mr. Douglas's request, Mr. Rhodes changed the dying man's position again in the bed for the last time. He now lay rather more in the middle of the bed, upon his left side, his head slightly bent forward and off the pillow. His wife sat beside him, holding his right hand in both of hers, and leaning tenderly over him, sobbing. Mr. Rhodes remarked to Mrs. Douglas:

"I am afraid he does not lie comfortable;" in reply to which Mr. Douglas said,

"He is—very comfortable."

These were his last intelligible words. From five o'clock he was speechless, but evidently retained his consciousness. When, a few moments before his death, his wife leaned lovingly over him and solemnly asked, "Husband, do you know me? will you kiss me?" he raised his eyes and smiled, and though too weak to speak, the movement of the muscles of his mouth evidenced that he was making an almost dying struggle to comply with her request.

OUR CAIRO SKETCHES.

On this page we publish a view of BIRD'S POINT, opposite Cairo, on the Mississippi, which has just been occupied, and is being fortified by the Missouri Volunteers; a picture of the ARRIVAL OF HEAVY ORDNANCE AT CAIRO; and another of the DESTRUCTION OF THE OLD DISTILLERY ON THE POINT, to make room for the new Fort Defiance. All three are from sketches of our correspondent, Mr. Alexander Simplot.

In sending us the last two he says:

CAIRO, ILLINOIS, May 31, 1861.

Inclosed please find a sketch of the heavy ordnance received at Cairo May 28, 1861. The army here have lately received three 42-pounders, three 24-pounders, a howitzer, and an 8-inch mortar, and were yesterday mounting and putting them in position. They are formidable-looking instruments, and have proved a great source of amusement among the soldiers as to their relative qualification of doing mischief. The general opinion, however, on the subject seems to be that they are "some." Naturally their arrival caused quite an excitement among the military, and a shout went up as they rolled into the place, doubtless as noisy as that they are destined to emit from their iron throats.

In connection with this, I send you another representing the demolition of the Distillery on the Point, directly at the confluence of the two rivers. This Point commands the rivers in all directions, and is to be and is now being strongly fortified. The building represented in the sketch interfering with the proposed fortifications, had to be taken down. The soldiers apparently enjoyed the fun amazingly, and working at it with a will, soon razed it with the ground.

We shall continue to keep our readers fully posted on the movements of our army at Cairo.

SERVICE AT CAMP DENNISON.

ON page 394 we publish a picture of DIVINE SERVICE AT CAMP DENNISON, OHIO, from a sketch sent us from Cincinnati. Camp Dennison is pleasantly situated among the hills skirting the Miami, on the Cincinnati and Columbus Railroad, about 18 miles from Cincinnati. There are now about 12,000 men there. Our correspondent assures us that the men seemed much subdued by the solemnity of the scene.

BIVOUAC OF REBEL TROOPS AT GENERAL BRAGG'S CAMP AT WARRINGTON, PENSACOLA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

GENERAL BRAGG'S ENCAMPMENT.

WE continue our series of Fort Pickens pictures with the accompanying view of A BIVOUAC OF CONFEDERATE TROOPS OPPOSITE PICKENS, from a photograph; and a view of the NAVY-YARD AT PENSACOLA, from a sketch by an officer in the Fort. The steamship Vanderbilt, which has just been chartered, is now taking in guns and supplies for Fort Pickens. At latest dates there appeared to be very little prospect of a battle at Fort Pickens; our troops were too strong and too well provided to fear any enterprises by General Bragg.

OUR FORTRESS MONROE PICTURES.

WE dispatched a special artist to Fortress Monroe in company with Colonel Allen's Zouaves, and from his sketches we now give, on page 396, a view of THE FORTRESS FROM A VESSEL IN THE BAY, and a view of THE HARBOR FROM FORTRESS MONROE.

Fortress Monroe, the largest fortress, indeed the only work properly entitled to that name in the United States, is now garrisoned by United States Volunteers, and Colonel Dimmick's Regulars. There must be something like 10,000 men in the Fort and encamped in the neighborhood, under Major-General Butler. To the right of the Fortress in our picture will be seen the white tents of Colonel Dupree's and Colonel Carr's Regiments, which have been under canvas since they first landed. The small steamer in the centre of the picture is towing in a prize; the flotilla of oyster boats and other craft in the left of the picture are prizes, as also is the British vessel which has struck her top-gallant masts.

The view of the Bay shows Sewell's Point and the Rip Raps, the former held by some 5000 rebels and strongly fortified; the latter occupied by General Butler.

A FAITHFUL WIFE.

OUR special artist whom we dispatched to Fortress Monroe to sketch the movements of our army in that section, has sent us a sketch which we reproduce on page 397. The subject is best described in our artist's words:

On Wednesday morning I discovered a woman on the upper deck of the steamer in the attitude represented in the sketch. She had been but a short time married, and not willing to part with her husband—a member of Colonel Allen's Zouaves—she had followed him on board. I took the chaplain (Rev. Mr. Jones) to her. He provided her with more comfortable quarters, and reported the case to Col. Allen, who has treated her, as is his way with every one, with great kindness. She now sadists about the camp.

ACTION AT ACQUIA CREEK BETWEEN UNITED STATES VESSELS AND REBEL BATTERIES.—[SKETCHED BY LIEUTENANT CASH DURING THE ACTION.]

BOMBARDMENT OF ACQUIA CREEK.

We publish herewith, from a sketch by Mr. THOMAS M. CASH, of the Freeborn, a picture of the recent engagement between the Pawnee, Freeborn, and the Anacosta on one side, and the Acquia Creek batteries on the other. Mr. CASH was engaged in the battle, and his sketch may be relied on. The following account of the battle may serve to explain it:

On Saturday the fight, which was temporarily abandoned for want of ammunition on board the United States vessels on Friday, was resumed at half past eleven o'clock in the morning, and continued until half past four that afternoon without intermission. The guns in the rebel batteries mounted on the heights had been removed to the beach during the previous night, and upon that point the fire of Saturday was directed by the Freeborn, Anacosta, and Pawnee, which hauled inshore, and kept up an incessant fire for five hours, until the men were worn out from fatigue. Captain Ward reports that upward of a thousand shots were fired by the rebel batteries, and that a hundred at least struck on or close around the Freeborn, some of them damaging her hull so that she leaked considerably, and some hitting her wheel-house and shaft. The Pawnee, too, was struck frequently aloft and below, hurting both hull and rigging. On board the Anacosta was a party of twenty-two men of the New York Seventy-first Regiment, under Lieutenant Prendergast, who worked the guns gallantly. Before the firing ceased the battery on shore was silenced, and the rebels were observed flying from the spot. Fearing a landing of the men from the ships, they set fire to the freight depôt on the pier, which was entirely consumed. Several of the rebels were hurt, but whether fatally or not could not be ascertained. No one was killed on board the vessels, but the firing from the batteries shows that the guns were ably handled.

We publish likewise a fac-simile of a shot which struck the Thomas Freeborn in her action with the Acquia Creek batteries on Saturday, June 1. The shot entered the port side about 20 feet from the stern, cut off a deck beam 5 by 7, passed through a heavy knee, tearing it all to pieces, cutting off two 4-inch iron bolts, and doing various other damage. The cup at the bottom of the shot, which takes the form of the grooves of the cannon, is of soft wrought iron. The shot is exactly twice the size of our picture.

With regard to the performance of the Pawnee, a letter says:

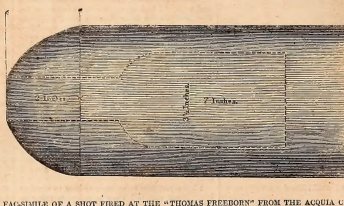
The Pawnee was fought with admirable skill, the perfect coolness of the men and officers, even as they always are on shipboard, the rapidity of her fire, stamped her, as far as her personnel is concerned, as a first-class fighting ship, unfit for any thing. Her exposed machinery and vulnerable points are well known to the enemy, and particularly Lieutenant Simms, who was frequently on board of her in Washington, two months since, and is now at Acquia. This was evident from their fire being directed to her stack, around which are the steam chests, all above deck, and at the forward ends, where there are other points not necessary to mention. The First Lieutenant of the Pawnee, Lieut. Lowry, had not forgotten his experience in the old Saratoga at Sept. 29 last, but was constantly on the move.



FAC-SIMILE OF A SHOT FIRED AT THE "THOMAS FREEBORN" FROM THE ACQUIA CREEK BATTERIES—HALF THE ACTUAL SIZE.

OUR ARTIST OVERHAULED AT MEMPHIS.

OUR artist, Mr. DAVIS, whose name has been brought prominently before the public by Wm. H. RUSSELL, LL.D., of the London Times, met with an unpleasant adventure on his return from New Orleans. On his arrival at Memphis, Tennessee, he was waited upon by the Vigilance Committee, who inquired, after the fashion of those bodies, who he was, where he came from, what he was doing, where he was going, and whether he didn't need any hanging. Having obtained answers to these various queries, the Committee then proceeded to inspect Mr. Davis's trunk, which they overhauled with commendable thoroughness. Finding at the bottom of the trunk a number of sketches made for us, they examined them minutely, and each member, by way of remembering Mr. Davis, pocketed two or three of the most striking. As the only revenge Mr. Davis could take on these polite highway robbers, he sketched them in the act of despoiling him, and we reproduce the picture on page 394.

THE NATIONAL ZOUAVES.

ON page 391 we publish a picture of the NATIONAL ZOUAVES (Tenth New York Volunteers), Colonel M'Cheney commanding, at their late quarters on Sandy Hook. This fine body of men, after many vexatious delays, finally left this city, in the State of Georgia, for Fortress Monroe, on June 6. The following is a full list of the officers:

Line Officers—Colonel, W. W. M'Cheney; Lieutenant-Colonel, Alexander B. Elder; Major, John W. Marshall; Adjutant, T. M. Patrick; Quarter-master, James Biddle; Assistant-Quarter-master, J. B. Chapman; Surgeon, Dr. J. Lovejoy; Paymaster, Aaron Seeley; Commissary, Marshall B. Shaw; Chaplain, Rev. W. B. Matchett.

Company A—Captain, Frank White; First Lieutenant, Alfred Chamberlain; Ensign, James C. Jones.

Company B—Captain, James Fairman; First Lieutenant, Robert A. Dimick; Ensign, Thomas Cuilhene.

Company C—Captain, Thomas J. Lauther; First Lieutenant, Wm. Lee Monaghan; Ensign, vacant.

Company D—Captain, Thomas Chesbley; First Lieutenant, John Minor; Ensign, Volney Wright.

Company E—Captain, John Minding; First lieutenant, Edgar A. Brown; Ensign, Daniel Finley.

Company F—Captain, S. Winchester; First Lieutenant, Rufus Farnsworth; Ensign, Thomas D. Mosscroft.

Company G—Captain, Joseph Newbright; First Lieutenant, Frank G. Stott; Ensign, vacant.

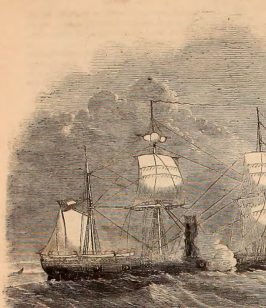
Company H—Captain, George F. Hopper; First Lieutenant, Eugene F. Roberts; Ensign, Theodore H. Rogers.

Company I—Captain, James H. Briggs; First Lieutenant, Thomas Wilder; Ensign, George M. Dewey.

Company J is an engineer corps, in command of Sergeant Wm. H. Johnson, and is, according to regulations, the right flank company of the regiment. This company numbers 80 men.

The encampment on Sandy Hook was thus described by a visitor:

The regiment has been encamped on a small island at the mouth of Shrewsbury River, about thirty miles below the city. The island is a mass of white sand, wholly destitute of vegetation, except a few stunted trees which grow near its centre. A large lighthouse and three or four frame buildings are erected upon it, and these are now used as barracks for the troops. The air is very pure, coming directly from the sea, and its bracing effects have added much to the health and vigor of the men. The bath facilities are most excellent, and are daily appreciated—both officers and men availing themselves of the opportunity afforded for delightful sea-bathing. As an accompaniment to the drilling of recruits the place can scarcely be excelled, the only drawback being the sand, which in some places permits them to sink too deep for quick movements. The troops have, however, made great proficiency in marching, manœuvring, combinations, and evolutions. They have not yet been fully supplied with rifles, but by drilling in squads this imperfection in their progress in that branch of their exercises has been overcome. The uniforms are the ordinary Zouave costume, the jacket and pants being of blue pilot-cloth, trimmed with red, with vest of the linen cloth.



THE "SUMTER," A REBEL SHIP OF WAR.—(SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.)

THE "SUMTER."

ABOVE we give a picture of the Sumter, a vessel of war belonging to the Southern Confederacy. She is the old Marquez de la Habana which was captured by our fleet off Vera Cruz in April, 1860, and taken as a prize to New Orleans. We published a picture of her in the Weekly at that time. The secessionists have fitted her out, and are using her as a vessel of war. She will probably be caught ere long by one of our cruisers. Our picture is from a sketch by Mr. Davis, who has just returned from the South.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

PUTTING Miss Havisham's note in my pocket, that it might serve as my credentials for so soon reappearing at Satis House, in case her waywardness should lead her to express any surprise at seeing me, I went down again by the coach next day. But I alighted at the Halfway House, and breakfasted there, and walked the rest of the distance; for I sought to get into the town quietly, by that unfrequented ways, and to leave it in the same manner.

The best light of the day was gone when I passed along the quiet echoing courts behind the High Street. The nooks of ruin where the old monks had once had their refectories and gardens, and where the strong walls were now pressed into the service of humble sheds and stables, were almost as silent as the old monks in their graves. The cathedral chimes had at once a sadder and a more remote sound to me, as I hurried on avoiding observation, than they had ever had before; so, the swell of the old organ was borne to my ears like funeral music; and the rooks, as they hovered about the grey tower and swung in the bare high trees of the priory-garden, seemed to call to me that the place was changed, and that Estella was gone out of it forever.

An elderly woman whom I had seen before as one of the servants who lived in the supplementary house across the back court-yard opened the gate. The lighted candle stood in the dark passage within, as of old, and I took it up and ascended the staircase alone. Miss Havisham was not in her own room, but was in the larger room across the landing. Looking in at the door, after knocking in vain, I saw her sitting on the hearth in a ragged chair, close before, and lost in the contemplation of, the ashy fire.

Dying as I had often done, I went in, and stood, touching the old chimney-piece where she could see me when she raised her eyes. There was an air of utter loneliness upon her that would have moved me to pity though she had willfully done me a deeper injury than I could charge her with. As I stood compassionating her, and thinking how in the progress of time I too had come to be a part of the wrecked fortunes of that house, her eyes rested on me. She stared, and said in a low voice, "Is it real?"

"It is I, Pip. Mr. Jaggers gave me your note yesterday, and I have lost no time."

"Thank you. Thank you."

As I brought another of the ragged chairs to the hearth and sat down I remarked a new expression on her face, as if she were afraid of me.

"I want," she said, "to pursue that subject you mentioned to me when you were last here; and to show you that I am not all stone. But perhaps you can never believe, now, that there is any thing human in my heart?"

When I said some reassuring words, she stretched out her tremulous right hand, as though she were going to touch me; but she recalled it again before I understood the action, or knew how to receive it.

"You said, speaking for your friend, that you could tell me how to do something useful and good. Something that you would like done, is it not?"

"Something that I would like done, very, very much."

"What is it?"

I began explaining to her that secret history of the partnership. I had not got far into it when I judged from her look that she was thinking in a discursive way of me rather than of what I said. It seemed to be so, for when I stopped speaking many moments passed before she showed that she was conscious of the fact.

"Do you break off," she asked then, with her former air of being afraid of me, "because you hate me too much to bear to speak to me?"

"No, no," I answered, "how can you think so, Miss Havisham! I stopped because I thought you were not following what I said."

"Perhaps I was not," she answered, putting a hand to her head. "Begin again, and let me look at something else. Stay! Now tell me."

She set her hands upon her stick in the resolute way that sometimes was habitual to her, and looked at the fire with a strong expression of forcing herself to attend. I went on with my explanation, and told her how I had hoped to complete the transaction out of my means, but how in this I was disappointed. That part of the subject (I reminded her) involved matters which could form no part of my explanation, for they were the weighty secrets of another.

"So!" said she, assenting with her head, but not looking at me. "And how much money is wanting to complete the purchase?"

I was rather afraid of stating it, for it sounded a large sum. "Nine hundred pounds."

"If I give you the money for this purpose, will you keep my secret as you have kept your own?"

"Quite as faithfully."

"And your mind will be more at rest?"

"Much more at rest."

"Are you very unhappy now?"

She asked this question, still without looking at me, but in an unwonted tone of sympathy. It could not escape the moment for my voice failed me. She put her left arm across the crutched head of her stick, and softly laid her forehead on it.

"I am far from happy, Miss Havisham; but I have other causes of disquiet than any you know of. They are the secrets I have mentioned."

After a little while she raised her head and looked at the fire again.

"It is noble in you to tell me that you have other causes of unhappiness. Is it true?"

"Too true."

"Can I only serve you, Pip, by serving your friend? Regarding that as done, is there nothing I can do for you yourself?"

"Nothing. I thank you for the question. I thank you even more for the tone of the question." But there is nothing."

She presently rose from her seat, and looked about the blighted room for the means of writing. There were none there, and she took from her pocket a yellow set of ivory tablets mounted in tarnished gold, and wrote upon them with a pencil in a case of tarnished gold that hung from her neck.

"You are still on friendly terms with Mr. Jaggers?"

"Quite. I dined with him yesterday."

"This is an authority to him to pay you that money to lay out at your irresponsible discretion for your friend. I keep no money here, but if you would rather Mr. Jaggers knew nothing of the matter, I will send it to you."

"Thank you, Miss Havisham; I have not the least objection to receiving it from him."

She read me what she had written, and it was direct and clear, and evidently intended to absolve me from any suspicion of profiting by the receipt of the money. I took the tablets from her hand, and it trembled again, and it trembled more as she took off the chain to which the pencil was attached and put it in mine. All this she did without looking at me.

"My name is on the first leaf. If you can ever write under my name, 'I forgive her,' though ever so long after my broken heart is dust—pray do it!"

"Oh, Miss Havisham," said I, "I can do it now. There have been ever mistakes, and my life has been a blind and thankless one, and I want forgiveness and direction far too much to be bitter with you."

She turned her face to me for the first time since she had averted it, and, to my amazement, I may even add to my terror, dropped on her knees at my feet, with her folded hands raised to me in the manner in which, when her poor heart was young and fresh and whole, they must often have been raised to Heaven from her mother's side.

To see her with her white hair and her worn face kneeling at my feet, gave me a shock through all my frame. I entreated her to rise, and got my arms about her to help her up; but she only pressed that hand of mine which was nearest to her grasp, and hung her head over it and wept. I had never seen her shed a tear before, and, in the hope that the relief might do her good, I bent over her without speaking. She was not kneeling now, but was down upon the ground.

"Oh!" she cried, despairingly. "What have I done! What have I done!"

"If you mean, Miss Havisham, what have you done to injure me, let me answer. Very little. I should have loved her under any circumstances.—Is she married?"

"Yes."

It was a needless question, for a new desolation in the desolate house had told me so.

"What have I done! What have I done!" She wrung her hands, and crushed her white hair, and returned to this cry, over and over again. "What have I done! What have I done!"

I knew not how to answer, or how to comfort her. That she had done grievous thing in taking an impressionable child to mould into the form that her wild resentment, spurned affection, and wounded pride found vengeance in, I knew full well. But that, in shutting out the light of day, she had shut out infinitely more than that, in seclusion, she had secluded herself from a thousand natural and healing influences; that her mind, brooding solitary, had grown diseased, as all minds do and must and will that reverse the appointed order of their Maker, I knew equally well. And could I look upon her without compassion, seeing her punishment in the ruin she was, in her profound unfitness for this earth on which she was placed, in the vanity of sorrow which had become a master mania, like the vanity of penitence, the vanity of remorse, the vanity of unworthiness, and other monstrous vanities that have been curses in this world?

"Until you spoke to her the other day, and until I saw in you a looking-glass that showed me what I once felt myself, I did not know what I had done. What have I done! what have I done!" And so again, twenty, fifty times over, "What have I done!"

"Miss Havisham," I said, when her cry died away, "you may dismiss me from your mind and conscience. But Estella is a different case, and if you can ever undo any scrap of what you have done amiss in keeping a part of her right nature away from her, it will be better to do that than to bemoan the past through a hundred years."

"Yes, yes, I know it. But, Pip—my dear!" There was an earnest womanly compassion for me in her new affection. "My dear! Believe this: when she first came to me, I meant to save her from misery like my own. At first I meant no more."

"Well, well?" said I. "I hope so."

"But as she grew, and promised to be very beautiful, I gradually did worse, and with my praises, and with my jewels, and with my teachings, and with this figure of myself always before her a warning to back and point my lessons, I stole her heart away and put ice in its place."

"Better," I could not help saying, "to have left her a natural heart, even to be bruised or broken."

With that Miss Havisham looked distractedly at me for a while and then burst out again, What had she done!

"If you know all my story," she pleaded, "you would have some compassion for me and a better understanding of me."

"Miss Havisham," I answered, as delicately as I could, "I believe I may say that I do know your story, and have known it ever since I first left this neighborhood. It has inspired me with great commiseration; and I hope I understand it and its influences. Does what has passed between us give me any excuse for asking you a question relative to Estella? Not as she is, but as she was when she first came here?"

She was seated on the ground, with her arms on the ragged chair, and her head leaning on them. She looked full at me when I said this, and replied, "Go on."

"Whose child was Estella?"

She shook her head.

"You don't know?"

She shook her head again.

"But Mr. Jaggers brought her here, or sent her here?"

"Brought her here."

"Will you tell me how that came about?"

She answered in a low whisper and with great caution: "I had been shut up in these rooms a long time (I don't know how long; you know what time the clocks keep here), when I told him that I wanted a little girl to rear and save from my fate. I had first seen him when I sent for him to buy this place which was mine; having read of him in the newspapers, before I and the world parted. He told me that he would look about him for such an orphan child. One night he brought her here asleep, and I called her Estella."

"Might I ask her age then?"

"About three. She herself knows nothing, but that she was left an orphan and I adopted her."

So convinced I was of that woman's being her mother, that I wanted no evidence to establish the fact in my own mind. But to any mind, I thought, the conclusion here was clear and straight.

What more could I hope to do by prolonging the interview? If I had succeeded on behalf of Herbert, Miss Havisham had told me all she knew of Estella, I had said and done what I could to ease her mind. No matter with what other words we parted; we parted.

Twilight was closing in when I went down stairs into the natural air. I crossed the yard by the woman who had opened the gate when I entered that I would not trouble her just yet, but would walk round the place before leaving. For I had a presentiment that I should never be there again, and I felt that the dying light was suited to my last view of it.

By the wilderness of casks that I had walked an long ago, and on which the rain of years had fallen since, rotting them in many places, and leaving miniature swamps and pools of water upon those that stood on end, I made my way to the ruined garden. I went all round it; round by the corner where Herbert and I had fought our battle; round by the paths where Estella and I had walked. So cold, so lonely, so dreary all!

Taking the brewery on my way back, I raised the rusty latch of a little door at the garden end of it, and walked through. I was going out at the opposite door—for there is one to open now, for the damp wood had started and swelled, and the hinges were yielding, and the threshold was cumbered with a growth of fungus—when I turned my head to look back. A childish association revived with wonderful force in the moment of the slight motion, and I fancied that I saw Miss Havisham hanging to the beam. So strong was the impression that I stood under the beam shuddering from head to foot before I knew it was a fancy—though to be sure I was there in an instant.

The remarkable stillness of the place and time, and the great terror of this illusion, though it was but momentary, caused me to feel an indescribable awe as I came out between the open wooden gates where I had once wrung my hair after Estella had wrung my heart. Passing on into the front courtyard, I was drawn sideways to call the woman to let me out at the locked gate of which she had the key, or first to go up stairs and assure myself that Miss Havisham was as safe and well as I had left her. I took the latter course and went up.

I looked into the room where I had left her, and I saw her seated in the ragged chair upon the hearth close to the fire, with her back towards me. In the moment when I was withdrawing my head to go quietly away I saw a great flaming light spring up. In the same moment I saw her running at me, shrieking, with a whirl of fire blazing all about her, and soaring at least as many feet above her head as she was high.

I had a double-caped great-coat on, and over my arm another thick coat. That I got them off, closed her, threw her down, and put them over her; that I dragged the great cloth from the table for the same purpose, and with it dragged down a heap of rottenness in the midst, and all the ugly things that sheltered there; that we were on the ground struggling madly like desperate enemies, and that the closer I covered her the more wildly she shrieked and tried to free herself; that this occurred I knew through the result, but not though any thing I felt, or thought, or knew I did. I knew nothing until I knew that we were on the floor by the great table, and that patches of tinder yet slight were floating in the smoky air, which, a moment ago, had been her faded bridal dress.

Then I looked round and saw the disturbed beetles and spiders running away over the floor, and the servants coming in with breathless cries at the door. I still held her forcibly down with all my strength, like a prisoner who might escape; and I doubt if I even knew who she was, or why we had struggled, or that she had been in flames, or that the flames were out, until I saw the patches of tinder that had been her garments no longer alight but falling in a black shower round us.

She was insensible, and I was afraid to have her moved or even touched. Assistance was sent for, and I held her until it came, as if I unreasonably fancied (I think I did) that if I let her go the fire would break out again and consume her. When I got up, on the surgeon's coming to her with other aid, I was astonished to see that both my hands were burned; for I had no knowledge of it through the sense of feeling.

On examination it was pronounced that she had received serious burns, but that they of themselves were far from hopeless; the danger lay, however, mainly in the nervous shock. By the surgeon's directions her bed was carried into that room and laid upon the great table, which happened to be well suited to the dressing of her injuries. When I saw her again, an hour afterward, she lay indeed where I had seen her strike her stick, and heard her say that she would lie one day.

Though every vestige of her dress was burned, as they told me, she still had something of her old ghastly bridal appearance; for they had covered her to the throat with white cotton-wool, and as she lay with a white sheet loosely overlying that, the phantom air of something that had been and was changed was still upon her.

I found, on questioning the servants, that Estella was in Paris, and I got a promise from the surgeon that he would write to her by the next post. Miss Havisham's family I took upon myself, intending to communicate with Mr. Matthew Pocket only, and leave him to do as he liked about informing the rest. This I did next day, through Herbert, as soon as I returned to town.

There was a stage that evening when she spoke collectedly, and was sensible of having caused a certain terrible vivacity. Toward midnight she began to wander in her speech, and after that it gradually set in that she said unintelligible things in a low, solemn voice. "What have I done? What have I done?" And then, "When she first came, I meant to save her from misery like mine." And then, "Take the pencil and write under my name, 'I forgive her!'" She never changed the order of these three sentences, but she sometimes left out a word in one or other of them; never putting in another word, but allowing a blank, and going on to the next.

As I could do no service there, and as I had, nearer home, that pressing reason for anxiety and fear which even her wanderings could not drive out of my mind, I decided in the course of the night that I would return by the early morning coach; walking as a mile or so, and being taken up clear of the town. At about six o'clock in the morning, therefore, I leaned over her and touched her lips with mine, just as they said, not stopping for being touched, "Take the pencil and write under my name, 'I forgive her.'"

It was the first and the last time that I ever touched her in that way. And I never saw her more.

CHAPTER XLIX.

My hands had been dressed twice or thrice in the night, and again in the morning. My left arm was a good deal burned to the elbow, and less severely as high as the shoulder; it was very painful, but the flames had set in that direction, and I felt thankful it was no worse. My right hand was not so badly burned than that I could move the fingers. It was bandaged, of course, but much less inconveniently than my left hand and arm; those I carried in a sling; and I could only get my coat like a cloak, loose over my shoulders and fastened at the neck. My hair had been caught by the fire, but not my head or face.

When Herbert had been down to Hammersmith and seen his father, he came back to me at our chambers and remained all day to attending on me. He was the kindest of nurses, and at stated times took off the bandages, and steeped them in the cooling liquid that was kept ready, and put them on again with a patient tenderness that I was deeply grateful for.

At first, as I lay quiet on the sofa, I found it painfully difficult, I might say impossible, to get rid of the impression of the glare of the flames, and the hurry and noise, and the fierce burning smell. If I dosed for a minute, I was awakened by Miss Havisham's cries, and by her running at me with her dress on fire. But this abated soon. This pain of the mind was much harder to strive against than my bodily pain I suffered, and Herbert, seeing that, did his utmost to hold my attention engaged.

Neither of us spoke of the boat, but we both thought of it. It was made apparent by our avoidance of the subject, and by our agreeing—without agreement—to make my recovery of the use of my hands the question of so many hours, not of so many weeks.

My first question when I saw Herbert had been, of course, what was well down the river? As he replied in the affirmative, with perfect confidence and cheerfulness, we did not resume the subject until the day was wearing away. But then, as Herbert changed the bandages, more by the light of the fire than by the outer light, he went back to it spontaneously.

"I sat with Provis last night, Handel, two good hours."

"Where was Clara?"

"Dear little thing!" said Herbert. "She was up and down with Gruffandgrim all the evening. He was perpetually pegging at the floor the moment she left his room, and I doubt if he can hold out long, though. What with rum and pepper—and pepper and rum—I should think his pegging must be nearly over."

"And then you will be married, Herbert?"

"How can I take care of the dear child otherwise?" And he put my arm out upon the back of the sofa, my dear boy, and I'll sit down here, and get the bandage off so gradually that you shall not know when it comes off. I was speaking of Provis. Do you know, Handel, he improves?"

"I said to you I thought he was softened, when I last saw him."

"So you did. And so he is. He was very communicative last night, and told me more of his life. You remember his breaking of it here about some woman that he had had great trouble with—Did I hurt you?"

I had started, for I had not under his touch. His words had given me a start.

"I had forgotten that, Herbert, but I remember now you were telling me."

"Well! He went into that part of his life, and a dark, wild part it is. Small I tell you? As he would it never be told. I was speaking of Provis. Do you know, Handel, he improves?"

"I said to you I thought he was softened, when I last saw him."

"So you did. And so he is. He was very communicative last night, and told me more of his life. You remember his breaking of it here about some woman that he had had great trouble with—Did I hurt you?"

"No-no, my dear boy. I was quaking—I mean my dear Herbert."

"Murder,—Does it strike too cold on that sensitive place?"

"I don't feel it. How did she murder? Whom did she murder?"

"Why, the dead may not have merited quite so terrible a murder," said Herbert, "but she was tried for it, and Jaggers defended her, and the reputation of that defense first made his name known to Provis. It was another and a stronger woman who was the victim, and there had been a struggle—in a barn. Who began it, or how fair it was, or how unfair, may be doubtful; but how it ended is certainly not doubtful, for the victim was found throttled."

"Was the woman brought in guilty?"

"No; she was acquitted.—My poor Handel, I hurt you!"

"It impossible to be gentler, Herbert. What else?"

"This acquitted young woman and Provis," said Herbert, "had a little child: a little child of whom Provis was exceedingly fond. On the evening of the very night when the object of her jealousy was strangled, as I tell you, the young woman presented herself before Provis for one moment, and swore that she would destroy the child (which was in her possession) and he should never see it again; then she vanished.—There's the worst arm comfortably in the sling once more, and now there remains but the right hand, which is a far easier job. I can do it better by this light than by a stronger, for my hand is steadiest when I don't see the poor blistered patches too distinctly. Don't move, for your breathing is affected, my dear boy? You seem to breathe quickly."

"Perhaps I do, Herbert. Did the woman keep her oath?"

"There comes the darkest part of Provis's life. She did."

"That is, he says she did."

"Why, of course, my dear boy," returned Herbert, in a tone of surprise, and again bending forward to get a nearer look at me. "He says it all. I have no other information."

"No, to be sure."

"Now, whether," pursued Herbert, "he had used the child's mother ill, or whether he had used the child ill, as Provis doesn't say, but she had shared some four or five years of the wretched life he described to us at this breside, and had become fond of the girl for her, and forbearance toward her. Therefore, fearing he should be called upon to depose about this desperate woman, and so be the cause of her death, he hid himself (much as he grieved for the child), kept himself dark, as he says, out of the way at the end of the trial, and was only vaguely talked of as a certain man called Abel, out of whom the jealousy arose. After the acquittal he disappeared, and thus he lost the child and the child's mother."

"I want to ask—"

"A moment, my dear boy," said Herbert, "and I have done. That evil Compeyson, the worst of scoundrels among many scoundrels, knowing of his keeping out of the way at that time, and of his reasons for doing so, of course afterward held the knowledge over his head as a means of keeping him poorer, and working him harder. It was clear last night that this barbed the point of Provis's hatred."

"I want to know," said I, "and particularly, Herbert, whether he told you what this happened?"

"Particularly? Let me remember, then, what he said as to that. His expression was, 'a round score o' year ago, and almost directly after I took up wi' Compeyson.' How old were you when you came upon him in the little churchyard?"

"I think in my seventh year."

"Ay. And you happened about four years then, he said, and you brought into his mind the little girl so tragically lost, who would have been your age."

"Herbert," said I, after a short silence, in a hurried way, "can you see me best by the light of the window, or the light of the fire?"

"By the fire-light," answered Herbert, coming close again.

"Look at me."

"I do look at you, my dear boy."

"Touch me."

"I do touch you, my dear boy."

"You are not afraid that I am in any fever, or that my head is much disordered by the accidents of last night?"

"No-no, my dear boy," said Herbert, after taking time to examine me. "You are rather excited, but you are quite yourself."

"I know I am quite myself. And the man we have in hiding down the river is Estella's Father."

In Press.

A Comprehensive and COMPLETE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, prepared under the superintendence of J. THOMAS, M.D., Editor of Lippincott's Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World.

The work will embrace notices of distinguished persons of all ages and countries, comprising a far greater number of biographies than is contained in any similar work in the language. A new and important feature will be the correct pronunciation of the names.

It is now more than ten years since the editor and his collaborators have been engaged on this important enterprise, and great care has been taken not only to render the work thoroughly accurate and reliable in all respects, but, which is a point of the greatest moment, also fully to opposition the length of the different articles to the actual importance of the subject. By making this the rule of the less prominent individuals as succinct as possible, space will be found for full and elaborate biographies of such eminent Philosophers, Poets, Statesmen, Divines, Heroes, &c., as are objects of especial interest to readers of every class.

The Editor has spent nearly three years abroad in collecting material from original sources, and besides the aid furnished by a corps of collaborators in England, he has availed himself of the best and latest European Authorities. The work will also embrace the results of the valuable and important labors of DR. WILLIAM SMITH in his new edition of the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

No man is more skeptical of new cure-alls than I. Occasionally, however, I am agreeably disappointed. A few months ago I was partially bald, and apprehensive I should become permanently so. A friend who boarded with me strongly recommended Burnett's Cocoaine for the growth of the hair, remarking, "It will make it grow whether it will or no." I used it about nine weeks, and can now boast of a luxuriant crop of hair, having cut it several times.—Ed. Philadelphia R. E. News Letter.

Strike for the old 13! Unite their hearts once more!
Hurrah for the old 13!
Tiger for the 34!

Soldiers, up and at their legions
Who our Union seek to mar,
Father foes or foreign minions—
Long must perish—Right prevail!
Sound the 34! Bear all your fathers do,
Stand by the old 13! Justify midst clamors' roar,
Charge for the old 13!
Rebels flee!

Patriots, sure to guard the ramparts
Of our proud inheritance!
Equal hearts—fellowsoldiers—true hearts,
Still our rock and sure defence!
Equal the 34! from lake to ocean's shore;
Equal the old 13! as thrilled in days of yore!
One cause the old 13;
One heart the 34!

A TEST QUESTION FOR MR. LINCOLN.

THE capture of the privateer Savannah will test Mr. Lincoln's nerve. Will he have the courage to hang the pirate captain?

In law the case is clear. The privateer was a pirate craft, and every man on board of her was guilty of piracy. It is impossible to conceive a more deliberately piratical act than the seizure of the brig Joseph, which was taken into Georgetown, South Carolina, by part of the crew of the Savannah shortly before her capture. The law declares that the penalty of piracy is death. Will the President suffer the law to take its course, or will he interfere to protect the pirates?

People are asking each other this question with no little anxiety. Merchants and shipowners, who have come forward nobly in support of the Government, are trembling in apprehension lest Mr. Lincoln should not have the nerve to carry out his policy, and crush piracy in the bud. Foreigners will decide, from Mr. Lincoln's action in this case, whether the President's proclamations are in earnest or mere brag-a-boos.

It is a question of nerve merely. The rebels threaten to retaliate upon Northern men if we hang their pirates. But they are already hanging every Northern man they can find—while we are actually liberating the scoundrels who fire upon our pickets, on condition that they swear allegiance to the United States. What worse can they do?

We incline to the belief that as the United States army advances into Virginia, the rebels will be chary of using the halter in a public way. The more sagacious among them must begin to see by-and-by that the fate of all or a few of the secessionist leaders will be in the hands of the United States Government. What that fate would be, if the threatened "retaliation" were attempted, they can readily infer.

☞ We have received TROW'S City Directory, as full as usual; an indispensable work for every counting-house and store.

☞ BACHMAN'S Birds-eye View of the Seat of the War in the West is an excellent sheet, and gives a very good idea of the relative positions of the rebel and United States forces.

THE LOUNGER.

THEODORE WINTHROP.

THE blood of the heroes who fall in this war for liberty and humanity consecrates to the work every man who remains. Our brothers who have marched before us are encamped upon the field; and we, whose turn has not yet come, are but encamped upon our hearthstones. Yet the rot hand that strikes one camp wounds the other. The soldiers fall, but the homes suffer. They suffer, but they do not shrink. They are the nurseries of that patriotism in which this wild conspiracy had no faith. They cheer their children, and send them forth with smiles in their eyes and victory in their hearts. They have counted the cost.

"We will beneath the furnace blast
The pangs of transformation;
Not painlessly doth God roast
And mould sane the nation."

Such homes, such soldiers, make the terrible armies; for they know what they fight for, and they fight through death to victory. They know how fearful war is; but they know also how holy, and wise, and imperative it may be. And whether after many years and long service they return old men, wounded and weary, or whether they fall in the very opening of the struggle and in the bright flush of their own youth, the same love, and glory, and honor follow them, and their names are sweet and blessed forever.

Such a soldier fell in the action at Great Bethel when Theodore Winthrop, an aid and military secretary of General Butler, sank mortally wounded. What quiet heroism, clear intelligence, steadfast faith, generous hope, thoughtful enthusiasm, tempered by singular coolness, skill, wide experience, and personal bravery, which would as surely have made his name shine in this war as they had already advanced him, are lost with him to his country; only the friends who knew him very intimately can know. And even then will remain the knowledge and the hallowed memory of the stainless candor, ready humor, shrewd sympathy, heroic reticence, and manifoldness of powers, with his various cultivation and sagacious observation in much travel, make him so charming and beloved a companion. He had the Yankee tact which is never at fault in practical life; and, with a romantic courage, a deep poetic refinement of nature which inspired him into literary ambition, and made him a lover of art and the friend of artists.

Those who knew him truly counted among their friends few men so esteemed as he. But, partly from ill health, partly from temperament, a dreamy sadness overhung his life and dispirited his efforts. Glad of his friend's success, and conscious of the kindred impulse, he still wistfully delayed. Of great industry and restless endeavor, he saw across him as it seemed to be waiting in melancholy patience the rising of a happier star. It has risen at last, and shines upon his grave.

On the Tuesday afternoon the fatal day of Sumter he was walking with a friend in the woods upon Staten Island, near his home. No man could have a clearer conception of the momentous issue of the event. An American in the noblest sense, he felt that the time had come in which our liberties could be maintained only by the sword in the hand of every man. "To-morrow," said his friend, "we shall have a proclamation from the President." "Then to-morrow," he answered, "I shall enlist." And he did so. If he had hesitated before there could be no hesitation now. Mother, sisters, brother, farewell! It is God who calls in the voice of my country.

With his brother he marched among the first soldiers from New York, and was one of the first to be engaged in battle. The passionate enthusiasm of that departure is best told in his own story of it; and of all those thousands who went to be murdered in Baltimore's unrest with steady step, amidst a tumult of shouts and sobs and prayers and blessings, to an expected ambuscade of bullets, he the first was the first to meet the death which each one of them heroically awaited.

Writing from Camp Cameron early in May to the same friend, he says: "I wish to enroll myself at once in the police of the nation, and for life, if the nation will take me. It is not for me to say I can put myself—experience and character—to any more useful use." In this spirit he acted, and such was his evident ability that in a month he was aid and military secretary to General Butler, and held at his disposal a first lieutenancy in the army. The success of his paper in the Atlantic, and the kind and friendly notices of my life, induced to his friends that his public career was opening just as he would have it. To him the cause to which he gave his life was that of mankind, and was worth all it might cost.

"Fellow-soldier," he writes again, "what do you think now of the quality of our trade? It seems that the world can not do without us. It is shabby that mankind will not keep the peace by decree. But I suppose, as it is, the peace gone by, that your beloved country was civilized? Did you fancy that vi et armis was obsolete? And are all our fellows idle fences? Are we not assisting at the dying agonies of Bellona."

Again he says: "As to the threatened guerrilla warfare, have no fear of it. The Virginians are not Spaniards or Swiss. They are not united, and they have their slaves always in the rear to be guarded. Did I suppose, as is possible in a country like this. There are no Pyrenees or Alps to defend. Our flankers and skirmishers will take care of all the fellows in the fences. As for burned villages, a dozen guerrillas hung, one scouring skirmish or battle will pacify a whole State. Under all discipline and degree of zeal, every regiment in an army the South may fight; but they will not have moral conviction enough to risk their separate lives except in assassination, and those a few sharp examples will terminate. We heard their threats at Annapolis. We heard also the pitiful plaints of the timid who believed the threats. No, if we are patient and well led, we shall do our work without much massacre."

In the same letter he adds, in the most characteristic strain: "I have fun. I get experience. I see much. It pays. As $? But in three fair days of May I miss my States Island. My sire stirs the pulse; but it wounds a little all the time."

A few hours before the expedition left Fort Monroe he wrote: "If I do not come back, give my dearest love to all." So, also, by a sad and curious coincidence, the last words of his paper in the sympathetic number of the Atlantic whose significance no one more fully apprehended than he—are "Good-by, every body!"

The expedition left Fort Monroe and the camps at midnight on Sunday, June 9. Adjutant Schaffner of the Seventh (volunteers) says:

"I made a reconnoissance with Major Winthrop about 12 o'clock in the day, and can testify to his bravery and daring. He was very much exhausted, having wanted for sleep, food, and water, and the day had turned out very hot. We stuck our heads out of some underbrush, and instantly there was a perfect shower of balls rained upon us, which compelled us to withdraw a few paces. Major Winthrop laid himself behind a tree, saying if he could only sleep for five minutes he would be all right. He remarked, as he did this, that he was going to see the inside of that intrenchment before he went back to the fortress—his manner being that of cool, ordinary conversation. He continued self-possessed and cool throughout the whole engagement, up to the time when he received his death-wound, which happened at the time of Lieutenant Hetherington, Company E, who remained with him, and cared for him until life had fled. He was shot in the side."

says:

"The gallantry of Major Winthrop is the subject of universal admiration with both the Federal and the rebel forces. The rebel troops, on the pits before the Bethel battery state that they several times took deliberate aim at him, as he was all the time conspicuous at the head of the advancing Federal troops, but they could not hit the scoundrel."

Eighty-six years ago, on the day on which these words are written, Joseph Warren fell, "last in the trenches," upon Bunker Hill. He gave gladly his heart's-blood to gain the peace of liberty for his country. Not less gladly fell Theodore Winthrop to secure that holy peace; nor with less honor be his name remembered. Farewell, brave heart! Farewell, manly soul! By such sharp pange is the nation born again. In blood so costly are her sins washed away!

WHAT WILL CONGRESS DO?

THE next question is, What will Congress do? It is very clear what it should do. The amplest authority should be given to the Administration to carry on a vigorous and overwhelming campaign. Either that, or the Slave-conspiracy should be acknowledged.

There has been some feeble talk of what is called compromise. Compromise with what? An incendiary in tryin to set the house in which your family is sleeping, and you have him within range of your rifle. He proposes compromise. If you will let him stand there with his weapon and matches, he will agree for the moment not to kindle your house. No, no. For that reckless and cruel assassin there is but one compromise. You will shoot him as he crouches, or hand him over to justice. In either case his doom is sure.

For this reason the only position, which began in perjury and robbery and is continued in desperation, there can be, and there will be, no other compromise than absolute surrender, and then the course of justice.

A great nation is peacefully pursuing its career. Under a Government of singular wisdom and adaptability to every event, its flag is every where respected; its name is the synonym of power; its people enjoy a general well-being unprecedented in history; its position secludes it from the contagion of other national troubles; by the quiet operation of its laws every year is eliminating the defects of its own system; so that, in the lapse of a few years, every man should be secured in the enjoyment of every right that any law or society can protect; when, suddenly, without the pretense that any law or right has been violated, that any injury has been done to the person or the property of the citizens, a large body of people, led by men who, sitting in the seats of lawful authority, have conspired to overthrow the system by which they hold the personal control, appear in arms against the Government. They steal its property, its ships, its arsenals, munitions of war, mints, and forts; they fire upon its flag; they murder its loyal citizens; they send emissaries to corrupt the opinion of other nations; they destroy the national prosperity; they impoverish the individual citizen; they cover the name of the country with doubt and disgrace; they threaten the existence of the Government, to subvert the foundations of all peaceful society; they cruelly destroy private happiness and public peace, and they overshadow the land into the bitter, bloody horrors of war, and then, when the nation, springing from its paralysis of consternation and astonishment, gathers its strength to the tremendous impulse which thrills from its Atlantic to its Pacific nerves, startling the whole frame into a majesty of power which none its hand to cleave the barbarous, wanton, wicked conspiracy asunder, the leaders, both outside and inside its camps, begin to talk of compromise.

If any word justly stinks in the nostrils of this nation, it is the word Compromise. Because it is a principle which has been founded in common sense, that we must do what we can, not what we would, it seems to be assumed that we must do something of the kind in this case. Because it is impossible to conquer, and thing we can do is to compromise? Is the obedience of the citizens of the United States to the Government a question of compromise? The moment the Government treats with traitors it surrenders to treason and subverts itself.

And with what and whom will you compromise? With the faction that carried the Missouri bargain under the pressure of force? Do you say the bargain would have kept the peace if it had not been broken? But why was it broken? Because there was not power in the bond which derived all its advantage from it. And it is precisely that side—which holds, in regard to the Free States of this Union, the position which the Second toward the Netherlands, No faith with heretics—which now begins to whisper compromise.

The Administration which contends for the control of this Government against the mass of the free citizens, and which takes up arms to recapture that control when it lawfully loses it, has always carried its point under the mask of compromise. When the Missouri bill was passed, John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, sadly conceded that the oligarchy had conquered. William Pinkney wrote exultingly home in the same strain. The oligarchy politely bowed, and called victory compromise.

And they have always done it. Compromise, in the history of the United States, means in the Slave States victory, and in the Free States surrender. What has been the object of this kind of compromising? To prevent the slave oligarchy from taking up arms to dissolve the Union. But they have done it. They are armed now, and moving. They have spit upon the flag. They have murdered our loyal brothers. They have torn the sore spot and canker ever since we were a nation. They have humiliated us abroad. They have disgraced us at home. They now ask us to set the question at once and forever. Let us prove the scope of the threat. Let us understand whether the Government of this nation exists by the sufferance of any faction in the country, or whether it is able to crush treason and punish traitors.

ADAMS AND CALHOUN.

IN Josiah Quincy's "Memoir of John Quincy Adams" there is a great deal of most interesting detail of conversations between Calhoun and Adams which throw a very singular portraiture.

One day, during the debate upon the Missouri bill, Mr. Calhoun remarked to Mr. Adams that he did not see how the slave question, then pending in Congress, would produce a dissolution of the Union; but if it should, the South would, from necessity, form alliances, offensive alliances and defensive, with Great Britain. Mr. Adams asked if that would not be returning to the old colonial state. Calhoun said, "Yes, pretty much; but it would be forced upon them."

Mr. Adams inquired whether he thought if, by the effects of the slave question, the people of the North should be cut off from its natural outlet upon the ocean, it would fall back upon its rocks, bound hand and foot, to the mercy of the South or would retain its power of locomotion to move Southward by land.

Mr. Calhoun replied that in the latter event it would be necessary for the South to make their communities all military.

Mr. Adams pursued the conversation no further, but remarked, "If the dissolution of the Union should result from the slave question, it is as obvious as any thing that can be foreseen of futurity that it must shortly afterward be followed by a universal emancipation of the slaves. A more remote, but perhaps not less certain consequence would be the extirpation of the African race on this continent by the gradually bleaching process of intermixture, where the white is always predominant, and the destructive process of emancipation, which, like all great religious and political reformations, is terrible in its means, though happy and glorious in its end."

ANOTHER VOICE.

IN a time like this every man who has the opportunity of speaking to the public is recreant if he does not swell the universal and indignant chorus which demands that the costly lives of American citizens shall not be sacrificed to the criminal blunders of imbecile commanders. The Government is no more justified in appointing city politicians and country lawyers to high military commands than it would be in sending lieutenants and captains of the regular army to argue abstruse legal cases before the courts. War is a science. It is not a question of personal bravery, but of strategic skill. It is a science which, like every other, has to be studied only by devoted study; and lawyers and politicians are no more likely to be adepts in it than chemists or tailors.

Look at the case. Here is a formidable rebellion organized against the Government. It is in the hands of men who have controlled that Government for many years. It establishes, first of all, a military despotism. It silences the press. It seals every opposing mouth. It is encamped upon a vast area, and has stolen the most valuable military property and advantages from the United States. It appoints to important commands only experienced officers. Brigadier-General Floyd may call for arms in obscure quarters; but Beauregard and able officers direct the essential movements in critical points. The conspiracy works silently and secretly and swiftly. Its sole hope of temporary success lies in the bold dash it may make; and instead of confronting it upon the Florida Keys or the remote Gulf shore, the Government of the United States is instead before its front, quietly, digesting its very seat upon the Potomac with the rebels.

That Government, to insure speedily the victory which it must finally achieve, requires only three conditions—and it has them all at command—

First, it wants plenty of money;

Second, Plenty of men;

Third, Plenty of skilled leaders.

It has all of these, if it chooses. If three hundred thousand men are wanted, they are ready and anxious to march. If more money is wanted, people will be pinched, but it shall be had. And for leaders, there is not a second lieutenant in the army who would not have gone out and hung himself had he commanded at Great Bethel.

It is true that our Government depends upon volunteers. But then volunteers are our army; the army with which we must carry on war; and war is still a science. If, therefore, the volunteer officers are unacquainted with it, skilled officers must be substituted before the men are allowed to go into action. Otherwise the army is demoralized, and defeated before the battle begins. What man hereafter could do his best under the unfortunate General Pierce? But hereafter every inexperienced civilian is a General Pierce to his soldiers. A man may be intelligent, energetic, prompt, courageous, and of great executive skill. These are excellent gifts, but they can not take the place of scientific knowledge. They must be combined with military science before they can fit a man to be a general or a colonel. Just as the finest voice must be united with legal knowledge before a man can be a lawyer.

Of course in such an emergency as this many a civilian will prove to be an able officer. Thank God for it. But don't assume it. A man may have grown gray as Brigadier-General of State militia. The chance is that he can sit safely on his horse at a parade, if the horse has been trained to it. But don't send him into the field with the flower of the men and heroism of the army at his command until he has shown his ability. Send any regularly trained lieutenant, if the general be not proved. Who does not know that if Grolle had been in command our history would not have been darkened by the deplorable day at Great Bethel?

THE VERACITY OF TRAITORS.

How many faithful citizens of the United States, intelligent, industrious, honorable, who gladly give their fortunes and lives to the defense of the Government, must be butchered in this war before the Government stops palavering with traitors and hugs them? They are caught in the act, as at Fairfax Court House. Loyal citizens are shot by them, as at Great Bethel. The progress of the country is paralyzed, and its position among nations put in doubt, and after swearing to be loyal the traitors are allowed to return to their treason, and carry information to make that treason more fatally effective. In the Public Departments it is openly asserted that officers are retained who serve the country which pays them, and which they have sworn to uphold, by giving information to the enemy. In Baltimore and Missouri men are arrested as traitors and allowed to go upon bail, although its treason is capital crime. A privateer is taken and brought into port, and every body knows that the officers and crew will escape. Every infernal art of treason is employed by the rebels. The citizens among them who are faithful to their country are at the mercy of a barbarous mob. The flower of the youth, and heroism, and patriotism of the country, in the persons of Ellsworth, of Greble, of Winthrop, of the Massachusetts martyrs at Baltimore and elsewhere, and all the heroes from all the States, fall under the murderous hand of the traitors, and still it is only necessary that a rebel should die, and his life is safe.

Has it occurred to the authorities at Washington who perform this melancholy farce of administering an oath to traitors taken in arms, that a man who would gladly cut down his neighbor because he is a patriot would cheerfully tell a lie to save himself? If Jefferson Davis should ride into Washington one bright morning, and say that he had always been sorry, and would like to forget and forgive, would he be arrested, tried, and hung, or politely invited to dinner?

The correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser, one of the ablest and most loyal of journals, writes from Washington on the 16th of June: "An agent of Governor Wise, who came to the city two days ago from Richmond, and left for there yesterday by way of Manassas Junction, informs me," etc.

Will this correspondent explain how he justifies himself in not causing the arrest of this agent?

The correspondent says to the Secretary of War: Wise employs men to visit the city, and report to him and Davis. "After making themselves fully acquainted with what is going on here, they obtain a pass from the authorities which enables them to pass beyond our pickets and to the Confederate camp."

The story is particularly fatal, and yet is there any thing in the treatment of traitors taken in the act which makes it very improbable? Since Washington is a camp, why is not martial law practiced?

INVOLUNTARY SPIES.

If there were several enterprising newspapers in Richmond, and every morning they contained detailed accounts of all that had been done the day before and was to be done on the morrow, and the papers were sent to us publicly, as long as the mails would carry them, and privately afterward, we should all feel that we had most valuable allies in Richmond, and that the newspapers, at least, were loyal to the Union, proving it by revealing the movements and plan of the enemy.

It is just as true the other way; up to the first of June, when the mail stopped, the Northern papers paid agents for collecting news for the rebels, and the Government carefully transmitted it to them. At the present time Jefferson Davis has his spies and agents in all the Northern cities, and all the facts in regard to the intentions of the Government which any reporter of any paper can discover, is promptly sent to him.

The Government is very properly annoyed by all this, and will doubtless take measures to keep its own secrets. The reporters, on the other hand, are indignant, and mean at the feeling of the Government. The Tribune says that any gentlemanly reporter who was asked not to convey important intelligence would obey the request. Probably; but the Government can not stop to ask Tom, Dick, and Harry not to telegraph this or that thing, and, moreover, the reporter is a young person as an ungentlemanly reporter. Does the Tribune suppose, for instance, that his excellency the minister of the United States to Portugal would hesitate to tell what he had discovered whether asked to hold his tongue or not?

Every great invention has its disadvantages. It is the law of compensation. It is a fine thing to have all the news and more. It is undoubtedly the business of newspapers to furnish the news. But it is also the business of newspapers not to help the enemy; and if one of the sacrifices we must make at this time is giving up the knowledge of what is going to be done for the knowledge of what is done, it is not the severest sacrifice that can be made.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LINES BY A COCKNEY.

ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG LADY.

Sweet hangel, whom I met last here
Has likes to me
I hope that you will give me leave
A question now to pop.

I mind her now when in the 'all
Your curlings was bamounced,
You looked so like a mayden fair indeed,
Hon which with 'ante I pounced.

Then hanger to your Ma you ran,
She anxious to be gone,
I hasn't or call you Mary-Hann,
Or hadies 'ere Mari-Ann.

Now, Mary-Hann's a name I 'ate
Has much as Betsy-Jane,
I could not bear to link my fate
With such a name as hit is hame;

But Mari-hon I like as well
As hany name I know;
Then, hangel, I implore you tell,
Post spell it with a He?

THE ADVANTAGE OF STUTTERING.—A young author (we will not mention names) has the lining of his hat completely blackened with ink. He is wonder was the depots could have got there, because authors do not generally carry their inkstands under their hats, when a wag present, who stuttered (and if he hadn't stuttered, he could not have made the remark) suggested that "probably it might be the result of th-th-inking?"

IT'S JUST LIKE THEM CONCEIT!—"Women," says a literary Herald, "might have some reason to be proud of being the more beautiful half of the human race, if the other half were not undoubtedly ugly."

THE RICHEST DISH IN THE WORLD.—The "Weal" of Fortune.

FASHIONABLE OBSTRUCTION.—The enormous amplitude which female dresses have attained to is productive of peculiar inconvenience to pedestrians, especially ladies, walking through fields and lanes. Owing to the present width of styles, it takes a little woman five minutes to get through a great gate.

THREE DEGREES OF COMPARISON.—Bet, Better, Best left alone.

HOT weather frequently has the effect of making many good-tempered persons extremely choleric, for which due allowance should be made. It is not natural that a person who has been for hours exposed to a broiling hot sun should exhibit the strongest desire at the first opportunity to take umbrage?

THE JUST AND HOLY CAUSE OF SLAVERY.

[From Punch.]

"We feel," says President Jefferson Davis, in his Message to the Secessional Congress, "that our cause is just and holy." Could any one be more frank? Sure, probably, if they rose against their masters, say just as much, with at least equal justice, for their own insurrection? The less Mr. Davis says about justice and holiness the better, if he does not want to make dangerous disclosures, before being comforted a humbug. "Dash holiness, and justice be blanked!" is the consolatory language for Mr. Jefferson Davis. "Might is right; we expect to thrash the Northerners; and the Institution of Slavery forever!"

A woman may speak as many tongues as she will, but she'll not be a Queen Bess for one of her own.

MRS. ROBINSON (the widow of the eminent professor of natural philosophy) invited a gentleman to dinner, who accepted, with the following note: "I am expected—but if, week, if you're dead, I'll no expect yo," replied the widow.

GOVERNOR MAGOFFIN'S-NEUTRALITY BIRDS holding the COCK OF THE WALK (Uncle Sam) while THE CONFEDERATE CAT (Jeff Davis) kills off his Chickens.

The following anecdote is going the rounds of the French papers. The actors are a lady and a physician, the celebrated Professor Pierry, well known to medical men all over the world. The doctor was recently summoned to the mansion of a duchess, and hastened to obey the call, which was of an imperative nature. He was forthwith introduced into the boudoir of the lady, who, with tears in her eyes, pointed to a hideous little monkey, decked with costly finery, and writhing in great apparent pain, upon an elegant velvet cushion. The doctor, at first hurt and humiliated by the lamb-like appearance of his patient, but unquestionably, and gravely proceeded to fulfill his professional duty. After a minute examination, the doctor divined the cause of the animal's distress; then, noticing a child of the duchess crawling upon the floor, he took it up, felt its pulse, and coolly said to the lady, "Madame, your two sons are suffering from indigestion. Give them tea to drink, and restrict them for a few days to a simple diet. No other prescription is necessary." And, making a polite bow to the duchess, Pierry departed, leaving the duchess in a state of wonder, astonishment, and rage, easy to imagine, but utterly impossible to describe.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EVACUATION OF HARPER'S FERRY.

THE REBELS DESTROY THE ARMORY.—They burned down the bridge across the Potomac, about a mile above the Ferry, on the bridge connecting at Martinsburg and Shepardstown were also set on fire. The Government buildings were all destroyed, except the arsenal, its machinery having been removed into the interior a few days ago. All the barracks and troops have been withdrawn from the Maryland side. Fearing a sudden attack the rebels threw a large force of provisions into the river. The garrison, to the number of between ten and twelve thousand, marched to Leesburg and Winchester, thus indicating that they intended to meet our forces, should action, where, no doubt, a grand stand will be made. The Ferry is now entirely in the United States troops. General Patterson's division and Colonel Stone's command are both at or near it.

STATE OF AFFAIRS AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Latest advices from Fort Monroe state that the rebels are landing in considerable force at a point some seven miles above Newport News, on the same side of the river, and an action of a serious character is looked for daily. A skirmish is reported as having taken place on Sunday morning, Brown's regiment of Zouaves sent out Lieutenant Neva to capture some cattle belonging to the rebels. The latter were driven in by a company of Virginia light horse, and three of them were wounded, two fatally, the others, nevertheless, kept on charging, and succeeded in getting the cattle to camp. The most important item of intelligence, however, is in reference to the experiment with Sawyer's American rifled cannon, mounted at the Rip Rage. The trial of this weapon was productive of destruction as exceeded with the most complete success, and must have slightly astonished the rebels. Sawyer's Point, which was found to be clearly within range. Several shells were thrown within which a number of rebels were seen to scatter, and of them exploded immediately over their intrenchments. There has been no further movement by or near Great Bethel.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR GENERAL BUTLER.

Fortress Monroe and its vicinity continue to be strengthened by the arrival of additional troops. Fifteen additional companies are expected to arrive which are an effective force corps of artillery from Fort M'Henry, and a regiment of mounted riflemen from Washington City. The latter will be valuable to act against the Virginia light cavalry. When these regiments reach their destination the force will be extended several miles further from that point.

A PROCLAMATION BY GOVERNOR JACKSON.

Governor Jackson, of Missouri, has at last issued a proclamation which fully exhibits his desire to precipitate that State into revolution. We have given the fact but not previously existed. After reciting various acts of the Federal authorities relative to the military occupation of the State, attaking State troops prisoners, and putting an embargo on Southern commerce, which, under the agreement between General Harney and ex-Governor Sterling Price, with the subsequent removal of Harney from the command, in accordance with General Lyon, etc., Governor Jackson calls for 50,000 men, "for the purpose, if necessary, to repel the invasion of their soil by the United States troops, and drive them out of the State." He declares that Missouri is still a member of the United States, and that it is not for him to withdraw that connection, but the convention would, at the proper time, express the sovereign will of the people in relation to it; that he has no power to call an election of the people to obey the constitutional requirements of the United States Government; but he advises them that their first allegiance is due to their State.

FLIGHT OF THE GOVERNOR.

After assuming the proclamation Governor Jackson and staff, together with the Legislature, left Jefferson City, which City, it is supposed for Somerville or some point in that locality, leaving Lieutenant Governor Reynolds behind them.

At last accounts the Governor was still on the run, with no certainty where he was going to. Gasconade and Osage Federal troops were close at his heels. When the Governor left Jefferson City the last word of honor to the President of the Pacific Railroad that the property of the road should not be destroyed, and that it had been twelve hours gone he ordered the Gasconade and Osage bridges burned, thus destroying the connection of the road and giving a severe blow to the trade of St. Louis.

PURSUIT BY FEDERAL TROOPS.

The Federal troops under General Lyon, in Missouri, meanwhile, moved toward the western part of that State. Several companies of Home Guards, under the charge of the Pacific Railroad, General Lyon and staff, with 1500 men, pursued the rebels with the greatest energy and enthusiasm, apparently intended for a long march, left St. Louis in a steamboat and proceeded up the river.

ANOTHER AFFRAY AT ST. LOUIS.

A strange and unfortunate affair occurred at St. Louis on the 17th. A number of Germans were parading the city, when one company suddenly fired at the windows of a cotton-factory, which they had been ordered to guard. The cause of the firing is not clear. One account says that a shot was fired from the court-room upon the troops, but the truth is not known.

BRILLIANT AFFRAY AT ROMNEY.

Another of those brilliant affairs which have marked the progress of the war so far has just taken place at Romney, 25 miles or thirty miles from Chambersburg. Colonel Lewis Wallace, with a portion of the Eleventh Indiana Regiment, numbering about 500 men, on Sunday, where some portion of the rebel forces were known to be posted. He surprised a body of 800 men, and after a hot fight routed them, killing two, wounding one, and taking several prisoners, together with a quantity of excellent camp equipage and some medical stores.

THE MARYLAND ELECTION.

The unconditional Union majority in Maryland over the peace party was nearly 30,000. Among the State rights supporters, the secessionists, the rebels, rowdies, and ristocrats, all combined, not a single member, or county, gave for one.

THE WHEELING CONVENTION.

Important action was taken on 17th in the Wheeling Convention. The declaration recently presented by Mr. Dorsey, providing for the establishment of a Provisional Government, and, of course, deposing the traitors at Richmond, and their abettors, filling the offices throughout the State, was passed to a third reading, and adopted by a unanimous vote. An ordinance was also reported by Mr. Carlisle, from the Committee on Business, which provides for a reorganization of the Financial Bureau of the State.

THE KENTUCKY ELECTION.

On 20th the special election for ten members of Congress will be held in Kentucky. The anti-secessionists are confident that at least nine good and true Union men will be chosen, and are hopeful that the entire delegation will be supporters of the stars and stripes.

BANK CONVENTION IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

A convention of delegates from the different banks of the seceded States met at Atlanta, Georgia, on the 3d inst. Resolutions were adopted recommending the banks to receive and pay out the bogus confederacy treasury notes; recommending all the railroad companies to do the same; advising the Legislatures of the different States to enact laws making it penal for collectors to receive said notes, and recommending "all States, cities, and corporations, having coupons payable in the city of New York or elsewhere in the enemy's country" to appoint some place of payment in the Confederate States. The Convention will meet again in Richmond, on the 24th of July.

PERSONAL.

Col. Kelly, who led the brilliant attack at Philippi, in Western Virginia, a few days ago, is improving rapidly, and has a few weeks hence to be able to take command of his troops again.

Col. Andrews is to be appointed a Brigadier-General.

A great Union meeting was held in Boston last week, over which Chancellor Harrington presided. A resolution was unanimously adopted calling on Senator Sayward to resign.

Andrew J. M'Reynolds is to command Carl Schurz's regiment. He served with honor in the Mexican War, being a captain in the 1st Dragoons, the body-guard of Scott.

Gen. Beauregard has issued a characteristic proclamation to the people of Manassas. Like all he writes it has a strong point in lying. He lies about the National troops, lies about their actions, lies about their strength, and crowns the whole by charging the monstrous falsehood that the Federal army is a mercenary one.

O. H. Browning has been appointed to fill the vacancy in the Illinois Secessional Delegation caused by the death of Mr. Douglas.

Captain Tyler of the Second Dragoons, Lieutenants Fendall, Andrew Jackson, Patterson, Rice, and Campbell have resigned their commissions. Any rule for counting?

It is said that Mr. Burlingame will be sent as Minister to China, and Mr. Wm. Baker Lewis, Consul to Canton.

Captain Ball and his secession cavalry, captured at Alexandria three weeks ago, were for some time confined on the Washington Navy-yard, and then released on their taking the oath of allegiance. They have returned to Virginia they were at once ordered to leave the State.

It is said that Governor Sprague, of Rhode Island, is to be offered a Major-Generalship.

It is stated that Governor Seward did entirely destitute, and an appeal has been made by some benevolent citizens of Boston to raise sufficient funds to secure a suitable home for the widow and children.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE PRIVATEERING QUESTION.

In the House of Commons, on the 3d of June, Mr. W. E. Forster asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government had received a notice from which by the law of nations they possess, to prevent privateers sailing under the flag as yet unrecognized by the so-called Southern Confederacy from bringing their prizes into any port of Her Majesty's dominions. He added that he did not ask this question with regard to privateers sailing under the flag of the United States, simply because he had no expectation that any letters of marque would be issued by the Government of Washington.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: My answer must be rather wide in its terms, because the question which has been put is so. The whole matter has been considered by Her Majesty's Government, and they have, after consulting the authorities of the law officers of the Crown, that orders should be given to interdict to the ships of war and privateers of both parties from entering the ports and harbors of the United Kingdom, with the exception of the ordinary exercise of Her Majesty's hospitality, under circumstances of extreme distress. Hence will be no objection to read an extract from the dispatch which has been sent to the India Office and to the governors of the colonies:

"Her Majesty's Government are, as you are aware, desirous of observing the strictest neutrality in the contest between the United States and the so-called Confederate States of North America. With the view more thoroughly to carry out that intention, we propose to interdict the armed ships, and also the privateers, of both parties from entering the ports of the United Kingdom, or those of the colonies, except for the purpose of Her Majesty's hospitality, or under circumstances of extreme distress."

[Hear, hear.] The orders went out to the colonies on Saturday last, and will be sent out to India by the mail. I may also state that we have during the past week been in communication with the French Government on this subject. I stated to the French Ambassador the view taken by her Majesty's Government, and that the whole country the Government of France intended to pursue with regard to this question. The French Ambassador has informed me that the French Government propose to act in conformity with the existing law of France. That existing law is founded upon an ordinance passed in the year 1681; and the rule is that in case of a war in which France is neutral no privateers are allowed to bring their prizes into the ports of France, but they are allowed to remain for a longer period than twenty-four hours. They are not allowed to sell the prize, but they are by way to dispose of the prizes which they have taken; and after the twenty-four hours have expired they are ordered to leave the ports. Therefore the course pursued by France is not very different from that which we intend to adopt.

THE DECLARATION OF PARIS.

In the House of Commons, on the 3d of June,

Sir J. Hanmer asked if it was true that it is stated in the newspapers of to-day that the Government of the United States have expressed their intention to recognize the declaration of Paris of 1856; and, if so, what effect that will have upon the blockade of the Southern ports.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—The only answer which I can give to the right honorable gentleman is that propositions have been sent to America founded upon the declaration of Paris. Those propositions were made in concert with the French Government, and are restricted in concert with that Government. We have not as yet received any answer to those propositions. They have been gone. I should think, by this time, that we should receive some answer to them. Until that answer is received, I can not pledge the Government as to the course which they will pursue.

LOSS OF THE STEAMSHIP "CANADIAN."

The screw steamship Canadian, belonging to the Montreal Steamship Company, running between Liverpool and Quebec, on the 4th inst., while outward-bound, run upon a bank of sunken ice, eight miles south of Belle Isle, and sank in about half an hour, causing the loss of from twenty to thirty lives. There were about two hundred people on board, including the crew, and one hundred and eighty were saved in boats, and were arrived at St. John, Newfoundland. Although the vessel was divided into three compartments, she struck the ice in such a manner as to open them all. She was a fine new steamer, 2000 tons register, built at Greenock, Scotland, in 1860, of iron.

ITALY.

DEATH OF COUNT CAVOUR.

The death of the minister who, in the space of nine years, has carried the prostrate monarchy of Piedmont to the rank of a first-class European power, is one of those events which, even in the presence of our own critical circumstances, commands us to pause and pay our tribute of respect. Count Cavour died at Turin on the 6th instant, of congestion of the brain, arising from intense occupation, and the fatigue of long exercise, and sinker for strong an appetite or else excessive indulgence in the pleasures of his well-appointed table. He had been dead six times before his death.

OUR ARMY LEAVING CHAMBERSBURG.

We have received from our Special Artist attached to the staff of General Williams the sketches which are published on page 404. They represent CAMP SUTTER, near Chambersburg, where most of General Patterson's army was assembled before the march; and the DEPARTURE OF THE FIRST BRIGADE (Colonel Thomas, U.S.A., Commanding) of General Patterson's army from Chambersburg on 7th inst. The Chambersburg Repository of 8th thus describes their departure:

"Yesterday morning about eight o'clock a considerable number of the soldiers who were quartered here took up the line of march for the South. The following, as well as we could ascertain, were those who left:

"Four companies of Cavalry, regulars, well mounted, and the first City Troop of Horse, of Philadelphia; two companies of artillery, acting as infantry, and two companies of regular infantry—the four last named under Captain Doubleday, of Fort Sumter; the 6th Regiment, Colonel Nagle; the 21st Regiment, Col. Baillie; the 23d Regiment, Colonel Dare; and Captain M'Mullin's Independent Rangers)—the whole forming the first brigade, and are commanded by Colonel Thomas, of the regular army.

"Their appearance was excellent; their marching of the best order; and their carriage such as to assure all who witnessed their movements—and they were thousands, for every available spot was occupied by our people—that they were perfectly able to endure the fatigues of a long march. This brigade, being the first, will lead off in the contest that is shortly to take place, and their movements are watched by an eager community with deep interest.

REBEL ARMY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

AN enterprising correspondent has sent us sketches from which we have prepared the illustrations on page 405, representing the LEESBURG BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC, and the ARRIVAL OF TROOPS AT MARTINSBURG, VIRGINIA.

Leesburg Bridge crosses the Potomac River 13 miles below Harper's Ferry, connecting Maryland with Loudon County, Virginia, and is distant about 20 miles from the town of Leesburg. The river at this point is a quarter of a mile wide, and flows over a very rocky bed. The high land seen on the Virginia side is Bull Run Mountain, from the top of which a splendid view of the surrounding country is obtained. This position is at present held by about 2000 Secession troops, encamped on the Virginia side, with strong pickets thrown out for some distance along the Maryland shore.

A description of Martinsburg is hardly necessary. It is one of the principal stations on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, 100 miles from Baltimore and 19 miles beyond Harper's Ferry. Our correspondent says he doesn't know how many troops are stationed there now; the greater portion of them were sent down to Harper's Ferry some days ago. This view was taken from opposite the Railroad Hotel, where the cars stop, looking east toward Baltimore.

THE PRIVATEER "SAVANNAH."

WE publish on page 413 a picture of the Savannah, a Charleston privateer, taken into the port of New York last week, under charge of a prize crew from the United States brig Perry. The following account of her cruise and capture was given by one of the officers of the Perry:

The Savannah was fitted out as a privateer in Charleston. She was provided with a crew of twenty men. Two or three days previous to their falling into the hands of the Federal Government, the Joseph, of Rockland, loaded with sugar from Cardenas, Cuba, was fallen in with and captured. The captain of the Joseph was taken on board the privateer, and received the worst treatment. He was refused any of his property, and then stripped almost naked of the apparel which he had on. The privateer put eight men of her crew on board the prize, and transferred the crew of the Joseph to her own deck. The Savannah then left the prize vessel, giving orders to those on board to put into the nearest port belonging to the Confederate States. The Joseph soon after succeeded in reaching Georgetown, South Carolina. The Savannah accompanied them almost to Georgetown.

After the privateer saw her prize safely ensconced in Georgetown, she put out in quest of some further material to practice upon in the way of merchant vessels, and happened to perceive the brig Perry in the distance, which she mistook for a merchantman, as she had her ports closed in order to deceive the advancing enemy. The Savannah pushed boldly forward to the attack, thinking that she had an easy prey, but when almost within shot distance she discovered that she had got into the clutches of one of Uncle Sam's emissaries, and immediately the order was given "boat ship," and the "bold privateer" showed the white feather, and tried to run. The Perry clapped on all sail, and gave hot pursuit. The chase was quite exciting. When the vessels came within range of each other's guns, a simultaneous fire was opened by both crafts, but no person was injured on either side. The shots of the Savannah had no effect whatever, they flying far athwart the bows of the ship, and taking every imaginable course but the right one, while on the contrary the attack of the United States vessel produced some havoc in the rigging of the enemy, two shots passing completely through her foresail and cutting away some of her ropes.

The Savannah at last hove to, seeing no possible chance of escape, and was immediately boarded by the crew of the Perry. The naval officers at once rushed down into the cabin, and secured the papers, etc. No resistance was made by the pirates, as they believed "discretion to be the better part of valor". The crew were then all taken prisoners and brought on board, from whence they were transferred to the war vessel Wisconsin, lying off Charleston bar. A prize crew of seven was then detailed for the privateer, and she was sent on to this city under charge of the Master's Mate, M'Cook.

RIFLE PIT FOR SENTINELS.

ONE of our artists sends us the sketch on page 413, with the following by way of explanation:

The practice of shooting down sentries has been denounced by all civilized nations as ultra barbarism even strong outposts remain undisturbed by enemies in war, on the humane and soldierly principle that such insignificant atoms of armies, tied, as it were, to their posts by the necessities of their position, serve no other end but useless murder by their destruction: hence the sentry is nearly as safe as the ambassador. But an organized band of murderers, we hear, well acquainted with every cow-path and covert approach between Fairfax Court House and Alexandria, propose to shoot our men, Indian fashion, in detail. And under our present system of placing sentries, I confess, a crawling coward has the advantage of his upright foe. No cover can screen him from the assassin's bullet, no random fire avenge him, under existing practice in our service, especially at night. But I wish to draw your attention to a very simple plan to circumvent the provisos, which the writer has seen practiced with complete success, and which I endeavor to illustrate in this night picture. If you place a sentry on an open plain he is a fair mark from the nearest rock or coppice; if near such rascals, or in a wood, he is sure to perish; but place him in a pit (the work of a few spades for half an hour) deep enough to involve him to the chin, and I will answer for his safety and efficiency!

I do not mean a common rifle pit, for there the earth taken out is thrown up toward your foe, and your eye is consequently some distance above the level of the earth. Nor do I mean a trou-de-loup to entrap an incautious foe. But a simple pit, in shape like the letter T, of any size as to space, but about five feet in depth, and the removed earth either taken away or carefully distributed so as not to interfere with the surrounding level.

The effect of position, indeed the science of seeing, is very little understood; and this is one result. A kind of haze appears to ascend from the earth, spreading around every object on its surface an indescribable glow, and the darker the foreground the more perfect the luminousness. But the eye must be on a level with the earth, and some time accustomed to the natural darkness, as in the case of sentries.

I should be glad if our soldiers, who have to civilize the chivalry, would give this fact a fair chance; it would save some valuable lives to the patriots, and be a mysterious stronghold against any number of assassins.

The best riflemen in Europe, the Sardinian Bersagliori, have adopted this plan, and actually "go to earth" even on a reconnoissance, as at Kamarg and Bistdar.

I have tried to give you a night view of the pit and its occupant, the ground in front, and a dark forest in the distance, with the luminous effect surrounding the crawling figure near the tree on the left of the sentry, without any attempt at making an effective picture, and with only enough of exaggerations to define my recollection. I know you will give the suggestion a place in your valuable newspaper.

OUR ARMY AT CAIRO.

We continue our series of engravings of our army at Cairo with three illustrations on page 411; to wit, two of the BATTERIES ON THE OHIO LEVEE, and a third representing the LANDING OF THE FOURTH AND TWELFTH REGIMENTS ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS AT CAIRO. All three are from sketches by our correspondent, MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.

The batteries speak for themselves, and need no explanation. The Fourth, Colonel Cook, and the Twelfth, Colonel M'Arthur, were conveyed to Cairo in the City of Alton and Louisiana steamers, and made a very fine appearance. Our correspondent writes us as follows about the camp at Cairo, under date of June 9:

There are now about 8000 men in and about Cairo and Bird's Point. Some 3000 are in barracks at the Point, which has been named Camp Defiance, and latterly have been busily employed in removing obstructions and erecting substantial fortifications. All their heavy cannons are now mounted and apparently ready for mischief. Directly above them, near the Mississippi levee, the Seventh and Twelfth regiments are encamped, and still above them is Camp Barker, an encampment of cavalry, Camp Houghling, and Camp Smith, light artillery. The last three have romantic locations, being fairly embowered in trees, rendered musical by the deliciously-toned voices of birds and myriads of mosquitoes. Above the city, on the Ohio levee, is an encampment of light artillery under Captain M'Allister. A company of light artillery from Chicago, under command of Captain Taylor, are quartered at the Illinois Central Railroad Freight Depot. They brought down with them quite a number of cannon, which are now displaying their teeth from the river front of the building. At various points on the Illinois Central Railroad there are several regiments encamped, and so easy of access that, should circumstances require, the furthest could be brought to this point in a day. The programme set forth a few days since, that an army of 50,000 would be concentrated here, seems apparently about to be realized. Within the last week between 3000 and 4000 men have arrived here, and several thousand, I understand, are expected this coming week.

How General Prentiss manages traitors the following anecdote will tell:

A company belonging to General Prentice's command captured part of an organized band of rebels, and brought them into camp. General Prentiss asked them if they would take the oath, when three consented to do so, and seventeen refused. The General then rose in the presence of the whole party, and addressed them as follows:

"Go home," said he to the three loyal ones, "raise tomorrow morning the flag of the Union, of your country; load up your weapons and shoot the first man that tries to pull it down. As for those traitors they will be set to-morrow to work wheeling dirt, and shall be kept at it until I get the balance of the witnesses: then I shall send them to St. Louis to be tried for treason."

THE LATE LIEUTENANT GREBLE, U.S.A.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WILLARD.]

THE LATE LIEUT. GREBLE, U.S.A.

WE publish herewith a portrait of this gallant young hero, from a photograph kindly furnished by his family. The Philadelphia Inquirer gives the following sketch of his life:

Lieutenant John T. Greble was a native of Philadelphia, and was the son of Edwin Greble, Esq. He passed examination in the Ringgold Grammar School at the age of twelve, as a candidate for the High School, at which latter institution he graduated at the age of sixteen. From the High School Mr. Greble went, under the nomination of the Hon. Lewis C. Levin, to the Military Academy of West Point, where he graduated high in his class on the 1st of July, 1854, taking his place in the army as a brevet Second Lieutenant. In September of the same year he was commissioned a Second Lieutenant in the Second Artillery, and was promoted to a First Lieutenancy on the 31 of March, 1857.

After receiving his first commission, Lieutenant Greble was stationed for a few months at Newport Barracks, but was soon called to active service in Florida, to aid in protecting the inhabitants of that State from the depredations and murders of the much dreaded band of Seminole under Billy Bowlegs. He served several years in this way, remaining until his regiment came home. His next service was upon the Academical Staff at West Point, as one of the Professors. In October, 1859, he was ordered to Fortress Monroe, where he was stationed until the 26th of May, 1861, at which time he went with his artillery command to the advanced post at Newport News.

The sad termination of his brief but promising military career is told in the newspaper intelligence made public yesterday. He was born in January, 1834, and was killed while gallantly leading his command in battle, on the morning of June 10, 1861, aged twenty-seven years. The particulars of this encounter show that the United States troops while advancing on Great Bethel were attacked by a masked rebel battery of forty rifled cannon, and that Lieutenant Greble was consequently ordered to bring up his guns. This movement was effected with great promptitude, and fired a number of shots, but without effect, in consequence of the commanding position of the enemy. A retreat was therefore ordered necessary. In making arrangements for the withdrawal of the guns, Lieutenant Greble was struck on the forehead and killed instantly. As an officer he bore the highest character. He was every inch a thorough-bred American soldier—skilled, brave, active, and efficient. In private life he was a gifted and accomplished gentleman, and every where he was beloved and esteemed.

OUR ARMY AT FORTRESS MONROE.

We devote several pages this week to illustrations of the BATTLE OF GREAT BETHEL, and the movements of our army at and near Fortress Monroe. On page 408 we publish, from a sketch by our Special Artist, who was present throughout the fight, a general view of the BATTLE OF GREAT BETHEL; and on page 409 a fine picture of the CHARGE OF DURYEE'S ZOUAVES upon the rebel battery. On page 406 we give pictures of the SUTLER-YARD AT FORTRESS MONROE, the ROWS OF SHOT AND SHELL piled up ready for use at that work; JOHN TYLER'S HOUSE, now occupied by Federal troops; THE FEMALE COLLEGE, also occupied by our troops—all from photographs by Mr. Stacy; the ENTRANCE TO THE FORT, and a WHIPPING-POST on an estate near the Fort, from sketches by our Special Artist. On page 407 we give a view of the CAMP OF THE VERMONT REGIMENT AT NEWPORT NEWS, from a sketch by Surgeon Jackson of that Regiment; and a picture of COLONEL ALLEN'S CAMP, the same place, from a sketch by our Special Artist. On page 410 we present a view of one of the faces of Fortress Monroe, showing the GRACES AND EMBRASURES, by Mr. Stacy; and a picture of the LANDING OF THE SCOTT LIFE-GUARD at Newport News on the 7th inst., from a sketch by our Special Artist. On page 411 we give a picture of a GUN BENT DOUBLE by a cannon-ball in the hands of a United States soldier at the Battle of Great Bethel, from a photograph by W. H. Weaver. The next shot from the same gun took off the man's head.

Of the BATTLE OF GREAT BETHEL the following brief account must suffice at present:

About midnight Colonel Duryee's ZOUAVES and Colonel Townsend's (Albany) regiment crossed the river at Hampton by means of six large batteaux, and marched toward Great Bethel, took up the line of march, the former some two miles in advance of the latter. At the same time Colonel Bendix's regiment, and detachments of the Vermont and Massachusetts regiments, moved toward Howard to form a junction with the regulars from Fortress Monroe at Little Bethel, about half-way between Hampton and Great Bethel. The ZOUAVES passed Little Bethel about 4 A.M. Colonel Bendix's regiment moved next, and took a position at the intersection of the roads. Not understanding the signal, the German regiment, in the darkness of the morning, fired upon Colonel Townsend's column, marching in close order, and led by Lieutenant Butler, son and aid of General Butler, with two pieces of artillery. Other accounts say that Colonel Townsend's regiment fired first. At all events the fire of the Albany regiment was harmless, while that of the Germans was fatal, killing one man and wounding seriously two others, with several other slight casualties. The Albany regiment, being back of the Germans, discovered from the encampments left on the field that the opposed enemy was a friend. They had in the mean time fired nine rounds with small-arms and a field-piece.

At daybreak Colonel Allen's and Colonel Carr's regiments moved from the rear of the forces to support the main body. The mistake at Little Bethel having been ascertained, the buildings were burned, and a Major, with two mounted scouts-guards, named Avery and Whiting, were made prisoners. The troops then advanced upon Great Bethel, in the following order: three companies Zouaves, Colonel Bendix, Lieutenant-Colonel Washburne, Colonel Allen, and Colonel Carr. At this point our reinforcements formed, and successively endeavored to take a large wanted accession battery. The effort was futile, our three small pieces of artillery not being able to cope with the heavy rifled cannon of the enemy, according to some accounts being thirty in number. The rebel battery was completely masked, so that we could be true, but only the flashes of the guns. There were probably less than a thousand men behind the battalion of the rebels.

A well-concerted movement might have secured the position; but Brigadier-General Pierce, who commanded the expedition, appears to have lost his presence of mind, and the two regiment sent for not exposed to a galling fire, when an order to retreat was at last given; but at that moment Lieutenant Greble, of the United States Army, and in command of the artillery, was struck by a cannon-ball and instantly killed. He had spiked his gun, and was gallantly endeavoring to withdraw his command.

Our artist writes us as follows:

CAMP DUR, June 13, 1861.

I send you sketches and a diagram of the battle. On Sunday evening I went about three miles on foot on a scouting party. On our return we found our regiment forming into line to attack a rebel battery. I immediately started off again with them. After marching out to Hampton without supper we were halted, and received orders to return to camp, where we arrived at four o'clock A.M. At six o'clock we were again called to take up the line of march. No time for breakfast. We marched through the broiling sun twelve miles to Great Bethel, where we had the fight. I went into the thickest of it. Men were cut down at my side. We lost the battle, through the mismanagement of General Pierce. We were obliged to retreat: many of our men fell off with fatigue and sunstroke. We arrived home in the evening. We had hardly got to sleep when we were again called to arms, as the enemy were moving toward our camp. I have had no sleep since Saturday night.

The rebel battery was manned by about 1500 men, with about thirty pieces of cannon, mostly rifled, and two mortars. The arms these men have are the best quality; the muskets are the rifled musket. I cannot think the rebels suffered much; none, however, think they did. The correspondent of the World has collected all the particulars; his statements will be correct. There were several correspondents here at the time. I was the only artist who went into the action, the others not crossing the Creek at Hampton.

A correspondent of the Tribune visited John Tyler's house, and describes it thus:

I visited the country-seat of John Tyler, which I found a common-sort of half-Gothic affair, standing on Hampton Creek or River, distinguished for nothing particularly living or noteworthy except the American flag, which adorned the highest pole. It is tenantless, except when a Zouave takes lodging on one of the ex-President's comfortable lounges. There are several fine residences in the immediate neighborhood, all of which are either deserted or tenanted after the manner aforesaid.

Of the work at Newport News, shown in the picture of the Vermont Regiment's camp, he says:

The redoubt is a formidable work: stretching across the point of land which makes out and enters the head in the river, it will afford protection to a large body of men, and would seem to contemplate an increase of the forces now here. The Vermonters, who occupy the centre, appear to have progressed rapidly in their drilling.

The following private letter from Camp. K, dated last week, will doubtless be read with interest:

CAMP BUTLER, NEWPORT NEWS, June 10, 1861.

I went out with a scouting party the other day from Camp Dix, about five miles out on Virginia Bergh. We had forty men. We entered and searched a number of houses belonging to secessionists, expecting a lot of rifles, etc. The houses are all deserted, and in most cases they have left their furniture and provisions. We got all the information we desire from the niggers. As we approached the house of Mr. J. Watson we both stopped in Virginia to take observation, but observing our approach he made off and left every thing. We got two, but he succeeded in making his escape by swimming Back River. We posted a guard at his house, and left the two niggers, and proceeded to a two-horse wagon and went farther on to the house of Mr. Lopan. Coming as we did in such a way, and without the guard, he did not observe our approach, so we took the gentleman prisoner. Here we found several horses, cattle, etc. As we were engaged in guarding the different houses, we thought it best to send for a reinforcement. I volunteered to go after them, and had a nice little trotting horse hitched up. This is a beautiful country in time of peace, and I wish we, as it is now, had no such woods: our road lay pretty much through the woods. This was a very dangerous errand for me. I did not seem to realize it at first; but after thinking it over a little, I saw my chances very pretty good to fall into the hands of some of the enemy's scouts, as there are a number of them hid in the woods even within a mile of our camp. It was too late to give up, so I took a nigger with me to show me the road back—for which little piece of service I gave him his Freedom. After travelling about a mile I met two secessionists on the road, both armed—one with a rifle, and the other had an old-fashioned piece on his shoulder, the stock ornamented with brass. I did not so much fear them, as I took my pistol in hand, and would have shot the first one that attempted to raise his piece. When within about two miles of camp I thought I was gone—in fact, I made up my mind to it. Two armed men, without uniforms, came out of the bushes, followed by fifteen or twenty, and ranged themselves across the road. I turned to my nigger. Says I, "It's all over with me!" The darkey, who was behind me, put his gun for a while down, said, "Massa, give me the reins: let me turn him, and dey can't catch us." It was too late. The men were now fifteen yards from them. I drew my pistol, and rode up to them and challenged them. They belonged to the Naval Brigade, and had strayed out from camp, which they should not have done, and I was allowed to pass the picket-guard. I returned with forty more men, and learned from the party we had left that they had been a party of rebels drilling on the other side of Back River, about three quarters of a mile off—close enough to count their muskets and uniforms. They all—close enough to count their muskets and uniforms. They all—close enough to count their muskets and uniforms. They all

CHAPTER I.

WHAT purpose I had in view when I was hot on tracing out and proving Estella's parentage I can not say. It will presently be seen that the question was not before me in a distinct shape until it was put before me by a wiser head than my own.

But when Herbert and I had held our momentous conversation, I was seized with a feverish conviction that I ought to hunt the matter down—that I ought not to let it rest, but that I ought to see Mr. Jaggers, and come at the bare truth. I really do not know whether I felt that I did this for Estella's sake, or whether I was glad to transfer to the man in whose preservation I was so much concerned some rays of the romantic interest that had so long surrounded her. Perhaps the latter possibility may be the nearer to the truth.

Any way, I could scarcely be withheld from going out to Gerrard Street that night. Herbert's representations that, if I did, I should probably be lying sullen and stricken useless when our fugitive's safety would depend upon me, alone restrained my impatience. On the understanding that I was to go early next morning, that come what would, I was to go to Mr. Jaggers's-to-morrow, I at length submitted to keep quiet, and to have my hurts looked after, and to stay at home. Early next morning we went out together, and at the corner of Giltspur Street by Smithfield, I left Herbert to go his way into the City, and took my way to Little Britain.

There were periodical occasions when Mr. Jaggers and Wemmick went over the office accounts, and checked off the vouchers, and put all things straight. On those occasions Wemmick took home books and papers into Mr. Jaggers's room, and one of the up-stairs clerks came down into the outer office. Finding such clerk on Wemmick's post that morning, I knew what was going on; but I was not sorry to have Mr. Jaggers and Wemmick together, as Wemmick would then hear for himself that I said nothing to compromise him.

My appearance with my arm bandaged and my coat sleeve over my shoulders favored my object. Although I had sent Mr. Jaggers a brief account of the accident as soon as I had arrived in town, yet I had to give him all the details now; and the specialty of the occasion caused our talk to be less dry and hard, and less strictly regulated by the rules of evidence, than it had been before. While I described the disaster Mr. Jaggers stood, according to his wont, before the fire. Wemmick leaned back in his chair sitting at me, with his hands in the pockets of his trowsers, and his pen put horizontally into the post. The two brutal casts, always memorable in my mind from the official proceedings, seemed to be congestively considering whether they didn't smell fire at the present moment.

My narrative finished, and their questions exhausted, I then produced Miss Havisham's authority to receive the nine hundred pounds for Herbert. Mr. Jaggers's eyes retired a little deeper into his head when I handed him the tablets, but he presently handed them over to Wemmick, with instructions to draw the check for his signature. While that was in course of being done, I looked on at Wemmick as he wrote, and Mr. Jaggers, poising and swaying himself on his well-polished boots, looked on at me. "I am sorry," said he, as I put the check in my pocket, when he had signed it, "that we do nothing for you."

"Miss Havisham was good enough to ask me," I returned, "whether she could do nothing for me, and I told her No."

"Every one should know his own business," said Mr. Jaggers. And I saw Wemmick's lips form the words "portable property."

"Therefore I have told her No, if I had been you," said Mr. Jaggers; "but every man ought to know his own business best."

"Every man's business," said Wemmick, rather reproachfully toward me, "is portable property."

As I thought the time was now come for pursuing the theme I had at heart, I said, turning on Mr. Jaggers:

"I did ask something of Miss Havisham, however, Sir. I asked her to give me some information relative to her adopted daughter, and she gave me all she possessed."

"Did she?" said Mr. Jaggers, bending forward to look at his boots and then straightening himself. "Yes! I don't think I should have done so, if I had been Miss Havisham. But she ought to know her own business best."

"I know of the history of Miss Havisham's adopted child than Miss Havisham herself does, Sir. I know her mother."

Mr. Jaggers looked at me inquiringly, and repeated "Mother?"

"I have seen her mother within these three days."

"Yes?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"And so have you, Sir. And you have seen her still more recently."

"Yes?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"Perhaps I know more of Estella's history than even you do," said I. "I know her father, too."

A certain stop that Mr. Jaggers came to in his manner—he was too self-possessed to change his manner, but he could not help its being brought to an indefinitely attentive stop—assured me that he did not know who her father was. This I had strongly suspected from Provis's account (as Herbert had delivered it) of his having kept himself dark; which I pieced on to the fact that he himself was not Mr. Jaggers's client until some four years later, and when he could have no reason for claiming his identity. But I could not be sure of this unconsciousness on Mr. Jaggers's part before, though I was quite sure of it now.

"So!" You know the young lady's father, Pip?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"Yes," I replied. "And his name is Provis —from New South Wales."

Even Mr. Jaggers started when I said those words. It was the slightest start that could escape a man, the most carefully repressed and the soonest checked, but he did start, though he made it a part of the action of taking out his pocket-handkerchief. How Wemmick received the announcement I am unable to say, for I was afraid to look at him just then, lest Mr. Jaggers's sharpness should detect that there had been some communication unknown to him between us.

"And on what evidence, Pip," asked Mr. Jaggers, very coolly, as he passed with his handkerchief half-way to his nose, "does Provis make this claim?"

"He does not make it," said I, "and has never made it, and has no knowledge or belief that his daughter is in existence."

For once the powerful pocket-handkerchief failed. My reply was so unexpected that Mr. Jaggers put the handkerchief back into his pocket without completing the usual performance, folded his arms, and looked with stern attention at me, though with an immovable face.

Then I told him all I knew, and how I knew it; with the one reservation that I left him to infer that I knew from Miss Havisham what I in fact knew from Wemmick. I was very careful indeed as to that. Nor did I look toward Wemmick until I had finished all I had to tell, and had been for some time silently meeting Mr. Jaggers's look. When I did at last turn my eyes in Wemmick's direction, I found that he had unposted his pen, and was intent upon the table before him.

"Pish!" said Mr. Jaggers at last, as he moved toward the papers on the table. "—What item was it you were at, Wemmick, when Mr. Pip came in?"

But I could not submit to be thrown off in that way, and I made a passionate, almost an indignant, appeal to him to be more frank and manly with me. I reminded him of the false hopes into which I had lapsed, the length of time they had lasted, and the discovery I had made; and I hinted at the danger that weighed upon my spirits. I represented myself as being surely worthy of some little confidence from him, in return for the confidence I had just now imparted. I said that I did not blame him, or suspect him, or mistrust him, but I wanted assurance of the truth from him. And if he asked me why I wanted it and why I thought I had any right to it, I would tell him, little or no cared for such poor dreams, that I had loved Estella dearly and long, and that, although I had lost her and was parted quite still and hopelessly, and apparently quite obdurate, under this appeal, I turned to Wemmick, and said, "Wemmick, I know you to be a man with a gentle heart. I have seen your pleasant home, and your old father, and all the innocent, cheerful, playful ways with which you refresh your business life. And I entreat you to say a word for me to Mr. Jaggers, and to represent to him that, all circumstances considered, he ought to be more open with me!"

I have never seen two men look more oddly at one another than Mr. Jaggers and Wemmick did after this apostrophe. At first, a misgiving crossed me that Wemmick would be instantly dismissed from his employment; but it melted as I saw Mr. Jaggers relax into something like a smile, and Wemmick become bolder.

"What's all this?" said Mr. Jaggers. "You with an old father, and you with pleasant and playful ways?"

"Well!" returned Wemmick. "If I don't bring 'em here, what does it matter?"

"Pip," said Mr. Jaggers, laying his hand upon my arm, and smiling openly, "this man must be the most cunning impostor in all London."

"Not a bit of it," returned Wemmick, growing bolder and bolder. "I think you're another."

Again they exchanged their former odd looks, each apparently still distrustful that the other was taking him in.

"You with a pleasant home?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"Since it don't interfere with business," returned Wemmick, "let it be so. Now I look out you, Sir, I shouldn't wonder if you might be planning and contriving to have a pleasant home of your own one of these days, when you're tired of this work."

Mr. Jaggers nodded his head retrospectively two or three times, and actually drew a sigh. "Pip," said he, "we won't talk about 'poor dreams;' you know more about such things than I, having much fresher experience of that kind. But about this other matter. I'll put a case to you. Mind! I admit nothing."

He waited for me to declare that I quite understood that he expressly said that he admitted nothing.

"Now, Pip," said Mr. Jaggers, "put this case. Put the case that a woman, under such circumstances as you have mentioned, held her child concealed, and was obliged to communicate the fact to her legal adviser, on his representing to her that he must know, with an eye to the latitude of his defense, how the fact stood about that child. Put the case that at the same time he held a trust to find a child for an eccentric rich lady to adopt and bring up.

"I follow you, Sir."

"Put the case that he lived in an atmosphere of evil, and that all he saw of children was their being generated in great numbers for certain destruction. Put the case that he often saw children solemnly tried at a criminal bar, where they were held up to be seen; put the case that he habitually knew of their being imprisoned, whipped, transported, neglected, cast out, qualified in all ways for the hangman, and growing up to be hanged. Put the case that pretty nigh all the children he saw in his daily business life he had reason to look upon as so much spawn, to develop into the fish that were to come to his net—to be prosecuted, defended, forsaken, made orphans, be-devilled somehow."

"I follow you, Sir."

"Put the case, Pip, that here was one pretty little child out of the heap who could be saved; whom the father loved dearly, and dare make no stir about; as to whom, over the mother, the legal adviser had this power: 'I know what you did, and how you did it. You came so and so, this was your manner of attack and this the manner of resistance, you went so and so, you did such and such things to divert suspicion. I have tracked you through it all, and I tell it you all. Part with the child, unless it should be necessary to produce it to clear you, and then it shall be produced. Give the child into my hands, and I will do my best to bring you off. If you are saved, your child is saved too; if you are lost, your child is still saved.' Put the case that this was done, and that the woman was cleared."

"I understand you perfectly."

"But that I make no admissions?"

"That you make no admissions." And Wemmick repeated, "No admissions."

"Put the case, Pip, that passion and the terror of death had a little shaken the woman's intellects, and that when she was set at liberty she was scared out of the ways of the world, and went at him to be sheltered. Put the case that he took her in, and that he kept down the old wild violent nature whenever he saw an inkling of it breaking out, by exercising his power over her in the old way. Do you comprehend the imaginary case?"

"Quite."

"Put the case that the child grew up, and was married for money. That the mother was still living. That the father was still living. That the mother and father were known to one another, were dwelling within so many miles, furlongs, yards if you like, of one another. That the secret was still a secret, except that you had got wind of it. Put that last case to yourself very carefully."

"I do."

"I ask Wemmick to put it to himself very carefully."

And Wemmick said, "I do."

"For whose sake would you reveal the secret, Pip? For the father's? I think he would not be much the better for the mother. For the mother's? I think if she had done such a deed she would be safer where she was. For the daughter's? I think it would hardly serve her, to establish her parentage for the information of her husband, and to drag her back to disgrace after an escape of twenty years, pretty secure to last for life. But add the case that you had loved her, Pip, that you had made her the object of those 'poor dreams' which have, at one time or another, been in the heads of more men than you think likely, that I tell you that you had better—and would much sooner when you had thought well of it—chop off that bandaged left hand of yours with your bandaged right hand, and then pass the chopper on to Wemmick there, and cut that off, too."

I looked at Wemmick, whose face was very grave, and who gravely touched his lips with his forefinger. I did the same, and Mr. Jaggers did the same. "Now, Wemmick," said the latter then, resuming his usual manner, "what item was it you were at when Mr. Pip came in?"

Standing by for a little, while they were at work, I observed that the odd looks they had cast at one another were repeated several times: with this difference now, that each of them seemed suspicious, not to say conscious, of having shown himself in a weak and unprofessional light to the other. For this reason, I suppose, they were now inflexible with one another; Mr. Jaggers being highly dictatorial, and Wemmick obstinately justifying himself wherever there was the smallest point in abeyance for a moment. I had never seen them on such ill terms: for generally they got on very well indeed together.

But they were both happily relieved by the opportune appearance of Mike, the client with the fur cap and the habit of wiping his nose on his sleeve, whom I had seen on the very first day of my appearance within those walls. This individual, who, either in his own person or in that of some member of his family, seemed to be always in trouble (which in that place meant Newgate), called to announce that his eldest daughter was taken up on suspicion of shoplifting. As he imparted this melancholy circumstance to Wemmick, Mr. Jaggers proceeding magisterially before the fire and taking no share in the proceedings, Mike's eye happened to twinkle with a tear.

"What are you about?" demanded Wemmick, with the utmost indignation. "What do you mean by coming here for?"

"I didn't go to do it, Mr. Wemmick."

"You did," said Wemmick. "How dare you? You're not in a fit state to come here, if you can't come here without spluttering like a bad pen. What do you mean by it?"

"Mr. Wemmick, help his feelings, Mr. Wemmick," pleaded Mike.

"His what?" demanded Wemmick, quite savagely. "Say that again!"

"Now, look here my man," said Mr. Jaggers, advancing a step, and pointing to the door. "Get out of this office. I'll have no feelings here. Get out."

"It serves you right," said Wemmick. "Get out."

So the unfortunate Mike very humbly withdrew, and Mr. Jaggers and Wemmick appeared to have re-established their good understanding, and went to work again with a visible refreshment upon them, as if they had just had lunch.

CHAPTER II.

FROM Little Britain I went, with my check in my pocket, to Miss Skiffins's brother, the accountant; and Miss Skiffins's brother, the accountant, going straight to Clarriker's and bringing Clarriker back, I had the great satisfaction of completing that arrangement. It was the only good thing I had done, and the only completed thing I had done, since I was first surprised of my great expectations.

Clarriker informing me on that occasion that the affairs of the House were steadily progressing, that he would now be able to establish a small branch-house in the East, which was much wanted for the extension of the business, and that Herbert in his new partnership capacity would go out and take charge of it, I found that I must have prepared for a separation from my friend, even though my own affairs had been more settled. And now indeed I felt as if my last anchor were loosening its hold, and I should soon be driving with the winds and waves.

But there was recompense in the joy with which Herbert came home of a night and told me of these changes, little imagining that he told me no news, and sketched airy pictures of himself conducting Clara Barley to the land of the Arabian Nights, and of me going out to join them (with a caravan of camels, I believe), and of our all going up the Nile and seeing wonders. Without being suspected as to my own part in these bright plans, I felt that Herbert's way was clearing fast, and that old Bill Barley had but to stick to his pepper and rum, and his daughter would soon be happily provided for.

We had now got into the month of March. My left arm, though it presented no bad symptoms, took in the natural course so long to heal that I was still unable to get a coat on. My right hand had tolerably restored—disfigured, but fairly serviceable.

On a Monday morning, when Herbert and I were at breakfast, I received the following letter from Wemmick by the post:

"Walworth. Burn this as soon as read. Early in the week, or say Wednesday, you might do what you know of if you felt disposed to try it. Now burn."

When I had shown this to Herbert, and had put it in the fire—but not before we had both got it by heart—we considered what to do. For, of course, my being disabled could now be no longer kept out of view.

"I have thought it over, again and again," said Herbert, "and I think I know a better course than taking a new counterman. Take Startop. A good fellow, a skilled hand, fond of us, and enthusiastic and honorable."

I had thought of him three times.

"But how much would you tell him, Herbert?"

"It is necessary to tell him very little. Let him suppose it a mere freak, but a secret one, until the morning comes; then let him know that there he will find a fellow for your getting Provis aboard and away. You go with him?"

"No doubt."

"Where?"

It had seemed to me, in the many anxious considerations I had given the point, almost indifferent what place we chose for—Hamburg, Rotterdam, or Antwerp. The place signified little, so that he was got out of England. Any foreign steamer would do that one way, and we could take us up, would do. I had always proposed to myself to get him well down the river in the boat, eventually well beyond Gravesend, which was a critical place for search or inquiry if suspicion were afoot. As foreign steamers would leave London at about the time of high-water, our plan would be to get down the river by a previous ebb-tide, and lie by in some quiet spot until we could get off to one of the ships when one would be due where we lay, wherever that might be, could be calculated pretty nearly, if we made inquiries beforehand.

Herbert assented to all this, and we went out immediately after breakfast to pursue our investigations. We found that a steamer for Hamburg was likely to sail our purpose best, and we directed our thoughts chiefly to that vessel. But we noted down what other foreign steamers would leave London with the same tide, and we satisfied ourselves that we knew the build and color of each. We then separated for a few hours: I to get at once such passports as were necessary, Herbert to see Startop at his lodgings. When this did what we had to do without any hindrance, and we met again at one o'clock reported it done. I, for my part, was prepared with passports; Herbert had seen Startop, and he was more than ready to join.

Those two should pull a pair of oars, we settled, and I should steer; our charge would be sitter, and keep quiet in the boat: as was not my object, we should make way enough. We arranged that Herbert should not come home to dinner before seven by Mill Pond Bank that evening; that he should not go there at all tomorrow evening, Tuesday; that he should prepare Provis for our visit to some Stairs hard by the house, on Wednesday, when he saw us approach, and not sooner; and that all the arrangements with him should be concluded that Monday night; and that he should be communicated with no more in any way until we took him on board.

These precautions well understood by both of us, I went home.

On opening the outer door of my chambers with my key, I found a letter in the box, directed to me—a very dirty letter, although not illwritten. It was not delivered by hand (of course since I left home), and its contents were these:

"If you are not afraid to come to the old marshes tonight or to-morrow night at Nine, and to come to the little shed-house by the Churchside, you had better come. If you want information regarding your uncle Provis, you had much better come and tell no one and lose no time. You must come alone. Bring this with you."

I had had loud enough upon my mind before the receipt of this strange letter. What to do now I could not tell. And the worst was, that I must decide quickly, or I should miss the afternoon coach, which would take me down in time for to-night. To-morrow night I could not think of going, for it would be too close upon the time of the flight. Then again, for any thing I knew, the proffered information might have some important bearing on the flight itself.

If I had had ample time for consideration I believe I should still have gone. Having hardly any time for consideration—my watch showing me that the coach started within half an hour—I resolved to go. I should certainly not have gone but for the reference to my Uncle Provis; that, coming on Wemmick's letter and the morning's busy preparation, turned the scale.

It is so difficult to become clearly possessed of the contents of almost any letter, in a violent hurry, that I had to read this mysterious epistle again, twice, before its injunction to me to be secret got mechanically into my mind. Yielding to it in the same mechanical kind of way, I left a note in pencil for Herbert, telling him that as I should be so soon going away, I knew not for how long, I had decided to hurry down and back, to ascertain for myself how Miss Havisham was faring. I had then barely time to get my great-coat, lock up the chambers, and make for the coach-office by the short by-ways. If I had taken a hackney-chariot and gone by the streets, I should have missed my aim; going as I did, I caught the coach just as it came out of the yard. It was the only inside passenger, picking away knee-deep in straw, when I came to it.

For I really had not been myself since the receipt of the letter; it had so bewildered me ensuing on the hurry of the morning. The morning hurry and flutter had been great, for, long and anxiously as I had waited for Wemmick, his hint had come like a surprise at last. And now I began to wonder at myself for being in the coach, and to doubt whether I had sufficient reason for going down, and to consider whether I should get out presently and go back, and to argue against ever heeding an anonymous communication, and, in short, to pass through all those phases of contradiction and indecision to which I suppose very few hurried people are strangers. Still, the inducement to Provis by name mastered every thing. I reasoned as I had reasoned already without knowing it—for that be reasoning—that no real harm should befall him through my not going, how could I ever forgive myself?

It was dark before we got down, and the journey seemed long and dreary to me who could see little of it inside, and who could not go outside in my disabled state. Avoiding the Blue Boar, I put up at an inn of minor reputation down the town, and ordered some dinner. While it was preparing, I went to Satis House and inquired for Miss Havisham; she was still very ill, though considered something better.

My inn had once been a farm-house, an ancient ecclesiastical house, and I dined in a little octagonal common-room, like a font. As I was not able to use my disabled arm, a pair of pincers with a shining bald head did it for me. This bringing us into conversation, he was so good as to entertain me with my own case, of which he was with the popular feature that Pumblechook was my earliest benefactor and the founder of my fortunes.

"Do you know the young man?" said I.

"Know him!" repeated the landlord. "Ever since he was in knee-breeches!"

"Does he ever come back to this neighborhood?"

"Ay, he comes back," said the landlord, "to his great friends now and again, and gives the cold shoulder to the man that made him."

"What man is that?"

"Him that I speak of," said the landlord. "Mr. Pumblechook."

"Is he acquainted to no one else?"

"No doubt he would be if he could," returned the landlord; "but he can't. And why? Because Pumblechook done every thing for him."

"Does Pumblechook say so?"

"Say so! He's always a-telling of it. "He han't no call to say so."

"But does he say so?"

The landlord's own man's blood to white wine winegar to hear him tell of it, Sir," said the landlord.

I thought, "Yet Joe, dear Joe, you never tell of it! Long-suffering and loving Joe, you never complain! Nor you, sweet-tempered Biddy!"

"Your appetite is hearty enough like by your accident," said the landlord, glancing at the bandaged arm under my coat. "Try a tenderer bit."

"No, thank you," I replied, turning from the table to brood over the fire. "I can eat no more. I think my coach starts early."

I had never been struck at so keenly for my thanklessness to Joe as through the brazen impostor Pumblechook. Joe, Joe, Joe, ha the truer Joe; the meaner he, the nobler Joe.

My heart was deeply and most deservedly humbled as I mused over the fire in that hour or more. The striking of the clock aroused me, but not from my dejection or remorse, and I got up and had my great-coat round my neck.

Lloyd's Map of America

Is Now Ready.

Having been engraved on a new plan entirely, and printed and colored upon a New Press, we can make and color it to low as to defy competition. The usual price of a Map of this size is from $3 to $5.

IT IS FOUR FEET SQUARE,

Printed on an entire sheet of strong white linen paper, and shows to the Eye, at one glance, from CANADA to TEXAS, and is acknowledged by all cultured men to be the most CORRECT, Map ever offered to the people of this country, and is used by them altogether. To show how correct this Map is, we will just say that on the 16th of May, the Alabama and Florida Railroad was opened from Pensacola to Montgomery, Alabama, and it is laid down correctly on our Map.

LLOYD'S RAILROAD MAP SHOWS EVERY RAILROAD IN RUNNING ORDER UP TO FEB. 1, 1861. Every station and city is marked down on the route, and the distances between each station, and the total length of the road. Every River in America is traced out, and the Towns and Cities on the Ohio and Mississippi, and other Rivers, are marked down plainly. ALL THE FORTS, BATTERIES, and STRONGHOLDS IN THIS COUNTRY ARE LAID DOWN PROMINENTLY. The reader can see the situation of the NORTHERN and SOUTHERN STATES, and can comprehend at a glance the immense extent of territory owned by the South, which is worthless by the sea for more than two thousand miles.

In addition to the main Map, there is a Map of FLORIDA BAY and FORTIFICATIONS inserted in the blank space at the foot of the large Map, South, which is on a scale TEN MILES TO AN INCH; at the main Map, showing every Battery, and the counties of Santa Rosa and Escambia, Florida, (which were ceded by Spain to the United States in 1819, for the location of the land grants to the Railroad Company, which IS ALONE WORTH THE PRICE OF THIS MAP.

10,000 CITIES, TOWNS, AND STATIONS ARE LAID DOWN ON LLOYD'S MAP.

A VALUABLE FEATURE.—On the back of the sheet on which Lloyd's Map is printed, is the name of each Railroad, its total length, cost of fare, where passengers breakfast, dine, and sup, and a sketch of every Town, City, River, and Port; also an Historical Sketch, and the population of each place, from the last Census, and other reliable information of the latest date. This information will be of great value to every one at the present time, and is alone worth three times the price of the Map. The amount of information given on the back is equal to an octavo volume of 300 pages—information that can not be had elsewhere for $10—all for 75 cents.

A TIME INDICATOR is also inserted on the face of Lloyd's Great United States Railroad Map, showing the difference in time at Washington, D.C., and the principal cities in this country and Europe. Thus, when it is 12 o'clock, m., at Washington, it is HALF PAST TWO O'CLOCK at the evening hight at Jeddo, Japan—being 14 hours ahead of our time at Jeddo. Lloyd's Map can be folded up and put away without creasing, or hung up on the wall.

Agents will find that they can sell from 20 to 40 copies of the colored edition daily. It can be sent by mail, in strong wrappers, by the quantity, at ONE CENT for copy. Sending the Map by Mail does not injure it at all.

NO LICENSE IS REQUIRED TO SELL THIS MAP IN ANY STATE IN AMERICA.

As there is so much deception practiced on the public now-a-days by issuing Maps of the Seat of War, we have thought it advisable to submit evidence of the correctness of this Map.

CONSTITUENT CONVENTION OF VIRGINIA, ASSEMBLED IN THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AT WHEELING, OHIO CO., JUNE, 1861.—SKETCHED BY JASPER GREEN, ESQ.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE WHEELING CONVENTION.

On the preceding page we illustrate the WHEELING CONVENTION, which has very properly assumed control of the destinies of Virginia, and deposed the present rebel State Government. The following memorandum will show the importance of its proceedings:

The Wheeling Convention, after occupying nearly an entire day in debating the question of reorganizing the State Government, finally adopted it—73 to 2. The principal discussion was upon a proposed amendment, providing that no one who voted for secession should be allowed to hold office in the State during the war. It was rejected—53 to 19. The ordinance as passed provides for the entire reorganization of the Government—every officer to be obliged to swear allegiance anew to the United States, and to repudiate the acts of the Richmond Convention. The next business before the Convention was the choice of a new Governor and Council; and for the former FRANK PIERPONT, of Marion, was selected.

THE WAR.

FORT SUMTER taken! and its siege will fill
No bloody chronicles in after-time.
It was a tame bombardment, if you will,
But in its consequences how sublime!
The first born of the common sons a thrill
Not through the North alone, for every clime
Where liberty is prized, struck with deep sorrow,
Mourned for to-day, and fears the day to-morrow.

The reckless man who for revenge sets fire
Unto his neighbor's house shames a town;
And they who watch the ascending spire admire
Their brilliant glare, but dread their coming down.
So now all anxious Europe shows desire
That War should banish away his angry frown;
For burning Sumter spreads wide consternation—
Who knows how long the sad reverse may be contagious!

The call to arms is answered; ne'er before,
In the world's history, answered with such will.
From the Pacific to the Atlantic shore,
From Oregon to Maine, the cry is, "Still
They come!" Faneuil, the hurried paintings o'er,
They listen to bells, listen—it is drill
And discipline; but theirs is the just cause,
And stern resolve to vindicate their laws.

Their country's goat incites to deeds of glory,
Its proud name inspires nerve the arm nerveless,
Of Southern treachery the shameful story,
With scorn and shame stirs the great North filling,
Forebodes a coming conflict, dire and gory—
Ev'n now his weeping country feels a thrilling
Horror at Sherman's death, which bids the fire
Of passion burn to a relentless ire.

When war is kindled, every blow adds fuel
Unto the flames of vengeance, as the sight
Of blood drawn from a party in a duel
Enrages him that suffers 'tis but right
A cruel blood should find the cruel;
And they who show no mercy in their might
Can not expect it in their hour of need—
Swift on her course does Retribution speed.

A NEW SERIAL BY BULWER.

MR. CHAS. DICKENS'S admirable Tale "GREAT EXPECTATIONS" will be concluded in No. 240 of Harper's Weekly.

We have the pleasure of announcing that it will be followed by the commencement of

A NEW SERIAL TALE
BY SIR EDWARD LYTTON BULWER, ENTITLED

which will be continued from week to week till completed.

The unrivaled merit of the latest works of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer justifies the assertion that his power as a Novelist is steadily on the increase, and warrants the belief that his new Tale will be even more thrillingly interesting than "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" or "MY NOVEL"—both of which were read by at least half a million of people in this country.

THE EXTRA SESSION.

ON 4th of July—within a week—Congress meets at Washington in extra session. The States will be unrepresented, to wit: North Carolina, Tennessee, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas. But as there is no provision in the Constitution requiring every State to send delegations to Congress—all that is required being a bare majority of members entitled to seats—the measures adopted by that body will have the same force and effect in the seceded States as if their people had availed themselves of their constitutional privilege of being represented. The first Congress passed many important laws, whose validity has never been questioned, in the absence of the delegations from several States, and with a bare quorum of members.

Virginia will be represented in both Houses. The Convention now in session at Wheeling will elect senators, and provide for the election of representatives; and the two Houses, which are the sole judges of the "elections, returns, and qualifications of their members," will doubtless admit them without debate.

No Congress that ever met will have so grave a task to perform as this one. Under the imbecile, corrupt, and traitorous Administration of Mr. Buchanan, the last Congress adjourned without legislating for the crisis; even the Force Bill, introduced by Mr. Stanton from the Committee on Military Affairs, was defeated, mainly through the influence of Secretary Cobb and Mr. John Cochrane, who, we notice, has since repented, and now tenders a regiment to Mr. Lincoln.

The measures which will engage the attention of Congress naturally class themselves under four heads:

1. THE ARMY.—An Act must be passed authorizing a permanent increase of the regular army to at least the figure indicated by the President—45,000 men; and also authorizing the acceptance of Volunteers for three years or the war. This act will probably elicit no very strong opposition, as it will only offer two suggestions in regard to it. In the first place, Congress should place it out of the power of the War Department to confer important commands on civilians or politicians, and should insist on every regiment and brigade being commanded by men of huge military experience, let out the feat at Great Bethel teach us this much at least. And, secondly, there should be no stint to the number of volunteers whom the President may accept. It is cheaper, as well as more humane, advantageous in every way to settle this question this year with an army of 300,000 men, than it would be to wage war for three or four years with an army of 100,000 or 200,000.

2. THE NAVY.—A bill will be introduced adding at least 18,000 men to the Navy, and authorizing the construction of vessels of war. This subject, again, will probably elicit no very warm discussion. It may be worth while to observe that between the capes of the Chesapeake and the Mexican frontier there is but one harbor—Pensacola—on which our fifty-odd sloops of war can find admittance. There is not water enough on the bar at Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, or Galveston for any of them to pass it. If, therefore, our blockade is to be thorough and effective, and if we are to chase and capture privateers, we want steam gunboats, drawing from eight to twelve feet of water, and armed with two or three rifled guns. Of these we should have not less than fifty. England has some two hundred of such craft, and finds them useful and economical.

3. WAYS AND MEANS.—This is a subject which is likely to provoke a good deal of discussion. Government will require this year, over and above the ordinary revenue from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000. How is this money to be raised? Various financial schemes are suggested. One is that government stock bearing 6 or 7 per cent. interest, for the money can be raised in this way, but it will cost a heavy sum. At the present time Federal States are worth about 85 cents on the dollar; it is believed that a fresh issue of $50,000,000 would depreciate them fully 20 per cent. Perhaps, however, if the ultimate success of the Government were made palpably certain, public credit would improve. Another scheme is to issue 6 per cent. Treasury Notes for small sums—say $20 and $25. We doubt very much whether any large amount of such notes could be put in circulation without fatally injuring the public credit. To pay troops and purveyors in such Treasury Notes would amount practically to a suspension of specie payments—which would injure our credit irreparably. And it is evidently preposterous to expect the public at large to take Treasury Notes at par, when they can get government bonds bearing the same rate of interest at a heavy discount. Another scheme is to issue Treasury Notes bearing 8 or 10 per cent. interest. This, again, is a ruinously high for money. And the mere mention of such exorbitant rates of interest as 8 and 10 per cent. is suggestive of bankruptcy, and would have a very injurious effect upon the advice is to charter a great bank, and to borrow $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 from it, paying for the loan in 6 per cent. government stock at par. Such a bank would be authorized to issue notes for all the Government stock it held. The question with regard to this scheme is, where would such a bank find stockholders, and where would its profits come from? These and other similar projects will doubtless be fully ventilated by Congress, and one of them will be adopted. Probably the very best method of raising money would be for the General Government to authorize the issue of Federal bonds, to be redeemed either in specie or currency of Northern States. New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Illinois could afford at once to indorse each $10,000,000 of bonds, and the other loyal States smaller amounts; and on these terms money could probably be borrowed at a very small discount indeed. In passing a "money bill" Congress must not neglect to alter the absurd Morrill tariff, which has already as was foretold at the time of its passage—reduced the Customs revenue to a nominal figure, and disgusted our friends in Europe. We must now have a revenue tariff; one that will not exclude imports, but one which will bring a round sum monthly into the Treasury, and will leave the makers of wood-screws, carpets, and steel to rely on their own merits. Tea, coffee, and sugar should pay their share of taxes; and foreign manufactures should be allowed to swell the national income.

4. THE SLAVERY QUESTION.—This, without doubt, will be the most difficult problem with which Congress will have to grapple. And yet it can not be neglected. As was clearly foreseen at the outset, the Slave States have put their armies march slavery disappears before them. Not that our troops are necessarily abolitionists. But the slaves run away or are abandoned as the troops advance. An old negro found at Hampton by one of our regiments, the other day, being asked if he had run away from his master, replied, "No; massa run away from me!" It must be so throughout the revolted section of the country. As our armies advance the masters will run away from the slaves, or the slaves will run away from the masters. In either event the slave will be the same. Now so long as we are on the border of Virginia, and the runaways and derelicts amount to a few hundred in each week, it is easy to provide for them, and to keep books of account with their reputed owners. But when the refugees are counted by thousands and tens of thousands what is to be done with them? This is a question which should not be left to the discretion of the Federal commanders. Men's opinions will differ: Government should have a uniform policy. The Border States, the North, moreover, who will be sorely taxed to provide means to put down this rebellion, have a right to know whether any part of their money will be used for the support of thousands of fugitive slaves who, after the war, are to be returned to their conquered owners. The question, we admit, is very embarrassing. Every possible solution presents great difficulties. But it is the duty of Congress to decide it one way or another, and we trust members will go to Washington prepared to assume the responsibility.

THE LOUNGER.

THE HEALTH OF THE VOLUNTEERS

Is a regular army of soldiers die of disease for one that falls in battle. If there are forty-five thousand volunteers in and near Washington on the first of July, it is probable that there might not be more than twenty thousand on the first of October, even if no battle were fought. Of a Southern regiment recruited in Mexico some eight hundred strong, only about one hundred and fifty returned, yet not a hundred were lost in the field. The horror of war is not the carnage that death opens the gate of glory to the soldier, but the fever and wasting disease that slowly eats his life away. At this moment it is not Beauregard, or Johnston, nor Polmore, nor Bragg, who is the most dangerous foe thy threaten our soldiers; but it is dysentery, cholera, typhus, and all forms of acute and fatal disease. These are the terrible warriors who fight against each side, and be is the masterly General who defeats them in his own camp, and leaves them to deal with the enemy in theirs.

But they are defeated not with arms, but by science and good sense; and the purpose of the Sanitary Commission is to help the volunteer regiments in to fight them with these weapons. The Sanitary department which cared for our little regular army is not prepared to act adequately when that army swells in a month to hundreds of thousands. The acting Surgeon-General of the United States Army, Dr. Wood, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, a month since, requesting the appointment of a Sanitary Board of Consultation with regard to the sanitary measures for the continued health of the whole force of the United States. It was to be auxiliary to the present department.

The good sense and absolute necessity of such a Commission are too apparent to be argued. The liberal expenditure of the English army in the Crimea is enough to show what the regiments which daily leave us are marching to, if the proper care is not taken.

The Commission was at once named by the Secretary of War, and approved by the President. It is composed of five eminent persons, seven of whom are of the medical profession; three of whom, including the acting surgeon, belong to the army. These gentlemen have no axes to grind of any kind. They are not politicians. They are all men of known ability in various vocations in different parts of the country. They thoroughly comprehend their work; they are anxious to do it; and they do it entirely without salary, and purely for the love of the country, the citizens, and the cause. But they want money, of course, to pay permanent agents at Washington and other subsidiary centres, as well as men, not only of proper scientific duration, but of practical executive efficiency in details. Traveling expenses, printing, &c., must be paid for.

For many very evident reasons the Commission prefers to appeal directly to the public and not to Congress. The Government has given it rooms in the Treasury building. The Surgeon-General of the Army has given it full authority to inspect and examine all posts, camps, and hospitals; and the Secretary of War has ordered that all persons in Government service shall assist the Commission in the interests. And one of the most efficient administrative men in the country, Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted, the Architect-in-chief of the Central Park, will serve as Resident Secretary and General Agent in Washington.

Here is no department of service in the war that will be more beneficial than this, if it be furnished the means to work. If it is entailed to do what it can do, it will save twenty thousand out of every hundred thousand lives that are offered for the war, which would otherwise be lost from exposure and disease.

It is not a charity; it is a duty, as all great humane efforts are. Whoever wishes to do his or her duty may send subscriptions or donations to the treasurer, George J. Strong, 68 Wall Street, New York.

KEEPING COOL.

We can not too constantly remember, in this mid-summer heat of excitement, that the reports which so often discourage and chill us are only the surmises and speculations of persons who are not likely to be Intrusted with state and military secrets. Doubtless the authorities at Washington are as incessantly engaged in defending themselves from the telegraph reporters to the newspapers as in guarding the capital from rebellious assault. But the amiable reporters must say something. The paper with which they correspond must have something, if a serious question is possible; and if a rumor be racy enough it flies forward at once.

Then we should remember that the comments of the people themselves are colored by many influences. Personal and private jealousies, not utterly unknown even to editors, play their full parts. To this point, for instance, nothing has been done by this Secretary will ever seem wise, patriotic, or noble. It will be done from some mean motive. Some contract will be helped; some friend is to be served; until at length you are forced to believe that the paper would rather see the country ruined than saved by any particular Secretary. To that paper, again, the entire military movement seems slow and ineffective. It publishes leading articles containing details of the weakness of this or that position upon our side. Every thing which should be as carefully concealed from the enemy as it is promptly communicated to our military authorities, is paraded in the paper, while rebels chuckle and patriots look grave.

The position of the Government is very disagreeable, because this constant fret of captious and ill-informed criticism begets doubt and discontent in the public mind. A truly patriotic journal, appreciating the inevitable difficulties of the Government, understanding that no paper knows the actual intentions of the Administration, will help rather than hinder, and will prevent any private quarrels until the public welfare is secured.

THE FOURTH.

THE Fourth of July will this year have a significance it has never had since the year of the Declaration. For the country is now engaged in proving that the Government founded upon the principles of that instrument is more vitally strong than any other.

The Declaration of Independence contains a new philosophy of government. It asserts that government is justly based upon the will and exists for the welfare of the people; and therefore that when it ceases to promote that welfare it may be properly changed. The will of the people is the great doctrine of the Declaration; and the will of the people is the battle-cry of this war. Neither one man nor a few men shall successfully pervert the government. It is the very essence of all revolt that one man shall submit to the law or suffer the penalty.

Some foreign critics profess that they can not understand why, under the Declaration, a hundred or people in this country may not refuse to obey the laws. Simply for the same reason that they may not do it in England. The Declaration says that when the people finds the government destructive of their rights, they may change the government. It does not say that government shall obey the whim of the citizens. And the people means all the people.

The English and foreign critics of the Declaration have probably no knowledge of its actual character. Even Mr. Choate, in a burst of fiery rhetoric, called it "the passionate manifesto of a revolutionary war." There could not be a more curiously untrue statement. Of all important state papers upon record, there is none more carefully considered than this. Every word is weighed. Every principle is proved. Every assertion is verified. There is nothing rash in it or in the style of it. It begins by declaring that all men are created equal, and it means precisely that. Otherwise the whole system of government it founds is futile. It declares no absurdity. It does not say that all men are of equal capacity any more than of equal stature. The quality of the Declaration is the equality of rights. And our struggle now is to maintain those rights, and to vindicate the will of the people.

On the Fourth of July let every man in the land read and ponder the Declaration of Independence, and let it will form in his heart and hand stronger in the good old cause of the people.

THE NEXT QUESTION.

CAN the duty of every citizen to obey the laws of the land, or pay the penalty of disobedience, be a matter of compromise? He may choose between obedience and the penalty, but shall he be allowed to set the laws aside by force?

This is the question which it is supposed Mr. Crittenden will ask the country at the extra session. And it is further supposed that he relies upon "property" to sustain him.

Every property-holder has then a very simple question to ask himself. What makes property most secure? The answer is equally simple; a strong government. Would he rather have property in England or in Mexico? And why?

Under the present circumstances, then, how is our Government to be made strongest? by putting down rebellion unconditionally, or by treating with armed rebels? Grant that civil war is frightful: which is preferable, civil war or anarchy? Did England act unwisely or inhumanly when she expelled James Second by the strong hand and established William Third. The knife is a sharp remedy, but mortification of the limb is a worse evil.

Is it for the interest of "property" as well as all other elements of national vigor and permanence that the disease of treason shall be cut off the body of this country, or plastered and oiled over? Men of wealth hope to leave it to those who follow them. Do they wish to leave their children, also, a worse war than this?

The leaders of the rebellion, the chief public men of the Slave States, have long openly avowed loyalty to their States first, and then to the Confederation, as they have generally preferred to call the Union. In the speech of Mr. A. H. Stephens, the "Vice-President" of the Confederate Slave States, delivered at Augusta upon his retirement from Congress, and as he thought from public life, in June, 1859, he says: "As matters now stand, so far as the sectional questions are concerned, I see no cause of danger either to the Union or Southern security in it. The former has always been with me, and ought to be with you, subordinate to the latter."

Mr. Stephens is now in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States. His position now and his principles then are by plain enough. He frankly says that he acknowledges a political allegiance paramount to that he owes the Government of his country. To assert that allegiance he takes up arms against his country. Will Mr. Crittenden, or any body else, explain what compromise Stephens seeks in Mr. Crittenden, supported by the "property" interest, succeeds in compromising with Mr. Stephens. Will they insist as a preliminary that he shall unconditionally recognize the Government, or will they allow that his allegiance to the nation may be "subordinate" to his loyalty to Georgia? Where does the compromise come in?

It will not suffice that the Government promises Mr. Stephens that there shall be no more discussion of slavery. Whether agreement to be faithful to the Government so long as nothing is said or done about slavery? And do capitalists think that such a compromise would secure their property?

In a word, is the Government of the United States to buy the allegiance of citizens by promising not to discuss certain public questions?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE BONES OF WASHINGTON.

[From Punch.]

A YEAR ago, and by the maples brown,
Overlooking Wild Potomac's broadened way,
Barebacked stood the heir of England's crown,
By the pet stone that shuts in Hickory grave,
Giving meet reverence to the dead that lay
Beneath the sod, and by the stone o'er that stone,
Which nothing of inscription doth display
To mar the majesty that broods upon
The ten plain letters spelling WASHINGTON.

England's crown-prince at this arch-rebel's tomb,
First Magistrate's, co-flower of the States
That rose impatient for more elbow-room,
And flung the English crown out of their gates.
The contrast of those times and these so shows
In this rapscot of Prima for Presidents,
That e'en the trite prize-poem-maker flows,
Into some lines of grave and deep lament,
Describing that young head in solemn reverence bent.

Passed there a stir from wasting bone to bone,
Ran there a thrill through the great chief's gray dust,
That the old king's great grandson 'neath his stone
Should owe the bend, owning him great and just?
Hovered his plaied spirit near and bent
That latest victory of truth o'er time,

When discords, slow but sure resolved, attest
The high and holy harmonies which chime
Their broader mode through the spheres sublime?

He was there foresight of the woe to be
Before the lapse of twelve months and a day?
Was that great spirit present to see
The stripes and stars torn from that flag away?
To know the work that he had lived to do,
And now and then, was good, before he died,
Undone—his glorious Union cleft in two,
And its starving, wrath and more an angry side,
Till none can say how far the fragments may divide.

So far be the day that we can with smaze,
When those to whom his life from youth he gave,
His own Virginians, his own dear land
Borthers from brothers bearing, as from foes,
His home that still their home to leave he fled,
Who now draw impious swords, near his dishonored bed?

To ACTORS WHO ARE NOT WORTH A THOUGHT.—We notice that there is a play called "Acting and Thinking." This is to distinguish it, we imagine, from the generality of Acting, in which thinking has no part whatever.

RURAL INSANITY.—A country correspondent, who seems anxious to be kicked, writes that diving for an egg in a cool stream this sweltering weather is a process he has found to be egg-streamly pleasant.

THE MOST IMPORTANT ORDER OF THE DAY.—What to order for dinner.

MEDICAL REFORM.—We take the liberty of asking Apothecaries' Hall—or, more properly speaking, we 'pr'ythee the reverend Society of Apothecaries—the following question, which, we hope, they will not absurdly consider in the light of "throwing physic to the dogs:" Since Quinine is made from bark, would it not taste much better, and the meaning of it be more sound altogether, to call it "Cinchonine?" As answer, in the shape of an amended label, will oblige.

SMOKING KNOWLEDGE.—Personal acquaintance with a galvanic battery.

While thousands fall by clashing swords, ten thousands fall by covert-hordes; yet giddy females (thoughtless train!) for the sake of bustling yield to pads.

"Shall you be at the May meeting?" said a pious rector to his subordinate. "Oh! dear, no, Sir," replied the confidant coxsin, speaking up to pray: "I never go to parse-ons."

Such was the spirit of opposition between the proprietors of two rival coaches, that one was lately advertised to carry passengers to Liverpool at the following rates: "Inside, vitat you please; outside, ditto!" This seemed to carry the matter as far as it would go; but the other party were not to be discouraged, and in a few days they issued placards, stating that their coach would take passengers at the following rates: "Inside, nothing at all, and a bottle of wine included; outside, ditto, ditto!"

A lady making inquiries of a boy about his father, an intemperate man, who had been dead some time, asked whether he had regained his appetite. "No, ma'am," said the boy, "as exactly his appetite is very poor, but his drinkatite is as good as ever."

A schoolmaster asked one of his boys, on a cold winter morning, what was the reason of the cold. The boy hesitated a little, when the master said—"Why, don't you know?" "Yes, Sir," said the boy, "I have it at my finger ends."

James Smith used to tell, with great glee, a story showing the general conviction of dislike to rumblties. He was sitting in the library at a country house, when a gentleman proposed a quiet stroll in the pleasure-grounds. "Stroll with you on the gravel walk, indeed!" "Yes, I was that plain enough, and I wish I'd brought one too; but they are all out now." "Well, well, then?" "What then? Why, my dear fellow, you don't mean to say that you really have got the gout?" "Indeed I have, and only put on that shoe to get off being shown over the improvements."

Dr. Madden, when in the West Indies, one day undertook to read the burial service over a negro, which was listened to with great attention. But when the doctor came to the part of "Dust to dust, ashes to ashes," the negro who followed in the long gang stopped short with a spade of earth for the usual ceremony, interrupted him with an intimation that he had neglected to order the coffin to be put down first: "Put him in de hole first, massa, always put him in de hole first."

The Moon, like certain politicians, changes every thirty days, when she looks at things in general with quite a new face. If a fact were wanting to determine the sex of the moon, it would be found in her obstinacy about her age. Like most ladies, she is never more than a day older than thirty.

A RETIRED PARSON.—There is a story of an old abbé who had invited a friend to partake of a dish of ortolans. He preferred them done in batter, but friend in oil, and diverticus had been given. The friend came early, and while the abbé was down in a fit and shortly died. As not a moment was to be lost, the abbé ran to the head of the stairs, and called out, "Do them all in batter!" He then took measures for the proper disposal of his guest.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE BATTLE OF BOONVILLE.

A DISPATCH to the St. Louis Republican, dated Jefferson City, June 19, gives the following version of the battle at Boonville:

The United States troops landed at a wood-yard, about five miles this side of Boonville, and one mile below the encampment of the State troops; the latter had a battery near Boonville, planted toward the river, but it was unconvented by the United States troops, and proved perfectly useless. Immediately after landing, the United States troops advanced upon the State troops, who met them in a lane, and kept up a rapid fire for some time; a short skirmish the United States troops retreated into a wood-field, whither they were followed in hot pursuit by the State troops, who undoubtedly thought they had the advantage—some prisoners have reported that this movement on the part of the United States troops was a mere stratagem. They had no sooner taken a stand in the wheat-field than they opened upon a most destructive fire upon the State troops, routing and nearly confusing and disconcerting the remainder. After the lapse of a very short time the State troops were totally routed, and fled in every direction. Governor Jackson was about a mile off, surrounded by Captain Kelly's company as a body guard. It is reported that he was severely reprimanded during the engagement by men of his own party for lack of discretion and coward-ice. Governor Jackson was the result he and Captain Kelly's company, and Monroe Parsons, according to some reports, were killed while trying to cross the river. General Price's absence is accounted for in the following way: On Sunday morning he repet ved the message to the Governor by none of his picked-guards that seven hacks were coming to surrender, loaded with United States troops. A convulsion was at once had between the Governor and General Price, the result of which was that Governor Jackson sent orders to the troops to disband, as they could not successfully contend once against such a force. General Price then left for home. The troops, however, were exceedingly displeased with the Governor's order, and said they were determined to have a fight. Colonel Richardson, Price's adjutant, who commanded them, became disaffected and resigned. A few hours afterward the report about the seven steamboats proved to be untrue. The Governor then agreed to revoke his order, and recommended his troops to muster their polities, and prepare for resistance to the United States troops. He also issued a proclamation stating that the command had been given to me Mr. Little. What the sequel was is related above.

No one has any certain data as to the number of killed and wounded, and those taken prisoners. It is certain, however, that on one side the State troops in a position where he could have mowed them down with terrible effect, but instead of firing they fled to stop just at that time, and proceeded to make prisoners.

A PROCLAMATION FROM GENERAL LYON.

After the battle Lyon issued a very sensible and firm proclamation to the people of Missouri. He states that the prisoners whom he captured are mostly immatured youths misled by designing persons duped and misled by their leaders, and that he liberated them upon promising that they will not again take up arms against the Government. He reminds the people, however, that the clemency of the Government can not be relied upon in the case of persons taken in arms against its authority. He assures them that his mission is not to invade their private rights as citizens, or to interfere with their business occupations, and he implores all loyal citizens to return to their ordinary avocations, in which they shall be protected.

REAPPEARANCE OF GOVERNOR JACKSON.

General Lyon's proclamation seems to have done much. With 500 men he arrived at St. Louis on Tuesday, stole a march properly, and rallied round him all the State leaders, but the chances of catching him were slight.

A NEW GOVERNMENT FOR MISSOURI.

There is a proposition on foot to hold a State Convention for the purpose of deposing Governor Jackson, who is a rebellion against the United Government and has fled to parts unknown, and electing new State officers.

OCCUPATION OF HARPER'S FERRY.

Harper's Ferry has once more in possession of the Government, and this without striking a blow. On Saturday, at noon, the advance of General Patterson's column, which has been operating on the Potomac, at Edward's Ferry and Berlin, crossed the Blue Ridge, on the way to the Ferry, and one of General Patterson's columns is reported to have passed through Greencastle, in the same direction. We have also a corroborative dispatch from Hagerstown, which states that the Sixth, the Fifteenth, and the Twenty-fourth Pennsylvania Regiments had marched to take possession of the Maryland Heights, looking down upon the Ferry. This position of General Cadwalader's command appears to be unchanged. Four regiments are in camp about a mile and a half from Williamsport, and Butler's is on the Williamsport Bluffs; Perkin's Eight Regiment Battery is between the Antietam and Williamsport; four regiments are two miles from Williamsport, on the Greencastle road; five companies of cavalry are a mile below Hagerstown, on the Frederick road; three regiments are two miles further on; a battery and also two miles below Hagerstown, on the Sharpsburg turnpike.

THE AFFAIR AT VIENNA.

Brigadier-General Schenck, in pursuance of orders received from the chief officer in command on the south side of the Potomac, left the camp at Alexandria on Monday, 17th, with the First regiment of Ohio volunteers, Colonel M'Cook, and regiments under Colonels Wheaton, Lee, and Hampshire Ballford, placing guards at the various important points. The object of the trip was one of reconnoissance, and for the protection of the railroad track, which had been injured by the rebels; and also to look after guerrillas, as the train in which the Connecticut regiment had gone down on Saturday had been fired into by some person and one man killed. When nearing Vienna, as the few remaining companies in the train were turning the curve, a masked battery suddenly opened fire upon the troops with fatal effect. The guns were well placed, commanding a deep cut of the railway, and the fire could not be returned by our troops, nor could the batteries be outflanked or turned, because of the nature of the ground. In consequence of the engineer backing a hasty retreat with the locomotive, our troops were deprived of a rallying point, and of all means of transportation for the wounded, except by means of litters and blankets. Notwithstanding these disadvantages our troops were soon got order to a point where they intended to await the arrival of reinforcements. About twelve of our men were killed.

THE NEUTRALITY OF KENTUCKY.

The Louisville papers contain the particulars of an agreement made between General Buckner, commanding the Kentucky State forces, and General M'Clellan, commanding the Ingalls regiment of the West, which is a full declaration that Kentucky shall be neutral ground in the contest between the Government and the rebels. The Kentucky authorities agree to protect the United States property in the State, to enforce the laws of the United States according to the interpretation of the United States Courts, and to exercise all obligations of neutrality as against the Southern States, while General M'Clellan agrees not to cross the Kentucky border, even though Southern armies occupy her soil; but the Kentucky authorities must not allow Southern troops to march through the State for that purpose. General M'Clellan will claim the same right of occupation. The State, however, can call upon General M'Clellan for aid to expel the rebel troops. A different policy on the part of either party renders the necessity for a previous notice to the other. It is understood that General M'Clellan, of Tennessee, has given in his adhesion to the arrangement.

THE STATE ELECTION THERE.

The special election for Members of Congress (Clouse) in Kentucky, has resulted as follows:

I.—HENRY C. BURNETT (State Rights), re-elected.
II.—JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, (Union) Thomas O. Peyton.
III.—HENRY GRIDER, vice FRANCIS M. BRISTOW.
IV.—LAWRENCE S. TRIMBLE, (Union) vice COMMODORE SHANNON.
V.—CHARLES A. WICKLIFFE, vice JOHN YOUNG BROWN.
VI.—ROBERT MALLORY, re-elected.
VII.—ROBERT MALLORY, re-elected.
VIII.—LUCIEN ANDERSON, vice WILLIAM E. SIMMS.
IX.—WILLIAM H. WADSWORTH, vice LABAN T. MOORE.
X.—JOHN S. MENZIES, vice JOHN W. STEVENSON.

All "Union" but Burnett, and all new Members but Burnett and Mallory. Burnett's majority is reduced from over 3000 in 1859 to 1,200 now, while the "Union" men have generally overwhelming majorities—often three or four to one.

THE SLAUGHTER AT GREAT BETHEL.

The official returns of the killed and wounded at the battle of Big Bethel show a total of seventy-four—which, however, included, fourteen dangerously wounded, five missing, and thirty-three only slightly injured. Two of these casualties occurred in the mistaken engagement between the Massachusetts and New York Volunteer regiments.

THE STRENGTH OF OUR ARMY.

The Secretary of War has informed the President that there are 225,000 men enrolled in the service of the United States.

OFFERS TO DESTROY THE "BROOKLYN."

A French engineer has made offers to destroy the blockading steamer Brooklyn for twenty thousand dollars, and a Yankee mechanical genius is willing to undertake the job for sixty thousand dollars; and a third proposes to do the work nearly for one hundred thousand dollars—payment to be made when the job is finished.

RIOT AT MILWAUKIE.

A very serious riot occurred last week at Milwaukie. The mob attacked several banking-houses, maltreated the persons employed there, and destroyed property to a considerable amount. The military were called out, the first company of which fired, and several charged with having fired that were not, and one shot dead. It was under martial law, and troops were sent for from neighboring towns.

PERSONAL.

Hon. John S. Phelps, member of Congress from the sixth district of Missouri, has been chosen Colonel of a regiment of Union volunteers at Springfield, Missouri.

George M. Dallas will decline to be a candidate for Congress in the second district of Pennsylvania.

Colonel Converse, the brother of the Secretary of War, has been elected to the command of the Seventy-ninth Regiment of New York, known as the Highland Regiment.

Tennessee is to be included in the military district under command of Major-General Robert Patterson.

Among the Second-Lieutenants recently appointed in the Regular Army, the avenger of Colonel Ellsworth's death.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

GREGORY WITHDRAWS HIS MOTION.

In the House of Commons, on the 13th, Mr. Gregory agreed to postpone his motion, in the form of the resolution of the rebel confederacy in England, indefinitely. It was remarked that a discussion on the constitutional question of the war would be premature at present.

In a letter to the Times Mr. Gregory declares that he has in his mind no hostility to the Government of the Confederacy: "I advocate the recognition of the Southern Confederacy because I believe the success of the Southern North from the South as more dead as national Here at last several Baltic, the slave-trade. Hitherto we have received objections rather than encouragement, that the United States in our endeavors to put down that traffic. Free Northerners have always complained that Southern prejudices have been a bar to their hearty co-operation with us. They have now got rid of those prejudices; perhaps the Cuban slave-trade is mainly carried on by ships sailing from Northern ports and fitted out by Northern capital. I look forward with confidence to the future action of the United States Government to restrain their citizens at least from this odious enterprise. As for the South, the slave-trade has been fitfully and effectively forbidden by the constitution; that constitution has been ratified by the several Confederate States, and I should, had I a casting-vote, be seen in a position to prove from various reasons to the House of Commons the sincerity of the Southern President and Congress on this point.

"I advocate the recognition of the Southern States, because I am of opinion that by this separation the area of slave-specific industry will be circumscribed, instead of increased."

BRITISH TROOPS FOR CANADA.

The British army reinforcements for Canada, to be shipped by the Great Eastern and Golden Fleece, exceed three thousand and five hundred men, including a battery of the royal artillery.

FRANCE

FRANCE TO BE NEUTRAL.

The Paris Moniteur of the 11th June publishes an official declaration of neutrality from the Emperor. In which he says that he "has resolved to maintain a strict neutrality in the conflict which is now going on between the Government of the Union and the States which claim to form a separate confederation." The Moniteur also publishes several articles specifying the measures of neutrality which French subjects are to observe, such as accepting no commission from either side to arm vessels of war, and not enrolling in the military service of either. Frenchmen residing in France or abroad are alike required to abstain from any hostile act contrary to neutrality. The proclamation concludes as follows: "His Majesty declares, moreover, that the permission who has confirmed in the present injunctions can lay claim to any protection from his Government against the acts or measures, whatever they may be, which the belligerents may exercise or decree."

THE BATTLE OF ROMNEY.

We publish on this page a picture of THE BATTLE OF ROMNEY, where the Eleventh Indiana Regiment defeated a much larger force of Secessionists on 11th June. An attentive correspondent, Mr. Gookins, of the Eleventh Indiana, has sent us the sketch, which we reproduce, as also the following letter:

CAMP MCCLUNG (CUMBERLAND, MD.), June 14, 1861.

On the evening of the 12th of June Colonel Lewis Wallace, commanding the Eleventh (ZOUAVE) Indiana Regiment, stationed at this place, having received intelligence of a camp of secessionists at Romney, Virginia, where they were said to be assembled in considerable numbers, well armed and equipped, also having erected a battery of two pieces of cannon, headed a detachment of four hundred men, of whom your correspondent was one, and leaving this place at nine P.M., proceeded by rail to Piedmont, twenty-one miles distant from here; there debarking, marched over a rugged mountain road twenty-three miles to Romney, arriving there at 9 A.M. June 13. On coming within a mile of Romney we were fired on by the picket-guard of the rebels, while passing through a defile walled in by tremendous cliffs. At the sound of the first gun, however, we deployed as skirmishers, and being scattered thus no one was hurt on our side. We returned their fire and killed one of the pickets. He was seen to fall and slide down the side of the mountain about twenty feet, when his body lodged against a tree. We then rushed forward, and passing out of the defile came to a long covered bridge. On the other side of the river the rebels had planted their cannon and trained them upon the bridge; our men, however, dashed forward through the bridge with a yell, when the cowards of whom there was quite a large body posted on the hills fled without firing a shot from their cannon. This is the subject of my illustration. On reaching the farther end of the bridge our advance was again fired on by a body of rebels who were posted in a brick house about seventy-five yards away from the bridge. Here the orderly-sergeant of Company A of our regiment was slightly wounded—not at all dangerously. The men run forward, firing as they run, riddling the house with Minié balls. The rebels, however, escaped by the back entrance into the hills back of the house. One more was killed here, and another very badly wounded in the thigh. While this was going on we were again fired on from the mountains back of us. No one hurt. We then moved forward to the town, where we learned for the first time the number of the secession soldiery; there were five companies of them in the aggregate—over four hundred men—well armed with Derringer rifles and United States rifles. In their retreat they were so pushed that they left behind their baggage, some rifles, tents, swords, pistols, etc., etc. We took seven officers' marquees, a quantity of uniforms, and large quantities of clothing, a secession flag, four horses (one of which was the rebel colonel's riding-horse), four large chests of ammunition, camp equipage, and a great variety of other articles. Three wagons were laden with the best part of things taken, and the rest were destroyed. We learned that the rebels had received information of our approach an hour before we arrived from a horseman. This enabled them to prepare for a retreat, and, much to our chagrin, they thus succeeded in saving their cannon.

THE BATTLE AT PHILIPPI.

We illustrate on this page THE BATTLE OF PHILIPPI, which took place on 3d June. We published an account of this brilliant little affair in a recent number; and here we will only add, that a few companies of Indians, Ohio, and Virginia volunteers entirely demolished a large force of secessionists assembled at Philippi, under the command of Colonel Porterfield, driving them out of the place, with the loss of all their baggage and most of their arms. Our artist writes:

The scene shown in the picture is the principal street in Philippi. The large building on the left is the Court-house of Barbour County, Virginia, now occupied as the head-quarters of the Federal troops. The roof of the hotel just beyond the Court-house shows plainly the effects of a cannon-ball. I was told that it carried away a secession flag. The Union flag is now floating in its place. The road between the Court-house and hotel is the one by which Colonel Kelly entered the town. The intention was for him to have come in by the road which you see turning to the right at the extreme end of the picture. About a mile's-throw beyond this turn is where Colonel Kelly fell.

EVACUATION OF HARPER'S FERRY.

We publish on page 428 a view of HARPER'S FERRY AFTER THE EVACUATION by the rebel troops, and on page 429 an illustration of the BURNING OF THE RAILROAD BRIDGE at that point, as seen from the trestle-work platform. Both are from sketches by a regular correspondent. A special agent of the press visited Harper's Ferry on 15th, and reported as follows:

The Confederate army has left the place. The route of the main body was by turnpikes leading to Charlestown and Shepardstown. At five o'clock this morning the great bridge of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad over the Potomac was fired, and soon after a tremendous report was heard, caused by an explosion of a mine under the centre span. In one hour the entire structure was in ruins and fell into the water. This was a noble piece of work, it being one thousand feet long, and was built by Engineer Latrobe but ten years since in the most scientific manner. It has six spans, and cost considerable. The damage to property is not confined here, but the Railroad Company and the United States have suffered further losses of valuable works. The body of the trestling on which the road was supported from the bridge to the end of the Government property, about half a mile in extent, is nearly all destroyed, as well as the upper bridge, of one hundred and twenty feet in length, over the Government canal. The telegraph station buildings and the other railroad works are also demolished. The long range of substantial buildings formerly occupied as the Government armory is burned to the ground, with the exception of two at the west end, near the Shenandoah. Fire has been raging all day, and we can see left it was just breaking out in the rear muskets. The rifle-works on the Shenandoah were fired in the afternoon.

TENNESSEE RIFLEMEN MARCHING TO THE WAR.

We publish on page 426 a picture representing a regiment of TENNESSEAN RIFLEMEN PASSING THROUGH WINCHESTER en route for HARPER'S FERRY. The Tennesseans are soldierly looking fellows enough; it is sad to think they are engaged in so bad a cause. The artist says:

My picture represents the Tennessee and Southwestern Virginia Riflemen entering Winchester, on their way to Harper's Ferry. This regiment came up from Richmond to Strasburg by way of the Manassas Gap Railroad, and marched from thence to Winchester, a distance of 22 miles, in one day. They are mostly hunters and men used to outdoor life, and are all, besides their rifles, armed with tomahawk, bowie-knife, and revolver.

FORDING THE POTOMAC AT WILLIAMSPORT.

On page 429 we illustrate, from a sketch by our special correspondent, on General Williams's staff, THE CROSSING OF THE POTOMAC BY UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS, on 10th instant. A correspondent of the Herald writes under date of 16th from Hagerstown, Maryland:

Well, the everlasting delay in the movement of this corps d'armée is somewhat broken in upon. A real genuine forward movement has begun, notwithstanding the monstrous red-tape circumlocution of the commanding General. Two brigades, the First and Fourth, have actually passed the Potomac, General Cadwallader leading the advance, consisting of five companies of cavalry—four of the Second cavalry, and the First Philadelphia troop; battalion of artillery and infantry, Captain Doubleday's Rhode Island regiment and battery; Sixth, Twenty-first, and Twenty-third Pennsylvania volunteers; Fourth brigade, Colonel D. S. Miles; United States infantry, two companies of Second infantry, five companies of the Third infantry; Ninth, Thirteenth, and Sixteenth Pennsylvania volunteers.

Precisely at twelve o'clock to-day, the United States infantry leading, the Fourth brigade to the water, and took it as if it was their native element. The Volunteers followed. Both marched four abreast as they started, but the ranks were somewhat broken by the depth and stiffness of the current. But right bravely they went wading in water, some places full four feet deep, over a river of remarkable volume and force three hundred and fifty yards wide. It was a stirring sight to see the young volunteers marching with the steadiness and precision of veterans, singing, with the happiest indifference, in one company, "I'll be gay and happy still;" another, "Let the wild world say as it will;" a third, "Red, white, and blue;" a fourth, shouting with wild refrain the chorus of the "star-spangled Banner," until whole regiments would catch and join in its round swelling cadences. The effect was strikingly grand.

The other side of the picture, the bulletins, was also vividly presented. Volunteer after volunteer, while waiting to enter, would doff his nether integuments and enter the water with that portion of his person in puris naturalibus, declaring that Uncle Sam's dry goods were too precious stance to have them wetted.

OUR TROOPS AT ROACH'S SPRINGS, VIRGINIA.

We publish on page 423, from a drawing by a member of our 12th Regiment, a view of the ENCAMPMENT AT ROACH'S SPRINGS, VIRGINIA. The artist writes:

Roach's Springs, Virginia, is situated about two miles north of Alexandria, on the west side of the Potomac, and was the farthest point of advance in that direction by the Federal forces on the 25th of last May. It is reported that their approach drove two hundred secessionists from the old mills where they were quartered. The 12th Regiment, N. Y. S. M., took possession of the buildings and encamped there, being kept in constant readiness for an attack. The 12th was relieved on the 2d inst. by the 1st Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, which still holds the position.

A TEXAN RANGER.

We publish above a sketch, by one of our most reliable artists, of a TEXAN RANGER. A gentleman, just from Richmond, gave the following account of these redoubtable warriors:

Ben M'Cullough's Texan Rangers are described as a desperate set of fellows. They number one thousand hard voyages, each of them mounted upon a mustang horse. Each is armed with a pair of Colt's navy revolvers, a rifle, a tomahawk, a Texan bowie-knife, and a horse. They are described as being very dexterous in the use of the latter. These men are to be pitted against Wilson's Zouaves and M'Mullin's Rangers.

CHAPTER LII.

It was a dark night, though the full moon rose as I left the inclosed lands, and passed out upon the marshes. Beyond their dark line there was a ribbon of clear sky, hardly broad enough to hold the red large moon. In a few minutes she had ascended out of that clear field, in among the piled mountains of cloud.

There was a melancholy wind, and the marshes were very dismal. A stranger would have found them insupportable, and even to me they were so oppressive that I hesitated, half inclined to go back. But I knew them well, and could have found my way on a far darker night, and had no excuse for returning, being there. So, having come there against my inclination, I went on against it.

The direction that I took was not that in which my old home lay, nor that in which we had pursued the convicts. My back was turned toward the distant Hulks as I walked on, and though I could see the old lights away on the spits of sand, I saw them over my shoulder. I knew the lime-kiln as well as I knew the old Battery, but they were miles apart; so that if a light had been burning at each point that night there would have been a long strip of the blank horizon between the two bright specks.

At first I had to shut some gates after me, and now and then to stand still while the cattle that were lying in the banked-up pathway arose and blundered down among the grass and reeds. But after a little while I seemed to have the whole flats to myself.

It was another half hour before I drew near to the kiln. The lime was burning with a sluggish, stifling smell, but the fires were made up and left, and no workmen were visible. Hard by was a small stone quarry. It lay directly in my way, and had been worked that day, as I saw by the tools and barrows that were lying about.

Coming up again to the marsh level out of this excavation—for the rude path lay through it—I saw a light in the old sluice-house. I quickened my pace, and knocked at the door with my hand. Waiting for some reply, I looked about me, noticing how the sluice was abandoned and broken, and how the house—of wood with a tiled roof—would not be proof against the weather much longer, if it were so even now, and how the mud and ooze were coated with lime, and how the shedding vapor of the kiln crept in a ghostly way toward me. Still there was no answer, and I knocked again. No answer still, and I tried the latch.

It rose under my hand, and the door yielded. Looking in, I saw a lighted candle on a table, a bench, and a mattress on a truckle bedstead. As there was a loft above, I called, "Is there any one here?" but no voice answered. Then I looked at my watch, and finding that it was past nine, called again, "Is there any one here?" There being still no answer, I went out at the door, resolute what to do.

It was beginning to rain fast. Seeing nothing save what I had seen already, I turned back into the house and stood just within the shelter of the door, looking out into the night. While I was considering that some one must have been there lately and must soon be coming back, or the candle would not be burning, it came into my head to look if the wick were long. I turned round to do so, and had taken up the candle in one hand, when it was extinguished by some violent shock, and the next thing I comprehended was, that I had been caught round a strong running noose, thrown over my head from behind.

"Now," said a suppressed voice with an oath, "I've got you!"

"What is this?" I cried, struggling. "Who is it? Help, help, help!"

Not only were my arms pulled close to my sides, but the pressure on my bad arm caused me exquisite pain. Sometimes a strong man's hand, sometimes a strong arm, was set sternly against my mouth to deaden my cries, and with a hot breath always close to me, I struggled ineffectually in the dark, with my head pressed tight to the wall. "And now," said the suppressed voice, with another oath, "I call out again, and I'll make short work of finishing you."

Faint and sick with the pain of my injured arm, bewildered by the surprise, and yet conscious how easily this threat could be put in execution, I desisted, and tried to ease my arm were it ever so little. But it was bound too tight for that. I felt as if, having been mind saw it—and thus, as I recovered consciousness, I knew that I was in the place where I had lost it.

Too indifferent at first even to look round and ascertain who supported me, I was lying looking at the ladder, when there came between me and it a face. The face of Trabb's boy!

"I think he's all right!" said Trabb's boy, in a sober voice; "but ain't he just pale though!"

At these words the face of him who supported me looked over into mine, and I saw my supporter to be—

"Herbert! Good Heaven!"

"Softly," said Herbert. "Gently, Handel. Don't be too sure."

"And our old comrade, Startop," I cried, as he too bent over me.

"Remember what he is going to assist us in," said Herbert, "and be calm."

The allusion made me spring up, though I dropped again when the pain in my arm. "The time has not gone by, Herbert, has it? What night is to-night? How long have I been here?" For I had a strange and strong misgiving that I had been lying there a long time—a day and night—two days and nights—more.

"The time has not gone by. It is still Monday night."

"Thank God!"

"And you have all to-morrow, Tuesday, to rest in," said Herbert. "But you can't help groaning, my dear Handel. What hurt have you got? Can you stand?"

"Yes, yes," said I, "I can walk. I have no hurt but in the throbbing arm."

They laid it bare, and did what they could. It was violently swollen and inflamed, and I could scarcely endure to have it touched. But they tore up their handkerchiefs to say fresh bandages, and carefully replaced it in the sling, until we could get to the town and obtain some better help for it put upon it. In a little while we had shut the door of the dark and empty sluice-house, and were passing through the quagmire over the sea-bank. Trabb's boy—Trabb's overgrown young man now—went before us with a lantern, which was the light I had seen come in at the door. But the moon was a good two hours higher than when I had last seen the sky, and the night, though rainy, was much lighter. The wind was on the kite who passing from me as we went by, and, as I had thought a prayer before, I thought a thanksgiving now.

Entrusting Herbert to tell me how he had come to my rescue—which at first he had flatly refused to do, but had insisted on my remaining quiet—I learned that I had in my hurry dropped the letter, open, in our chambers, where he, coming home to bring with him Startop, whom he had met in the street on his way to us, found it very soon after I was gone. Its tone made him uneasy; and the more so because of the inconsistency between it and the hasty letter I had left for him. His uneasiness increasing instead of subsiding after a quarter of an hour's consideration, he set off for the coach-office with Startop, who volunteered his company, to make inquiry when the next coach went down. Finding that the afternoon's coach was gone, and finding that his uneasiness grew into positive alarm as obstacles came in his way, he resolved to follow in a post-chaise. So he and Startop arrived at the Blue Boar, fully expecting there to find me, or tidings of me; but finding neither, went on to Miss Havisham's, where they lost me. Herbert then went back to the hotel (doubtless at about the time when I was hearing the popular local version of my own story) to refresh themselves, and to get some one to guide them out upon the marshes. Among the loungers under the Boar's archway happened to be Trabb's boy—true to his ancient habit of happening to be every where where he had no business—and Trabb's boy had seen me passing from Miss Havisham's in the direction of my dining-place. Thus Trabb's boy became their guide, and with him they went out to the sluice-house: though by the town way to the marshes, which I had avoided. Now as they went along Herbert reflected that I might, after all, have been brought there on some genuine and serviceable errand tending to Provis's safety, and bethinking himself that in that case interruption might be mischievous, left his guide and Startop on the edge of the quarry, and went on by himself, and stole round the house two or three times, endeavoring to ascertain whether all was right within. As he could hear nothing but indistinct sounds of one deep rough voice (this was while my mind was so busy), he was on at last logan to doubt whether I was there, when suddenly I cried out loudly, and he answered the cries, and rushed in, closely followed by the other two.

When I told Herbert what had passed within the house, he was for our immediately going before a magistrate in the town, late at night as it was, and getting out a warrant. But I had already considered that such a course, by detaining us there, and making us to come back, might be fatal to Provis. There was no gainsaying this difficulty, and we relinquished all thoughts of pursuing Orlick at that time. For the present, under the circumstances, we deemed it prudent to make rather light of the matter to Trabb's boy—who I am convinced would have been much affected by disappointment if he had known that his intervention saved me from the hinds-lick—but that Trabb's boy was of a malignant nature, but that he had too much vivacity to spare, and that it was in his constitution to want variety and excitement at any body's expense. When we parted I presented him with two guineas (which seemed to meet his views), and told him that I was sorry ever to have had an ill opinion of him (which made no impression on him at all).

Wednesday being so close upon us, we determined to go back to London that night, there in the post-chaise; the rather as we should then be clear away before the night's adventure began to be talked of. Herbert got a large bottle of stuff for my arm, and by dint of having this stuff dropped over it all the night through, I was just able to bear its pain on the journey. It was daylight when we reached the Temple, and I went at once to bed, and lay in bed all day.

My terror, as I lay there, of falling ill and being unfitted for to-morrow was so besetting, that I wonder it did not disable me of itself. It would have done so, pretty surely, in connection with the mental wear and tear I had suffered, but for the unnatural strain upon me that to-morrow was. So anxious was I to get forward to, charged with such consequences, its results so impenetrably hidden though so near!

No precaution could have been more obvious than our refraining from communication with him that day; yet this again increased my restlessness. I started at every footstep and every sound, believing that he was discovered and taken, and this was the messenger to tell me so. I pretended that I had a headache, and kept my room, that there was something more upon my mind than a fear or a presentiment; that the fact had occurred, and I had a mysterious knowledge of it. As the day wore on and no ill news came, as the day closed in and darkness fell, my overburdened dread of evil to him became by illness before to-morrow morning altogether mastered me. My burning arm throbbed, and my burning head throbbed, and I raved that I was beginning to wander. I counted up my fingers, to make sure that I was steady, and repeated passages that I knew by rote, aloud verse. It happened sometimes that, in the mere escape of a fatigued mind, I dozed for some moments, or thought; but I verily believe that I was with a start.

"Now it has come, and I am turning delirious!"

They kept me very quiet all day, and kept my arm constantly dressed. They gave me cooling drinks. Whenever I felt asleep I awoke with the notion I had had in the sluice-house, that a long time had elapsed and that the opportunity to save him was gone. About midnight I got out of bed and went to Herbert with the conviction that I had imagined the fact of last-twenty hours and that Wednesday was past. It was the last self-exhausting effort of my fretfulness, for after that I slept more.

And the Wednesday morning was dawning when I looked out of window. The winking lights upon the bridges were growing pale; the coming sun was like a marsh of fire in the horizon. The river, still dark and mysterious, was spanning the bridges that were turning misty gray, with here and there, at top, a warm touch from the burning in the sky. As I looked along the clustered confusion of roofs, with church towers and spires shooting above them steadily clear air, the sun rose up, and a veil seemed to be drawn from the river, and millions of sparkles burst upon its waters. From me, too, a veil seemed to be drawn, and I felt strong and well.

Herbert lay asleep in his bed, and our old fellow-student lay asleep on the floor. I could not dress myself without help, but I made up the fire, which was still burning, and got some coffee ready for them when they should rise. I started up strong and well, and we admitted the sharp morning air at the windows, and looked at the tide that was still flowing toward us.

"When it turns, at nine o'clock," said Herbert, cheerfully, "look out for us, and stand ready, you over there at Mill Pond Bank!"

THE GRAND REVIEW OF 17TH JUNE.

WE publish on pages 424 and 425 a fine picture drawn expressly by our special artist in Washington—of the GRAND REVIEW OF GENERAL M'DOWELL'S DIVISION, which took place on the south side of the POTOMAC on 17th June. It was the greatest military display ever witnessed in this country. About eight thousand troops were on the ground. The reviewing officer was the Secretary of War. The regiments reviewed were three regiments from New Jersey, the New York Twenty-fifth, Sixty-ninth, and Eighth, the Fifth Pennsylvania, and Fifth Massachusetts.

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.

ON page 430 we illustrate the outbreak of the war in Missouri. We first give a VIEW OF SPRINGFIELD CITY, MISSOURI, and the LANDING OF UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS there, from sketches by Mr. [illegible] of Springfield Lodge; and on the same page an instructive Map of the Seat of War in Missouri. In our last number we mentioned the capture of Governor Jackson and Gen. St. Louis, his traitorous proclamation, and the departure of General Lyon in pursuit of him on the steamer Iatan. The correspondent thus describes the landing at Jefferson City:

On the morning of the 15th, ten miles below Jefferson City, General Lyon learned his regular line of march, and proceeded with that best, leaving the town to follow in his wake. As we approached the city we were hailed on the levee and saluted us with prolonged and oft-repeated cheering. Colonel Boernstein, who went to the front during Frick, a prominent Unionist of Jefferson City, was the first to get a General Order to the troops on the levee, and to read it to the regular landing and we were obliged to run out our guns and fire a salute. Below the city, at a point where the railroad company has placed a large quantity of loose stone, preparatory to forming a landing at the town. The steep, rough bank prevented the debarkation of our artillery, but the infantry scrambled up in fine style. First was the company of regulars formerly commanded by General Lyon, but now led by Lieutenant Hare. There were sent to occupy a high hill or bluff near the railroad depot and commanding the town. They went forward in fine style, scrambling the steep acclivity at the double-quick step. In one minute from the time of reaching the summit the armed flag was in a hollow square, ready to repel all attacks from foes, whether real or imaginary. Meanwhile the second wing of the First Volunteer regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews, five hundred strong. These soldiers were formed by sections and marches to the music of "Yankee Doodle," with the Stars and Stripes conspicuous, through the principal streets to the State House, at which they took possession amidst the cheers of the people of the town. After some delay in finding the keys, which had not been very carefully hid, Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews with a band, color bearer, and guard, ascended to the cupola and displayed the American flag, while the band played the "Star Spangled Banner," and the populace and troops below gave round after round of enthusiastic applause. Thus was the "second star" of Missouri's capital invaded by Federal troops, and the boom of "the pride of the Big Muddy" deserated by the footprints of the volunteer soldiers of St. Louis. She rather seemed to like it.

BRIG.-GENERAL LYON, U.S.A.

On page 433 the reader will find a portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL LYON, commanding the United States forces in Missouri. The following brief sketch of General Lyon's career will show that he stands right upon the record:

General Nathaniel Lyon is the son of a substantial farmer of Ashford, Connecticut, and is the descendant, on both paternal and maternal, of families who were distinguished for intellect and integrity of character. His mother was of the Knowlton family, which produced two of the distinguished officers of the Revolution—also, the famous Colonel Knowlton, who, as Major, commanded the Connecticut boys at Bunker Hill, and, on the left wing of the American army, at Bunker's Hill, and was afterward killed at the battle of Harlem Heights, New York.

General Lyon was educated at the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he graduated with distinction in 1841, and has remained in the army ever since, having risen to the rank of captain in the second Infantry; and by the recent choice of the Missouri volunteers has become their Brigadier-General. He is now in the prime of life as a military commander, being forty-two years of age. He has had great experience in his profession, especially in the rougher duties, which fit him so especially for his present position. His service has been principally upon the frontiers—in the Florida, Texas, California, Oregon, Kansas, and Indian Territory borders. He was with General Scott's division during the Mexican campaign, and was brevetted, on August 20, 1847, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco;" and was wounded at the Belen Gate of the city of Mexico, September 13, 1847.

General Lyon is a bright man in the right place. He has a strong and vital constitution, a high order of intellect, and an energy which knows no bounds.

THE LATE CAPT. WARD, U.S.N.

WE publish on page 433 a portrait of the late CAPTAIN WARD, who was unfortunately killed in a reconnoissance at Matthias Point on 27th. Captain Ward's career is as follows:

He was born in the year 1806, in the city of Hartford, Connecticut, on the 4th of March, 1823, he first entered the United States service, sailing in the midshipman, under Commodore M'Donough, in the frigate Constitution. After serving faithfully for four years, under the above commodore, he was promoted to the position of a lieutenant, and was for some time attached to the Mediterranean squadron. Many years of his life were spent on the coast of Africa, in the years also in the Gulf of commanding the United States steamer Vixen; indeed, nearly all of his naval life was spent on the ocean: he has served seventeen years at sea and only nine years on shore. He held for a long time the responsible position of the Naval School at Annapolis, and still later was placed in command of the steamship ship South Carolina, flag of the Navy Yard. This position he held for nearly four years, and while in the Mediterranean. At last the trouble in the south of the country demanded the services and experience of such officers as Captain Ward, and he placed himself at the command of the Government. Appreciating his abilities, they placed him in command of the steam fleet at that time fitting out. It was placed in commission on the 16th of May. He soon arrived at Annapolis Roads. Here he made an attack on a rebel battery, silencing it and driving the soldiers away. Since that time he has proved himself to be one of the most able and energetic officers that we have. He is a Virginian, and having three others in his sons that he would not gladly lead them through.

He was married in the year 1838 to Miss Elizabeth Ann Shiffler, daughter of Samuel Whittemore, Esq. From this union has sprung four children, three of whom, a daughter and two sons, are with their mother in Germany.

BATTLE OF BOONVILLE.

On page 438 we publish a picture of the BATTLE OF BOONVILLE, from a sketch by an attentive artist-correspondent. The following account of the fight is from the Herald correspondence:

At just three minutes before seven a. m., on June 17, the order was given to advance. The morning was cloudy, with occasionally a few drops of rain, but before the battle was over the sun poured out clear and sultry as ever. As the column ascended the bluff the pickets of the enemy were seen and driven in. During the advance of the three-fourths of a mile one of the advanced guard rode hastily back to the head of the column and informed General Lyon that the whole body of the State troops was drawn up a few hundred yards in front. General Lyon at once ordered the regulars under Sergeant Griffin to the left, and Captain Schofield's battery to the right. Captain Totten's battery was ordered to the front to occupy the road.

The enemy were drawn up about three hundred yards in advance, on the crest of a hill, or rather a long swell or ridge, over which the road passed at the highest point. The road was occupied by Colonel Macmadoke, with a small body of cavalry and a battalion of infantry, immediately on his left was a brick house filled with rebel troops, and to the left, and toward the river, was a corn-field, where his left wing was posted. To their rear was a wheat field, and the whole simultaneously scattered small crowds of men, apparently without order or regularity. To his right and somewhat behind him, separated by an adjacent corn field by a "worm fence," and behind this fence his right wing was posted. Soon as our men were in position Captain Totten unlimbered a twelve-pounder and a six-pounder, and sent a shell from his former into the midst of the men occupying the road. A puff of smoke rising from the enemy showed that the gunners aim had been true. The next shell was directed upon the brick house, and a puff of white smoke and crash of timber a hasty retreat. The fire now became general along the whole line, and was followed by the cry, and the savage troops on the left, advancing in good order. Our line was formed on a line parallel to that occupied by the enemy and parallel to it, separated from the latter by a valley with a gentle ascent on either side. To our left was a corn field and further right a copse or grove of scattered oaks. The regulars advanced in the corn field, to the crest of the hill on the left of the line of rebel firing where apparently contented, taking for their motto that of an Irishman at Donnybrook fair, "Whatever you see to hit, hit it." The hollow between the ridges was full of scattered oaks, and these afforded a cover to our men.

Captains Stone, Cole, and Cavender were sent to support the right of the regulars, and the fight was by way also advanced to the fence where the enemy were at first posted. The battalion from Jefferson Barracks, reported by Captain Maurice's, Burke's, and Yates's companies, were at the same time driving work on the right; and in about twenty minutes from the time Captain Totten fired the first shell the rebels were in full retreat, and the mass occupying the line first held by the enemy. The house on the right had been completely riddled by the shot from Totten's battery, and one shell burst in the very centre of the building, as it was filled, it was full of rebels. Several dead bodies of the rebels were found in the wheat field near the house, showing that the fire had been effective. In fact, the first volley from the right wing several saddles were emptied of their riders, and two horses galloped over to our lines. The correspondents of the New York Herald and St. Louis Democrat entered the battle on foot, by the side of the battery, but were very soon mounted, having succeeded in capturing those runaway steeds.

The number of killed and wounded on the part of the rebels has not yet probably will not be accurately ascertained. Out of one company Captain M'Culloch's Cooper Cheering Rifles, sixty-two are known to be killed and mortal wounded. The number of dead already brought into Boonville or taken by the rebels in the country can not fall much short of $\frac{1}{250}$, and the wounded now heard of are as many more. On the side of the Union troops there were three killed, ten wounded, and one missing.

We took eighty prisoners, nineteen of whom have been released, and the remaining sixty-one put on board the Lexington.

THE LEADERS OF THE NATION.

WE devote an unusual proportion of our space this week to PORTRAITS OF THE MEN on whom the eyes of the people are at present fixed.

On page 440 will be found an admirable portrait of LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SCOTT, from a recent photograph by Brady; and on the page following an accurate view of an exceedingly well executed portrait of the same General Scott, made thirty-four years ago, when he was forty-one years of age. The present crisis was essential to the full perfection of General Scott's fame. Had he died a twelvemonth since, history might have classed him as a mere successful soldier. But he has now got down to posterity with no name between his and WASHINGTON'S is certain. His early career was an unexampled success. Though he was bred a lawyer and not a soldier, his first campaign as a captain of volunteer artillery developed the mettle that was in him; he rose, without patronage, without friends, without money, or favor, from grade to grade, winning each step with his sword on the battle-field, until he was a Major-General in the United States Army at the age of twenty-eight. This was forty-seven years ago—when few who read these lines were born. How honorably and usefully this long stage of forty-seven years has been spent by him in the service of his country is history that is recount. And now his long career of greatness is being fitly closed by the noblest and most splendid of his achievements. It must keep his footprints in the sands of the very pile of the nation were sleeping, in October last, WINFIELD SCOTT foresaw the present war, foretold it to the Buchanan Cabinet, and showed how the rebellion might be crushed in the bud by a few very simple precautions. It was not his fault that the hoary imbecile who then disgraced the Presidential chair moved discontent into rebellion, and sedition into open war. But Providence orders all for the best, and nues even such vile instruments as Buchanan in a ripen Secretary of War, that the fame of WASHINGTON should be crown the last years of Scott with immortal glory.

Let no man doubt him. His intellect is as bright as it was forty years ago; his hand is sure, and his judgment as sound. He has never yet failed as a soldier; let those who cap at his slowness take patience; what he proposes to do he will do thoroughly, once and forever.

We also publish on page 437 a group of THE PRESIDENT AND HIS CABINET. This is not an impertinent here to say that, while MR. LINCOLN was not the choice of the proprietors of this journal for President, they conceive it to be the duty of every loyal citizen at the present juncture to give a cordial support to him and to his Administration. When civil war is raging at our doors, and it is a hanging matter to raise the stars and stripes in any of the country, it is surely no time to cavil at errors of detail which may be committed by the Administration in the selection of men for subordinate than have devolved upon any government since this Confederacy was first formed. For our part we are free to confess that thus far MR. LINCOLN seems to us to have been blind to all but the stupendous task which Fate has set before him. We can not thus far detect a single fatal error in his administration of the Government. He appears to be fully conscious of the situation, and to be discharging his duty with a keen perception of his responsibility to God and to the people. We have no fault to find with his action must be governed by the fact. If we see a Government holding its own for a long time, the common courtesy and habit of nations require that we should welcome her to the rights of a self-existing Power. Of course we take the risk of your wrath. —A la bonne heure!

So long as we show by the success of our arms that this is a rebellion, and that we are suppressing it, so long England will cry, "All's well!" But if the rebellion maintains its full proportions for a long time, as England the World will treat it as a question of fact, not of principle.

A WORD FROM ENGLAND.

A PRIVATE letter to the Lounger from a friend long resident in England contains the general view of the English position toward us taken by Harper's Weekly.

"I can fire off a gun at England (though you understand her better than some people), and at the same time there comes a volley from Paris (an American entering there), and a sort of explosion, it appears, from the entire North. Tis too violent and explosive, as I and my beloved American kin are apt to be. You have delivered that, perhaps, ere now; though you may not be quite satisfied, and perhaps never will be, with England's conduct in the matter. I am in a better situation than any of you to see both sides, and I wish I had written you by that mail. Perhaps I might have lessened your disturbance.

"Pray understand me. I do not mean to justify the tone of most of the Times' articles. I went about with repressed indignation (expressed in a proper manner upon proper occasions) at them for some time. Nor have I quite recovered therefrom, although I am beginning to hope just a little for something better. But I do not think the action of the Government could well have been other than it has been; as, neither a man in a better than any of you to see both sides, and I wish I had written you by that mail. Perhaps I might have lessened your disturbance.

FORT M'HENRY, BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.—DRAWN BY A MEMBER OF COMPANY D, 3D RIFLES, M. V.

FORT M'HENRY AND MARSHAL KANE.

ON 27th June General Banks astonished the people of the rebellious city of Baltimore by arresting Marshal Kane at 3 A.M., and marching him under guard of a file of soldiers to Fort M'Henry. Of his traitorous proceedings no doubt is entertained, and every one applauds General Banks's vigorous course. We publish on page 445, in illustration of the event, a portrait of MARSHAL KANE, from a recent photograph; and on this page a view of FORT M'HENRY, lately sent us by a member of Company D, 3d Rifles, M. V. It is an extremely strong fort, and the Columbiads which are now placed in position command the city thoroughly.

Mr. Raymond, of the Times, thus describes Fort M'Henry at the present time:

Fort M'Henry is now in very good condition to resist any assault. When the Baltimore riot occurred, as was very fully explained soon after in a letter from the fort to the Times, it was in a very bad condition, and could scarcely have resisted a vigorous assault. It is a small work, of the old style, surrounded by a dry ditch, and scarcely provided with any defenses on the landward side, from which, when it was built, an attack was never contemplated. But now, thanks to the energy of Major Morris, of the regular army, who has been for some time its commandant, it may defy attack from any quarter. Barricades have been erected to guard the entrances. An abatis of trees, with projecting branches, has been erected around the fort. Several platforms have been extemporized under the curtain originally intended only to shelter infantry. Sand-bag guards have been placed over the door and window of the magazine. Gutters have been provided to roll hand-grenades upon the heads of an assailing force. Fresh guns have been mounted, and I observed that all the mortars and a part of the Columbiads on the landward side are kept loaded—in preparation for any emergency. Fort M'Henry is about two miles from the centre of the city, and it is well understood that it could drop shells, hot or otherwise, into all the houses in the infected district with the utmost ease. I trust the necessity for so doing may never arise; but it is consoling to know that, if it does, it can be promptly met.

A correspondent of the Herald says:

The "unconstitutional" examination of Marshal Kane's premises, since his arrest in Baltimore, has brought to light some curious pieces of personal property, an enumeration of which may be of some interest to the public. Here are the articles:

Cannon, four and six pounders, 6; assorted shot, lbs., 2000; shell, lbs., 1000; shot for steam guns, lbs., 300; muskets, 663; carbines, 48; rifles, 47; double-barreled shot-guns, 3; single-barreled shot-guns, 8; horse pistols, 2; small pistols, 65; bullet moulds, 132; cartridge-boxes, 3; dirk-knives, 8; swords, 5; drums, 8; gum coats, 33; powder-flasks, 64; canisters, 117; cartridges, 40,000; canisters of shot, 7; besides a lot of screw-drivers, etc.

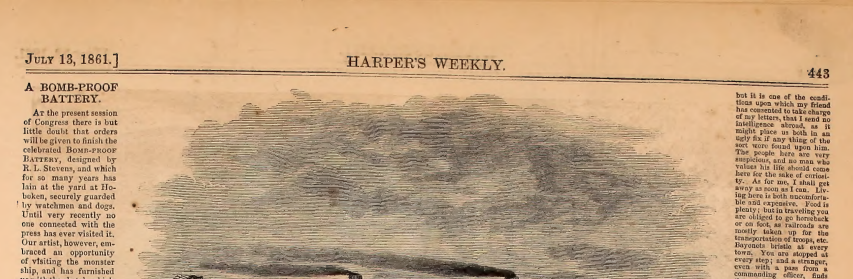
A BOMB-PROOF BATTERY.

At the present season of Congress there is but little doubt that orders will be given to finish the celebrated BOMB-PROOF BATTERY, designed by R. L. Stevens, and which for so many years has lain at the yard at Hoboken, securely guarded by watchmen and dogs. Until very recently no one connected with the press has ever visited it. Our artist, however, embraced an opportunity of visiting the monster ship, and has furnished us with the sketch, which we present on this page. He also learned that this vessel, when about to engage in an action, is sunk so that its decks are just above water. It will mount a powerful battery of sixteen rifled guns in the bomb-proof casemates, while two heavy Columbiads for throwing shell will be mounted on the deck — one forward and the other aft. The funnels, or smoke-pipes, will be constructed on the telescopic principle, and can be lowered at pleasure, or in action, when they would serve for a mark for the enemy's shot. Mr. Stevens says that if the vessel is fitted out according to his plans, he would be willing to guarantee the capture of Sumter in a less number of hours than it took the South Carolinians with their seventeen batteries.



THE STEVENS BOMB-PROOF BATTERY AS IT WILL APPEAR WHEN COMPLETED.

REFRESHMENTS FOR VOLUNTEERS.

We illustrate on page 438 an admirable Philadelphia "institution," which we commend to the notice of the public. The artist who obligingly sent us the sketch describes it as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, June 17, 1861.

* I send you herewith a few sketches, illustrating an admirable idea for furnishing the volunteers for the United States, passing through Philadelphia to the seat of war, with a real solace, in the shape of hot coffee and plenty of bread, butter, and cold meat, free of expense. When the troops began to hasten to the defense of the Government most of them passed through here, travel-worn and hungry, without any intimation to our citizens of their visit, and nearly all at such hours after midnight as precluded any public reception. Then it was that a few patriotic individuals would bring baskets of bread and a few gallons of coffee to comfort and refresh a few of the strangers. These limited, yet thankfully received supplies were hailed in the car windows until the want became known, when, from the least suspicion that a regiment was coming, many would step quietly at night, making what coffee their little domestic articles would allow, and taking it to the general table near the depôt. But this was too limited, many soldiers getting none, which soon attracted the attention of some energetic persons, who determined to carry the affair to a complete and creditable form. Donations of money and means were solicited, and were given with a liberality suitable to the cause. The two large bakery and kitchen (in the sketch) were given by Mr. Sivery. The use of the two buildings at the southwest corner of Water and Washington streets was obtained (each about sixty feet deep), which have been furnished with tables, neatly covered with white cloths, set with ironstone plates and tin cups, and can accommodate three full companies at one time, having now complete facilities for furnishing a regiment with as much food as they can eat, and nearly a quart of coffee for each man. As few men can drink over a pint, it is a rich treat to see them emptying the milk-can from their canteen to receive the coffee. "Ach mein!" said a big Scotchman with the Highland Regiment the other day, after cleaning his tin cup at one draught and smacking his lips—"ach mon, but that's guide!" Arrangements have also been made to receive telegraphic communications from regiments or companies several hours in advance of their arrival, when our citizens are notified by the firing of cannon—one gun announcing the fact, and the requisite number telling the hour at which they will arrive. The first call of the volunteers is frequently for water to wash with, and hence for the plumber will finish the introduction of water pipe and forty faucets. A suitable number of wash-basins and towels, with plenty soap, have been furnished. Gas will also be introduced by Thursday, when a grand public festival and flag-raising will celebrate the completion of this patriotic and really substantial display of sympathy for a great cause.

I have sent you the sketch, as you have the largest circulation of any paper in the country. Should you find it worthy of publication, it may be the means of conveying the idea to the patriotic in other sections. At one of the Massachusetts boys told me to-day, "Coffee is better than whisky."

THE VIRGINIAN ARMY.

The attentive correspondent to whom we have been indebted for so many interesting sketches of the rebel army in Virginia has supplied us with the drawings which we reproduce this week on pages 436 and 445. They represent VIRGINIA TROOPS CROSSING THE BLUE RIDGE AT DAYBREAK, EN ROUTE FOR MANASSAS JUNCTION, and a CAMP OF CONFEDERATE TROOPS AT WHITE SPRINGS, ON THE MANASSAS GAP RAILROAD. These pictures are intrinsically interesting, and those who can form an idea of the difficulty with which the sketches are obtained will not prize them the less on that account. Our correspondent writes:

HEADQUARTERS, VIRGINIA, June 23, 1861.

The sketch of troops crossing the Blue Ridge I made a few days ago. It strikingly illustrates a Virginia regiment on the march. I think I shall paint the same subject when the war is over. The other sketch, made on Thursday, is the camp of a portion of the large army now under the command of General Beauregard, whose head-quarters are somewhere about MANASSAS JUNCTION. It is said there is now upward of fifty thousand men in that neighborhood; but of that it is impossible to tell, as the whole country is a camp. I never saw so many tents, soldiers, and horses before in my life. I would freely give you all the information in my power in regard to matters here; but it is one of the conditions upon which my friend has consented to take charge of my letters, that I send no intelligence whatever, as it might place us both in an ugly fix if any thing of the sort were found upon him. The people here are very suspicious, and no man who values his life should come here for the sake of curiosity. As for me, I shall get away as soon as I can. Living here is both uncomfortable and expensive. Food is plenty; but in traveling you are obliged to go horseback or on foot, as railroads are mostly taken up for the transportation of troops, etc. Bayonets bristle at every town. You are stopped at every step; and a stranger, even with a pass from a commanding officer, finds the greatest difficulty in getting ahead. I never was in such a warlike place before, and shall be glad to get back to Maryland, where at least there is some show of peace. When I leave here I think I shall try the Federal Army, where, no doubt, I will find more facility in sketching.

The Washington correspondent of the Times says:

A lady arrived here last night from Richmond. She prepared to leave Virginia several days since, but, from her well-known intimate relations to leading Union men in Virginia, was flatly refused the courtesy of a pass from Jeff Davis. A subsequent application to Beauregard met with a similar refusal. She escaped, however, and, upon reaching the bank of the Potomac, several miles above Washington, procured the services of a boatman, who brought her down the river during the night, and she reached town in safety. She informs me that scattered along the route from Richmond to Manassas and thence to Fairfax Court House, the Confederates have a large body of troops. General Beauregard openly declares his intention to move toward Washington, and hopes yet to be able to take it. His plan is—as this authority avers—to get as near our Arlington outposts as possible with his main force, and to steal the city. These, meantime, he designs to push his column on, to engage our forces, and to carry such points as he is able to conquer, and with a reserve march finally upon the Capitol. She adds that General Beauregard, through his emissaries, who are constantly coming to and going from this city, is thoroughly informed of all the movements of our forces.

THE CREW OF THE STEAM-FRIGATE "COLORADO."

On page 439 the reader will find a truthful picture of the crew of the United States steam-frigate Colorado, which has lately sailed from Boston to join the blockading fleet. The men were all recruited and shipped at Boston, and we understand that an unusual proportion of them are Americans. Their physique goes to show that the race has not degenerated in that part of the country, and that when occasion offers they will do full justice to the reputation which our gallant tars have won in many a fight and on many a sea.

GUN-BOATS FITTING OUT AT CINCINNATI, OHIO, FOR GOVERNMENT SERVICE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

MAJOR GENERAL JOHN C. FREMONT, IN HIS PRAIRIE COSTUME

ALL IS WELL!

THEY stood, mute lipped, with sullen eyes
When spring was fresh and green,
A tiny coffin at their feet,
A new-made grave between.
The earth was rich with bursting buds,
The wind with grand perfumes,
God's music, in a thousand tones,
Swept softly round the tombs.
The preacher, with a voice attuned
To meet the music's swell,
Stood heralding an angel's birth,
The promise, "All is well!"

The neighbors, with uncovered heads,
In saddened groups stood by,
With many a listening, trembling lip,
And many a dimming eye.
For every one of all the groups
Who gathered sadly there
Knew why, on either side the grave,
Stood James and Ellen Ware.
They knew how words of bitter strife
Had words of love defied,
And how a wandering man returned,
The day his child had died.

Returned too late to kiss the lips
He loved so well with life;
Returned with anger in his heart
Against an angry wife.
For she, when first the babe had drooped,
With sullen scorn denied
Her wish to have the father by
The little sufferer's side.
She steeled her heart with every word
His angry tongue had said,
And called him only to his home
To find his darling dead.

And so they stood beside the grave,
The husband and the wife,
Still warming in their heart of hearts
The olden words of strife.
The only two of all the crowd
Unmoved to love and tears,
With them the promise, "All is well!"
Fell on unlistening ears.
The prayer had ceased, the sexton stooped
To lift the tiny load,
To lay the baby child away
Within its last abode.

From either side the open grave
Stepped James and Ellen Ware,
And knelt beside the baby child
That lay so silent there.
Their heads were bowed, their hands were clasped
Upon the coffin lid;
The tears that struggled from their hearts
Could be no longer hid.
The preacher cast his eyes aloft,
And stretched his hands in prayer,
No word he spoke, we knew he prayed
For James and Ellen Ware.

Their hands crept blindly o'er the lid,
And met in warm embrace,
Their heads were lifted from their breasts,
To gaze in either face.
In sad, heart-broken tones they called
Their baby's name aloud,
And sobbing in each other's arms,
They kissed its wooden shroud.
And as the sexton stooped to lift
Once more the little shell,
They whispered to each other's heart
The promise, "All is well!"

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

CHAPTER LIII.

IT was one of those March days when the sun shines hot and the wind blows cold: when it is summer in the light, and winter in the shade. We had our pea-coats with us, and I took a bag. Of all my worldly possessions I took no more than the few necessaries that filled the bag. Where I might go, what I might do, or when I might return, were questions utterly unknown to me; nor did I vex my mind with them, for it was wholly set on Provis's safety. I only wondered for the passing moment, as I stopped at the door and looked back, under what altered circumstances I should next see those rooms, if ever.

We loitered down to the Temple stairs, and stood loitering there, as if we were not quite decided to go upon the water at all. Of course I had taken care that the boat should be ready and every thing in order. After a little show of indecision, which there were none to see but the two or three amphibious creatures belonging to our Temple stairs, we went on board and cast off; Herbert in the bow, I steering. It was then about high-water—half past eight.

Our plan was this: The tide, beginning to run down at nine, and being with us until three, we intended still to creep on after it had turned, and row against it until dark. We should then be well in those long reaches below Gravesend, between Kent and Essex, where the river is broad and solitary, where the water-side inhabitants are very few, and where lone public houses are scattered here and there, of which we could choose one for a resting-place. There we meant to lie by, all night. The steamer for Hamburg and the steamer for Rotterdam would start from London at about nine on Thursday morning, and would be in our part of the river at about noon. We should know at what time to expect them according to where we were, and would hail the first; so that if by any accident we were not taken on board, we should have another chance. We had a pocket-glass with us, and knew the distinguishing marks of each vessel.

The relief of being at last engaged in the execution of the purpose was so great to me that I felt it difficult to realize the condition in which I had been a few hours before. The crisp air, the sunlight, the movement on the river, and the moving river itself—the road that ran with us, seeming to sympathize with us, animate us, and encourage us—refreshened me with new hope. I felt mortified to be of so little use in the boat; but there were few better oarsmen than my friend, and they rowed with a steady stroke that was to last all day.

At that time the steam traffic on the Thames was far below its present extent, and watermen's boats were far more numerous. Of barges, sailing colliers, and coasting-traders, there were perhaps as many as now: but of steamships, great and small, not a tithe or a twentieth part so many. Early as it was, there were plenty of scullers going here and there that morning, and plenty of barges dropping down with the tide; the navigation of the river between bridges, in an open time, was a much easier and commoner matter in those days than it is in these; and we went ahead among many skiffs and wherries, briskly.

Old London Bridge was soon passed, and old Billingsgate Market with its oyster-boats and Dutchmen, and the White Tower and Traitors' Gate, and we were in among the tiers of shipping. Here were the Leith, Aberdeen, and Glasgow steamer loading and unloading goods, and looking immensely high out of the water as we passed alongside; here were colliers by the score and scores with the coal-whippers plunging off stages on deck, as counterweights to measures of coal swinging up, which were then rattled over the side into barges; here, at her moorings, was to-morrow's steamer for Rotterdam, of which we took good notice; and here, to-morrow's Hamburg, under whose bowsprit we crossed. And now I, sitting in the stern, could see with a faster beating heart Mill Pond Bank and Mill Pond stairs.

"Is he there?" said Herbert.

"Not yet."

"Right! He was not to come down till he saw us. Can you see his signal?"

"Not well from here; but I think I see it. Now, I see him! Pull both, Easy, Herbert. Oars!"

We touched the stairs lightly for a single moment, and he was on board and we were off again. He had a boat-cloak with him, and a black canvas bag, and he looked as like a river pilot as my mind could have wished.

"Dear boy!" he said, putting his arm on my shoulder as he took his seat. "Faithful dear boy, well done! Thankye, thankye!"

Again among the tiers of shipping, in and out, avoiding run-ships chain-cables, frayed hempen hawsers, and lighting buoys, sinking for the moment the floating broken baskets, scattering floating chips of wood and shaving, clearing floating scum of coal, in and out, under the figure-head of the John of Sunderland making a speech to the winds (as is done by many Johns), and the Betsy of Yarmouth with a firm formality of bosom and her knobby eyes starting two inches out of her head, in and out, hammers going in ship-building yards, saws going at timber, clashing engines going at things unknown, pumps going in leaky ships, capstans going, ships going out to sea, and unintelligible sea-monsters roaring curses over the bulwarks at respondent lightermen, in and out—out at last upon the clearer river, where the ships' boys might take their fenders in, no longer fishing in troubled waters with them over the side, and where the brown sails might fly out to the wind.

At the Stairs where we had taken him aboard, and ever since, I had looked warily for any token of our being suspected. I had seen none. We certainly had not been, and at that time as certainly we were not, either attended or followed by any boat. If we had been waited on by any boat, I should have run in to shore, and have obliged her to go on, or to make her purpose evident. But we held our own, without any appearance of molestation.

He had his boat-cloak on him, and looked, as I have said, a natural part of the scene. It was remarkable (but perhaps the wretched life he had led accounted for it), that he was the least anxious of any of us. He was not indifferent, for he told me that he hoped to live to see his gentleman one of the best of gentlemen in a foreign country; he was not disposed to be passive or resigned, as I understood it; but he had no notion of meeting danger half way. When it came upon him he confronted it, but it must come before he troubled himself.

"If you knowed, dear boy," he said to me, "what it is to sit here alonger my dear boy and have my smoke, arter having been day by day betwixt four walls, you'd envy me. But you don't know what it is."

"I think I know the delights of freedom," I answered.

"Ah," said he, shaking his head gravely. "But you don't know it equal to me. You must play a long spell behind bars, dear boy, to know it equal to me—but I ain't a going to be low."

* * * * *

It occurred to me as inconsistent that for any mastering idea he should have endangered his freedom and even his life. But I reflected that perhaps freedom without danger was too much apart from all the habit of his existence to be to him what it would be to another man. It was not far out, since he said, after smoking a little:

"You see, dear boy, when I was over yonder, t'other side of the world, I was always a looking to this side; and it come flat to be there, for all I was a growing rich. Every body knowed Magwitch, and Magwitch could come, and Magwitch could go, and nobody's head would be troubled about him. They ain't so easy concerning me here, dear boy—wouldn't be, leastwise, if they knowed where I was."

"If all goes well," said I, "you will be perfectly free and safe again within a few hours."

"Well," he returned, drawing a long breath, "I hope so."

"And think so?"

He dipped his hand in the water over the boat's gunwale, and said, smiling with that softened air upon him which was not new to me,

"Ay, I s'pose I think so, dear boy. We'd be puzzled to be more quiet and easy-going than we are at present. But it's a flowing so soft and pleasant through the water, p'raps, as makes me think it—I was a-thinking through my smoke (for you've got no more notion than the dead of the next few hours than we can see to the bottom of this river what I catches hold of. Nor yet we can't no more hold their tide than I can hold this. And it's run through my fingers and gone, you see!" holding up his dripping hand.

"But for your face, I should think you were a little despondent," said I.

"Not a bit on it, dear boy! It comes of flowing on so quiet, and of that there rippling at the boat's head making a sort of a Sunday tune. Maybe I'm a-growing a trifle old besides."

He put his pipe back in his mouth with an undisturbed expression of face, and sat as composed and contented as if we were already out of England. Yet he was as submissive to a word of advice as if he had been in constant terror, for, when we ran ashore to get some bottles of beer into the boat, and he was stepping out, I hinted that I thought he would be safest where he was, and he said, "Do you, dear boy," and quietly sat down again.

The air felt cold upon the river, but it was a bright day, and the sunshine was very cheering. The tide ran strong, I took care to lose none of it, and our steady stroke carried us on thoroughly well. By imperceptible degrees, as the tide ran out, we lost more and more of the nearer woods and hills, and dropped lower and lower between the muddy banks, but the tide was yet with us when we were off Gravesend. As our charge was wrapped in his cloak, I purposely passed within a boat or two's length of the floating Custom-house, and so out to catch the stream, alongside of two emigrant ships, and under the bows of a large transport with soldiers on the forecastle looking down at us. And soon the tide began to slacken, and the craft lying at anchor to swing, and presently they had all swung round, and the ships that were taking advantage of the new tide to get up to the Pool, began to crowd upon us in a fleet, and we kept under the shore, as much out of the strength of the tide now as we could, standing carefully off from low shallows and mud-banks.

Our oarsmen were so fresh, by dint of having occasionally let her drive with the tide for a minute or two, that a quarter of an hour's rest proved full as much as they wanted. We got ashore among some slippery stones while we ate and drank what we had with us, and looked about. It was like my own marsh country, flat and monotonous, and with a dim horizon; while the winding river turned and turned, and the great floating buoys upon it turned and turned, and every thing else seemed stranded and still. For now the last of the fleet of ships was round the last low point we had headed; and the last green barge, straw-laden, with a brown sail, had followed; and some bilge-lighters, shaped like a child's first rude imitation of a boat, lay low in the mud; and a little squat obsolete light-house on open piles, stood crippled in the mud on stilts and crutches; and slimy stakes stuck out of the mud, and slimy stones stuck out of the mud, and red landmarks and tidemarks stuck out of the mud, and an old landing-stage and an old roofless building slipped into the mud, and all about us was stagnation and mud.

We pushed off again, and made what way we could. It was much harder work now, but Herbert and Startop persevered, and rowed, and rowed, and rowed, until the sun went down. By that time the river had lifted us a little, so that we could see above the bank. There was the red sun, on the low level of the shore, in a purple haze, fast deepening into black; and there was the solitary flat marsh; and far away there were the rising grounds, between which and us there seemed to be no life, save here and there in the fen-crossing a blackbird or gull.

As the night was fast falling, and as the moon, being past the full, would not rise early, we held a little council. It was short one, for clearly our course was to lie by at the first lonely tavern we could find. So they plied their oars once more, and I looked out for any thing like a house. Thus we held on, speaking little, for four or five dull miles. It was very cold, and a collier coming by us, with her galley-fire smoking and blazing, looked quite a comfortable home. The night was as dark by this time as it would be until morning, and what light we had seemed to come more from the river than the sky, as the oars in their dipping struck at a few reflected stars.

At this dismal time we were evidently all possessed by the idea that we were followed. As the tide made, it flapped heavily at irregular intervals against the shore; and whenever such a sound came, one or other of us was sure to start and look in that direction. Here and there the set of the current had worn down the bank into a little creek, and we were all suspicious of such places, and eyed them nervously. Sometimes, "What was that ripple?" one of us would say in a low voice. Or another, "Was that a boat yonder?" And afterward we would fall into a dead silence, and I would sit impatiently thinking with what an unusual amount of noise the oars worked in the thowels.

At length we descried a light and a roof, and presently afterward ran alongside a little causeway made of stones that had been picked up hard by. Leaving the rest in the boat, I stepped ashore, and found that the light was a window of a public house. It was a dirty place enough, and I dare say not unknown to smuggling adventurers; but there was a good fire in the kitchen, and there were eggs and bacon to eat, and various liquors to drink. Also, there were two double-bedded rooms—"such as they were," the landlord said. No other company was in the house than the landlord, his wife, and a grizzled man creaming, in the back of the bar-room way, who was as slimy and smeary as if he had been low-water mark too.

To this assistant I went down to the boat again, and we all came ashore, and brought out the oars, and rudder, and boat-hook, and all that was provided, and hauled her up high. We made a very good meal by the kitchen fire, and then apportioned the bedrooms: Herbert and Startop were to occupy one; I and our charge the other. We found the air as carefully excluded from both as if air were fatal to life; and there were more dirty ticklers in both counterpanes than I should have thought the family possessed. But we considered ourselves well off, notwithstanding, for a more solitary place we could not have found.

While we were comforting ourselves by the fire after our meal, the Jack—who was himself in a corner, and who had a bloated pair of shoes on, which he had exhibited while we were eating our eggs and bacon with unbounded pride—told us that he had taken a few days ago from the feet of a drowned seaman washed ashore—asked me if we had seen a three-masted galley going up with the tide? When I told him No, he said she must have gone down then, and yet she "took up too," when she left there.

"They must ha' thought better on't for some reason or another," said the Jack, "and gone down."

"A four-oared galley, eh?" said I.

"A four," said the Jack, "and two sitters."

"Did they come ashore here?"

"They put in with a stone two-gallon jar for some beer. I'd ha' been glad to pison the beer myself," said the Jack, "or put some rattling physic in it at least."

"Why?"

"I know why," said the Jack. He spoke in a slushy voice, as if much mud had washed into his throat.

"He thinks," said the landlord—a weakly meditative man with a pale eye, who seemed to rely greatly on his Jack—"he thinks they was what they wasn't."

"I knows what I thinks," observed the Jack.

"You thinks Custum 'Us, Jack?" said the landlord.

"I do," said the Jack.

"Then you're wrong, Jack."

"Am I?"

"In the infinite meaning of his reply, and his boundless confidence in his views, the Jack took one of his bloated shoes off, looked into it, knocked a few shreds of mud off with a kitchen floor, and put it on again. He did this with the air of a Jack who was so right that he could afford to do any thing.

"Why, what do you make out that they done with their buttons then, Jack?" asked the landlord, with submission.

"Done with their buttons?" returned the Jack. "Chucked 'em overboard. Swallered 'em. Sowed 'em, to come up small salad. Done with their buttons!"

"Don't be cheeky, Jack," remonstrated the landlord, in a melancholy and pathetic way.

"A Custum 'Us officer knows what to do with his Buttons," said the Jack, repeating the obnoxious word with the greatest aggravation, "when they comes betwixt him and his own light. A Four and two sitters don't go hanging about a Custum 'Us ship, which, he went out disgusted; and the landlord, having no one to rely upon, found it impracticable to pursue the subject.

This dialogue made us all uneasy, and me very uneasy. The dismal wind was muttering round the house, the tide was lapping at the shore, and I had a feeling that we were caged and threatened. A four-oared galley hovering about in so unusual a way as to attract this notice, was an ugly circumstance that I could not get rid of. When I had induced Provis to go to bed, I went outside with my two companions (Startop by this time knew the state of the case), and held another council. Whether we should remain at the house until near the steamer's time, which would be about one in the afternoon; or whether we should put off early in the morning, was the question we discussed. On the whole we deemed it the better course to lie where we were until within an hour or so of the steamer's time, and then to get out in her track, and drift easily with the tide. Having settled to do this, we returned into the house and went to bed.

I lay down with the greater part of my clothes

on, and slept for a few hours well. When I awoke, the wind had risen, and the sign of the house (the Ship) was creaking and banging about, with noises that startled me. Rising softly, for my charge lay fast asleep, I looked out of the window. It commanded the causeway where we had landed up our boat, and, as my eyes adapted themselves to the light of the clouded moon, I saw two men looking into her. They passed by under the window, looking at nothing else, and did not go down to the landing-place, which I could discern to be empty, but struck across the marsh in the direction of the sea.

My first impulse was to call up Herbert, and show him the two men going away. But reflecting hastily, I got into his room, which was at the back of the house and adjoined mine, that he and Startop had had a harder day than I, and were fatigued. Looking back on my window, I could still see the two men moving over the marsh. In that light, however, I soon lost them, and feeling very cold, lay down to think of the matter, and fell asleep again.

We were up early. As we walked to and fro, all four together, before breakfast, I deemed it right to recount what I had seen. Again, our charge was the least anxious of the party. It was very likely that the men belonged to the Custom-house, he said, quietly, and that they had no thought of us. I tried to persuade myself that it was so, as, indeed, it might still be. However, I proposed that he and I should walk away together to a distant point we could see, and that the boat should take us aboard there, or as near there as might prove feasible, at about noon. This being considered a good precaution, soon after breakfast he and I set forth, without saying any thing at the tavern.

He smoked his pipe as we went along, and sometimes stopped to direct me on the shoulder or take me by the hand. One would have supposed that it was I who was in danger, not he, and that he was my protector. We spoke very little. As we approached the point, I begged him to remain in a sheltered place while I went on to reconnoitre; but he was resolved it that the men had passed in the night. He complied, and I went on alone. There was no boat off the point, nor down up or down there near it, nor were there any signs of the men having embarked there. But to be sure the tide was high, and there might have been some footprints under water.

When he looked out from his shelter in the distance, and saw that I waved my hat to him to come up, he obeyed me, and I saw him walk—sometimes lying on the bank wrapped in our coats, and sometimes moving about to warm ourselves—until we saw the boat coming round. We got aboard easily, and rowed out into the track of the steamer. By that time it wanted but ten minutes of one o'clock, and we began to look out for her smoke.

But it was half past one before we saw her smoke, and then afterward we saw the hull of the smoke of the other steamer. As they were coming on at full speed, we got the two bags ready, and took that opportunity of saying good-by to Herbert and Startop. We had all shaken hands cordially, and neither Herbert's eyes nor mine were made dry when I saw a four-oared galley shoot out from under the bank but a little way ahead of us, and row out into the same track.

A stretch of shore had been as yet between us and the steamer's smoke, by reason of the bend and reach that I have described; so she was visible, coming head on. I called to Herbert and Startop to keep before the tide, that she might see us plainly for her eye, and I adjured Provis to sit still, wrapped in his cloak. He answered cheerily, "Trust to me, dear boy!" and sat like a statue. Presently the galley, which I saw was very skilfully handled, had borne down upon us, crossed us, and come alongside. Leaving just enough for the play of the oars, she was kept alongside, drifting when we drifted, and pulling a stroke or two when we pulled. Of the two sitters, both pulling bow oars, one watched us attentively—as did all the rowers; the other sitter was wrapped up, much as Provis was, and seemed to direct. He had a whisper some instruction to the steamer as he looked at us. Not a word was spoken in either boat.

Slowly counting as the time went minutes, which steamer was first, and gave me the word "Hamburg," in a low voice as we sat face to face. She was nearer to us very fast, and the beating of her paddles was louder and louder. I felt as if her shadow were absolutely upon us when the galley hailed us. I answered.

"You have a returned Transport there," said the man who held the line. "That's the man wrapped in the cloak. His name is Abel Magwitch, otherwise Provis. I apprehend that man, and call upon him to surrender, and you to assist."

At the same moment, without giving any audible direction to his crew, he ran the galley aboard of us. I saw the rowers lay out, and the beating of her paddles under and louder. I felt as if her shadow were absolutely upon us when the galley hailed us. I answered.

"You have a returned Transport there," said the man who held the line. "That's the man wrapped in the cloak. His name is Abel Magwitch, otherwise Provis. I apprehend that man, and call upon him to surrender, and you to assist."

At the same moment, without giving any audible direction to his crew, he ran the galley aboard of us. I saw the rowers lay out, and the second stroke ahead, had got their oars in, had run athwart us, and were holding on to our gunwale before we knew what they were doing. This caused great confusion on board the steamer, and I heard them calling to us, and heard the order given to stop the paddles, and heard them stop, but felt her driving down upon us irresistibly. In the same moment, I saw the starboard of the galley lay his hand on his prisoner's shoulder, and saw that both boats were swinging round with the force of the tide, and saw that all hands on board the steamer were running forward quite frantically. Still in the same moment, I saw the prisoner start up, lean across his captor, and pull the cloak from the neck of the shrinking sitter in the galley. Still in the same moment, I saw that the face disclosed was that of the other convict of long ago. Still in the same moment, I saw the face tilt backward with a white terror on it that I shall never forget, and heard a great cry on board the steamer and a loud splash in the water, and felt the boat sink from under me.

It was but for an instant that I seemed to struggle with a thousand mill-weirs and a thousand flashes of light; that I rose, and I was taken on board the galley. Herbert was there, and Startop was there; but our boat was gone, and the two rowers were gone.

What with the cries aboard the steamer, and the furious blowing-off of her steam, and her driving paddles astern, and the tumult of the first distinguish sky from water or shore from shore; but the crew of the galley righted her with great speed, pulling certain swift strong strokes ahead, lay upon their oars, every man looking sternly and eagerly at the water astern. Presently, the galley was moved in it, bearing toward us on the tide. No man spoke, but the steersman held up his hand, and all softly lay bowed water, and kept the boat straight and true before it. As it came nearer, I saw it to be Magwitch, swimming. He was taken on board, and instantly manacled at the wrists and ankles.

The galley was kept steady, and the silent, eager look-out at the prow scanned. But the Rotterdam steamer now came up, and apparently not understanding what had happened, and not seeing the boat in the water, had been hailed and stopped both steamers were drifting away from us, and we were rising and falling in the wash of the paddles. The look-out was kept long after all was still again and the two steamers were gone; but every body knew that it was hopeless.

At length we gave it up, and pulled under the shore toward the tavern we had lately left, where we were received with great kindness. For me, I was able to get some comforts for Magwitch — Provis no longer — who had received some very severe injury in the chest and a deep cut in the head.

He told me that he believed himself to have gone under the keel of the steamer, and to have been struck on the head in rising. The injury to his chest (which rendered his breathing extremely painful) he thought he had received against the side of the galley. He added that he did not pretend to say what he might or might not have done to Compeyson, but that in the moment of his rising and seeing in his cloak to identify him that villain had staggered up and staggered back, and they had both gone overboard together in the sudden wrenching of him (Magwitch) out of our boat, and the endeavor of his captor to keep him in it, had capsized us. But that, as they both struck out, they had gone down fiercely locked in each other's arms, and that there had been a struggle under water, and that he (Magwitch) disengaged himself, struck out, and swam away.

I never had any reason to doubt the exact truth of what he told me, and the officer who steered the galley gave the same account of their going overboard.

When I asked this officer's permission to change the prisoner's wet clothes by purchasing any spare garments I could get at the public house, he gave leave, not knowing that he must take charge of every thing his prisoner had about him. So the pocket-book which had once been in my possession passed to the officer's. He further gave me leave to accompany the prisoner to London, but declined to accord that grace to any friend.

The Jack at the Ship was instructed where the drowned man had gone down, and undertook to search for the body that night. Probably it was likeliest to come ashore. His interest in its recovery seemed to me to be much heightened when he heard that 10 pounds was claimed. Probably, it took about a dozen drowned men to fit him out completely; and that may have been the reason why the galley-men's articles of his dress were in various stages of decay.

We remained at the public house until the tide turned, and then, having put our prisoner down to the galley and put on board, Herbert and Startop were to get to London by land, as soon as they could. I had but little to carry, and when I took my place by Magwitch's side I felt that that was my place henceforth while he lived.

For now my repugnance to him had all melted away, and in the haunted, wounded, ironed creature who lay at my feet, I saw only the man who had meant to be my benefactor, and who had felt affectionately, gratefully, and generously toward me with great constancy through a series of years. I only saw in him a much better man than I had been to Joe.

His breathing became more difficult and painful as the night drew on, and often he could not repress a groan. I tried to rest him on the arm I could use, and to render him any help that was dreadful to think that I could not be sorry at heart for his being badly hurt, since it was unquestionably best that he should be so. But there were, still living, people enough who were able and willing to identify him, I could not doubt. That he would be convicted, I could not hope. He who had been presented in the worst light at his trial, who had since broken prison, who was the cause of his return, who had returned from transportation under a life sentence, and who had occasioned the death of the man who was the cause of his return.

As we returned toward the setting sun we had yesterday left behind us, and as the stream of our hopes seemed all running back, I told him how grieved I was to think that he had come home for my sake.

"Dear boy," he answered, "I'm quite content to take my chance. I've seen my boy; and he'll be a gentleman without me."

I had thought about that, while we had been there side by side. No. Apart from any inclinations of my own I understand Wemmick's hint now. I foresaw that, being convicted, his possessions would be forfeited to the Crown.

"Lookee here, dear boy," said he. "It's best as a gentleman should not be be known to belong to me. Only come to see me as if you come by chance alonger Wemmick. Sit where I can see you when I am wrote to, for the last o' many times, and I don't ask no more."

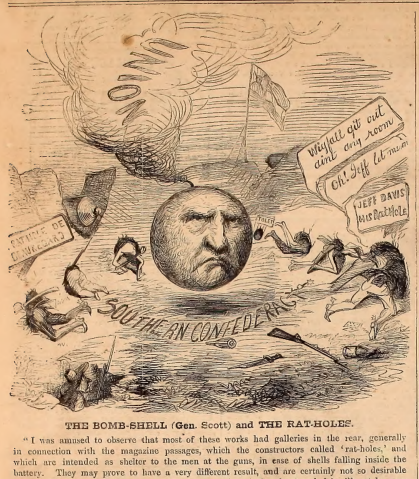
"I will never stir from your side," said I, "when I am suffered to be near you. Please God, I will be as true to you as you have been to me!"

I felt his hand shake as it held mine, and he turned his face away as he lay in the bottom of the boat, and I heard that old sound in his throat—softened now, like all the rest of him. It was a good thing that he had touched this point, for it put into my mind what I might not otherwise have thought of until too late: That he need never know how his hopes of enriching me had perished.

SLAVE AUCTION AT THE SOUTH.

ON page 442 we publish a picture of a SLAVE AUCTION AT THE SOUTH, from a sketch by Mr. Davis, our special artist, who lately traveled through the South in company with W. H. Russell, Esq., LL.D., Correspondent of the London Times. Mr. Russell thus describes slave auctions in a letter from Montgomery, Alabama:

"The crowd was large. Three or four slim men in rough, homespun, wakeskith unicorns leaned against the iron rails running round one of the fountains, drinking water, surrounded by brick-work, which decorates the spaces in front of the principal hotels. The speaker stood on an empty deal packing-case. A man in a cart was listening with a look of interest to his address. Some three or four others, in a sort of vehicle which might either be a hearse or a pleasure-cart, were sitting up for the benefit of the address. Five or six other men, in long black coats and high hats, seemed interested, and chewing tobacco, and discharging streams of discolored saliva, completed the group. 'A likely woman and child for sale, a fine strong healthy field-hand and fifty dollars offered for him!' exclaimed the man, as I came up. There was no sensation, excitement, and surprise, which can be insinuated by all true auctioneers into the dryest numerical statements. 'Will no one make an offer for a woman and child and fifty dollars?' A man near me opened his quiet, apt, and said, 'Twenty-five.' 'Only twenty-five for that servant? Five dollars offered for him!' Why, it's ridiculous—only nine hundred and seven dollars!' 'Will no one,' etc. &c. So said the active auctioneer stood a stout young man of five-and-twenty years of age, with a bundle in his hand. He was a muscular fellow, head-shoulderest, narrow-flanked, but rather small in the hams. He had on a broad, greyish-old wid—awake, a blue jacket, a coarse cotton shirt, loose and rather ragged trowsers, and broken shoes. One expression of his face was heavy and sad, but it was by no means degraded or brutal. His eyes, of black jet, broad nostrils, and high cheek bones. On his head was wool instead of hair. A mulatto mulatto-mulatto of the Rio Republican, nor negro-wenigen, but I confess the sight caused a strange feeling to come over me to palpitate which could persuade me the man was not a man—he was indeed, by no means a handsome man, but scarcely he was a below-creature. I have seen slave auctions in the East, but somehow or other the circumstances of the scene cast a coloring over the nature of the sales there which deprived them of the disgusting coldness and mercenary character of the transaction before me. For Turk, or Bayrampire, or Egyptian, he had and still always wrought rather suited to the eternal fitness of things than to otherwise. The tattooed, shaved, brown, recovered, pipe-smoking merchants, generally the unknown tongue, looked as if they were engaged in a legitimate business. One knew that their stock-in-trade was human flesh, and that it had labor, and that they would be in some sort the instruments of the future members of it. Here it gained on my ear to listen to the familiar tones of the English tongue as the auctioneer spoke. The traders were Americans, and it was painful to see decent-looking men in European attire employed in the sale. Here, too, the auctioneer's impressions may wear off, for I meet many English people who say the same advocates of King Cotton. Perhaps, although it is true that their perceptions may be quickened by contact with the beauty by their participation in the profits. The negro was sold to one of the by-standers, and walked off to his new master. He shouldered his hand



THE BOMB-SHELL (Gen. Scott) and THE RAT-HOLES.

"I was amused to observe that most of these works had galleries in the rear, generally in connection with the magazine passages, which the constructors called 'rat-holes,' and which are intended as shelter to the men at the guns, in case of shells falling inside the battery. They may prove to have a very different result, and are certainly not so desirable in a military point of view as good traverses. A rush for the 'rat-holes' will not be very dignified or improving to the morale every time a bomb hurtles over them; and assuredly the damage to the magazines will be enormous if the fire from Pickens is accurate and well sustained."—DR. RUSSELL'S Letter from Pensacola to the London Times.

Lloyd's Military Map and Gazetteer of the Southern States of North America,
(FOR THE USE OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT,)
SHOWING THE ENTIRE SOUTH, FROM MASON AND DIXON'S LINE TO THE HEART OF MEXICO,
And the Population and Sketch of every Town, Village, River, and Fort.
Drawn from actual Surveys, showing every foot of the Southern Country from Delaware to the banks of the Rio del Norte, Mexico. EVERY COUNTY AND COUNTY SEAT, TOWN, VILLAGE, FORT, NAVY-YARD, RIVER, AND TOWNS AND LANDINGS ON THE RIVERS, LAKES, SWAMP, AND MOUNTAIN is marked down. EVERY RAILROAD, completed up to 25th day of June, 1861, and all those projected, are established on this Map; every Station, and THE DISTANCE from station to station, is worked out*exactly*. Every Inlet, Creek, and place along 3200 miles of sea coast is marked down from official information furnished by the U. S. Superintendent of the Coast Survey to the last Congress. More than 3000 towns on the Mississippi, Red, Arkansas, and Ohio Rivers, are laid down on this map. All the information in the Department at Washington City, in regard to the late Coast Surveys, were used in perfecting this Map. The Forts and Arsenals are all laid down on Lloyd's Map correctly, from official documents in the War Department.
A VALUABLE FEATURE. On the back of the sheet on which Lloyd's Map is printed, is a sketch of every Town, City, River, and Fort, also a Historical Sketch, and the population of each place, from the last census, and other reliable information of the latest date. This information will be of great value to every one at the present time, and is alone worth three times the price of the Map. The amount of information given on the back is equal to an octavo volume of 300 pages—information that can not be had elsewhere for $10.
This Map is acknowledged by Civil Engineers to be the best drawn and most accurate of any map ever offered to the public before. The surveys for this map were made by Civil Engineers of the Southern States; and the information of the Railroads, Stations, and Distances were furnished by Southern Railroad men themselves, and can be relied on as correct. In fact, this is the only correct Map of the Southern Country ever drawn. The people of the Northern States can see correctly, at a glance, the preponderance of the Southern Country over the Northern and Western States, and will more fully comprehend the resources of the Southern States when, by glancing outside at the rich plains of Mexico, which are exhibited on this map.
The public will please understand that this map was not rushed out for the purpose of supplying the people with an imperfect map during the present excitement, but has been under way for more than one year, and is now ready for the public, after a long and tedious work in surveying, drawing, and engraving, and is believed to be the only reliable and full Map of the whole Southern country ever issued. It shows from Philadelphia to the middle of Mexico.
Can be sent by mail any where in America. Agents can sell 50 copies per day. Send money for sample Map and Private Circular. No Postage Stamps taken. The postage on the Sheet Edition is only one cent per copy to any part of the country. 3 copies for $1.

FILLING CARTRIDGES AT THE UNITED STATES ARSENAL, AT WATERTOWN, MASSACHUSETTS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

FILLING CARTRIDGES.

WE give on the preceding page a picture of the operation of FILLING CARTRIDGES at the United States Arsenal at Watertown, Massachusetts. At this establishment some 800 operatives are kept constantly at work making war material. The powder (of which the best is used, a large quantity which came back from the Mexican war being thrown aside for fear it may not be good) is inserted in the cartridge by men, as shown in the lower picture. The bullet is inserted by girls, as shown in the picture above. At least seventy girls and women are kept constantly employed at Watertown in this avocation. The amount of cartridges turned out daily at this factory alone is enormous; and it is evident that, in the course of a few weeks, there will be no lack of this material of war, at all events.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1861.

MR. DAVIS AND MR. RUSSELL.

ON April last, Mr. THEODORE R. DAVIS, our artist-correspondent at Washington, applied to us for permission to travel through the Southern States in company with WILLIAM H. RUSSELL, Esq., LL.D., Barrister at Law, Correspondent of the London Times. We agreed to the proposal, stipulating only that Mr. DAVIS should make such arrangements with Mr. RUSSELL as would insure him facilities for sketching wherever the latter went, and that he should be distinctly known as a member of Mr. RUSSELL'S party. It was already becoming dangerous for Northern men to travel among the South, and we were not willing that Mr. DAVIS should run any needless risk. In reply to the letter specifying these as the conditions upon which we would agree to his proposal, Mr. DAVIS wrote:

I saw Mr. RUSSELL yesterday, we with him at the Navy-yard, and then we with him last night. He says, tell the Editor of HARPER'S Weekly that I am shattered to have this young artist with me, and will do him any kindness in my power.

Early in May last, after Messrs. DAVIS and RUSSELL had left for the South, in an advertisement announcing a large advance in the price of the Weekly from five to six cents, we mentioned that we had an artist with the Southern Army in Virginia, another with the Seventh Regiment in Maryland, a third in Baltimore, and a fourth traveling with Mr. RUSSELL through the Southern States. This announcement elicited from Mr. RUSSELL, in the following card, which was published in the Mobile Register of May 13:

To the Editor of the Mobile Register:

SIR,—My attention has been called to a statement in Harper's Weekly, couched in the following words:

"The proprietors have dispatched an artist to the South in company with Mr. RUSSELL, correspondent of the London Times."

In reference to that statement, I have to observe that my companions are two, viz.: Mr. Ward, a personal friend, who is kind enough to act as my secretary and traveling comrade, and who has no connection whatever with any Journal in the United or Confederate States, and Mr. Davis, a young artist, who is taking sketches for the Illustrated London News, and who assures me that he is not engaged by or connected with Harper's Weekly, though he formerly sent sketches to that periodical.

My position is that of a neutral, and I am employed on no mission that requires the utmost impartiality on my part, although I shall claim for myself the utmost freedom in the expression of my convictions and of my observations to the journal which I have the honor to serve. The expression of those convictions and observations, however, is meant only for England, and I shall not permit the publication I enjoy any interference whatever circumstances may ever by those who accompany me, although I have every reason to believe that their good faith would secure me such a guarantee or assurance on my part unnecessary.

I have only to say in addition that by this post I have forwarded to the paper in question a request that they insert my formal denial of the statement which has occasioned this communication. I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your faithful servant,
W. H. RUSSELL, LL.D.,
Barrister at Law.

The assertions embodied in the above card are reaffirmed in the following communication, which we have received from Mr. RUSSELL:

CAIRO, ILLINOIS, June 20, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly, New York:

SIR,—My attention has just been called to a sketch in your Journal of the 15th inst., which is stated, in the letter-press underneath it, to have been taken by "our Artist who has been traveling with Mr. RUSSELL, LL.D., Barrister at Law."

This statement of an assertion which I had already denied, in a note addressed to you from Mobile at least a month before, in which I stated that my movements then can not have been received by you, particularly when I recall to mind a letter addressed to me at Jacksonville, Mississippi, by an unknown correspondent at Natchez, who apprised me that a sketch and paragraph appeared in your Journal distinctly asserting that I had permitted a special artist, engaged by you, to accompany me in my peregrinations, to travel with me through the seceding States.

Being unable to meet with any copies of the back numbers of your Journal, so as to ascertain the exact words of the statement, I have to request the favor of a copy of a letter from the Hon. JOHN FOWNTH, Mayor of Mobile, and one of the Secession Commissioners at Washington, elicited by a note which I addressed to him at Montgomery, and which I forwarded to a New York daily paper, to the effect that the editor of Harper's Weekly was about to prove a conspiracy—one of a religious character, that he had dispatched an artist to travel with me in my company, which letter was published in the Mobile Register of the 12th ult., under the impression that my own word would be taken for such a matter.

I have only to add that I know nothing of Mr. Theodore Davis except what he told me. He introduced himself to me in a bookshop at Washington, and begged that he might be permitted to travel with me to the South, assigning as his plea that he was engaged to take sketches for the Illustrated London News, and that his previous connection with you might possibly expose him to embarrassment which would be removed if I gave him the permission he so urgently entreated. It came in any other capacity, it was not only without my knowledge, but in contravention of truth and honor, for which I can vouch.

I have the honor to be, Sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,
W. H. RUSSELL.

In reply, we have simply to state that we have every reason to believe that Mr. RUSSELL knew, before he left Washington, that Mr. DAVIS was going with him as the artist of Harper's Weekly, and that nothing has since occurred which ought to have impaired the friendly knowledge of that fact.

Mr. THEODORE R. DAVIS writes us as follows:

HEAD-QUARTERS GENERAL WILLIAM'S BRIGADE,
HARRISBURG, VIRGINIA, June 20, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR,—Your letter, informing me that of Mr. Russell is just received.

I regret exceedingly that my very agreeable and instructive intercourse with Mr. Russell—for which I am deeply indebted to him—should have led to any misunderstanding however trivial. I can not, however, in justice to the line which I have drawn for myself in this case, suffer the shadow of a doubt to rest upon its integrity.

The history of my acquaintance with W. H. Russell, Esq., LL.D., can be briefly stated. After arriving in April last, I met him in Frank Taylor's book store in Washington. In the course of a little chat, I mentioned that in connection with Harper's Weekly, on which the conversation turned upon our mutual profession, the Illustrated London News had also called upon him that evening. When we met, in his room, at the hour appointed, the conversation turned upon the proposed trip South, and the name of our Editor. Mr. Russell proposed Southern tour was mentioned, and I had the honor of inquiring from him if I could not travel in his company him. I immediately communicated the invitation to you, and on receiving your letter, in which you have you approved of my going South with Mr. Russell on certain conditions, I visited him again, and read to him the paragraph in your note referring to the proposed journey. His reply was in substance as follows:

"Tell the editor of Harper's Weekly that I am very happy to have you with me, and will do all I can to assist you."

About a fortnight afterward I received a note from him announcing his up-coming departure, which I found exceedingly together. Previous to my departure I had been introduced to Mr. John Forsyth, of Mobile, and spoken of the engagement I was under with you. Mr. Forsyth professed to be glad to see me, and invited me to visit Mobile. This courtesy I declined on the ground of my prior engagement with Mr. Russell. I visited Mobile after Mr. Forsyth again till we reached Mobile, when I was the recipient of fresh attentions at his hands.

One afternoon at Mobile, I found Mr. John Forsyth in company with other gentlemen in the Ladies' reception parlor. Mr. Forsyth called my attention to a paragraph in the current number of the Illustrated London News, and you had "dispatched an artist to the South in company with Mr. Russell."

I saw that a crisis had arrived. The loyal tone of the Mobile Register rendered it most obnoxious among the rebels. Both Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Forsyth—both knowing perfectly well my connection with Harper's Weekly—cast significant looks at me; the gentlemen around me suspiciously informed, looked suspicious, and angry (I was afterward informed that the house of a gentleman who had but the same risk of closing my career then and there). Under the circumstances, feeling that my interposition was desirable to embarrass Mr. Russell who had been so kind to me, and—to do full justice to your interests—to the Journal, I sent a statement which might have rendered my journey futile, and endangered my life, to the Mobile Register. The advertisement was very strange, and I could not under. stand it. I penciled a letter to you in the leading office of the artist drawing for the Illustrated London News; and this so thoroughly satisfied Mr. Forsyth that he immediately withdrew.

After they had gone, Mr. Russell thoughtfully advised me to leave the Confederate States before copies of Harper's Weekly containing my sketches reached the South. I precisely assured him that there was little danger, as the Secession Press had not been issued regularly from the mails by the secessionists—a prediction which has been well verified.

I am very sorry indeed to be placed in an attitude of apparent duplicity toward Mr. Russell, between whom and myself there exist the most friendly relations. But the fact is that both he and Mr. John Forsyth, of Mobile, knew, at the time of my acquaintance with me, that I was the special artist of Harper's Weekly. And if my regard for them and for the interests of the Journal I represent were not sufficient to prevent a contravention of my instructions, I was justified in denying what they previously knew.

Hoping that this explains fully yours,
THEODORE R. DAVIS.

We are bound to say, in justice to Mr. RUSSELL, whom we have ever found to be an honorable, truth-telling gentleman, that other persons confirm his version of his relations to Mr. DAVIS. Mr. H. RUSSELL, LL.D., Barrister at Law. Thus Major BEN. PERLEY POORE, of the Eighth Massachusetts Regiment, whose word no one will doubt, writes us as follows:

HEAD-QUARTERS MAJ. GEN'L. CAMP EISNER,
WASHINGTON, July 8, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I have had the pleasure to spend a portion of the Washington papers, and in the Washington correspondence of the New York and Philadelphia papers, that Mr. Davis, their correspondent, was with the party of our friend Russell Southward. I remember telling Mr. Davis that I had met him somewhere before, and that was in Boston.

Some days afterward I was invited to the house of Mr. Rodolfo Fillo to meet Mr. Russell, Mr. Davis, and among the guests, and I well remember that when Mr. Russell was at the table—he—Mr. Russell—pointed Mr. Davis out to his seeing companion, etc., saying, pleasantly, "I learn our artist-correspondent has left us." Mr. Davis was then present, and heard the remark.

Mr. Davis is a gentleman of the highest honor, members of the Government, covertly accusing them of complicity with traitors, and allowing them to be installed in positions (if you are a newspaper) like a common thief.

By representing the commanding General as secretly wishing to treat with rebels, and not a suppression of the rebellion.

By aspersing the characters and motives of Generals acting under the immediate orders of the military Commander-in-Chief.

By scrutinizing the details of administration in every department of the army unfavorably.

By always imputing the worst of motives to your opponents in your own party.

By so sophisticating and magnifying undoubted mistakes as to leave the inevitable impression that there are nothing but mistakes to be mentioned.

By insinuating that all delay indicates treachery or cowardice.

Do this incessantly to an Administration which undertakes the Government under incalculable disadvantages, at a moment when immense difficulties are to be encountered, and many grave errors are inevitable; persist in rubbing every chafe into a fester, and denying that any good can be expected from the management of affairs unless the managers are incessantly kicked and spurred and taunted and ridiculed, and you will have the proud satisfaction of having done all you can do to destroy that hearty public confidence, without which an Administration could grapple with the emergency, and to persuade the people that, as their affairs are in such bad hands, and can not be constitutionally taken out of them for four years, the only way to save themselves is to insist upon making the best terms possible with the rebels.

Then, when you have succeeded in doing this, nothing remains but that you should turn upon the friends who reason with you, and say, "Didn't I told you so; I always knew there would be a compromise!"

THE COMET.

MR. BOND, the university astronomer at Cambridge, says that the present comet is the mass of 1264, the Pope Urban comet; nor yet that of 1556, the Charles Fifth comet; but an entirely new and unexpected visitor. Whether it be equal of immperial, or neither, the comet is a very splendid stranger; and in other ages would have been regarded at this epoch as the visible genius of war and confusion. Of all the celestial phenomena comets have always been considered the most portentous. Bodies which have had orbits accurately mized them, they portended dreadful events, or foreshadowed great changes.

If our present visitor be, as has been generally supposed, but as Mr. Bond denies, the comet of Charles Fifth, it is pleasant to reflect that its last appearance was the herald of the great Elizabethan era in England and the beginning of modern history. 1556, the date of its last appearance, was the year in which Charles Fifth abdicated. He had been the arch-enemy of the Reformation, and his abdication may, by the light of the comet, appear to be one of the direct results of the principle which opposed human freedom. It portended also the accession of Elizabeth in 1558. Edmund Spenser and Hooker were three years old and Philip Sydney two, when it shone last. Chapman was born in 1557, Bacon in 1561, Marlowe in 1562, Shakespeare in 1564, Ben Jonson in 1573, Fletcher, Massinger, were not very far off. All the singers and sayers and doers

"that fill
The spacious times of great Elizabeth,
With sounds that echo still,"

were heralded by the comet of Charles Fifth.

Did it portend also the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572; the gay heroism of Henry of Navarre; the career of the great William of Holland, and the glorious days of Philip Second, a long and desperate struggle with human nature? These carnival events of history occupied the half century that followed the comet. The principles which underlie American civilization were tried then by fire. The comet blazes again in our summer sky. Is it to send forth to the world principles triumphed then in establishing themselves, they shall no less conquer in saving liberty and consequently civilization now, and securing them hereafter?

FAIR CRITICISM.

It is perfectly fair to criticise public men and measures. But malevolent interpretations of every act and word are not just and manly criticism.

If you think a man in power is a traitor, say so; but say it honestly; don't blot it sneakingly.

If you think the administration is inadequate to a crisis and needs bolstering, say so; and let the reader understand that you are bolstering because you think there is danger of weakness.

If you are identified with a party and its President is elected, and you think his cabinet incapable, urge no plaints of the folly of the appointed cabinet advisers; don't waste time and imperil the country by hints and innuendoes.

Certainly, the right of management is to be pointed out; well-grounded suspicions of personal dishonor in high officers should not be hushed; frauds of the public money and public and certain appointments are to be openly stated. Such frank and free discussion is the very soul of our system. But incessant fault-finding, sneering, carping, doubting, and denouncing, are not criticism. It is the tone, the manner, which determines the honesty and value of the criticism. The same thing said in one way shows the wish kindly to help; said in another, it shows the determination to withstand and to injure. One way believes a man honest, and approves his course, upon the whole, and allowing for the exceptions, you will see no occasion to censure any particulars as to make his bitterest enemies chuckle.

No loyal man or paper, at this or any juncture, is bound or expected to approve every act of the Administration through thick and thin. But he is honorably bound to express his disapproval in such a way that he shall not be misunderstood or hindered. If he can not express it so as to help, he has no call to speak at all in so solemn a moment.

WHAT A NEWSPAPER MIGHT DO.

A QUIET man asked a shrewd clergyman who had been praying for rain, whether he thought the Almighty answered a special prayer of that kind. "Certainly," returned the clergyman, "if you only pray long enough." And, indeed, in that way we could hardly ask for any thing in the due order of nature that we should not receive.

A shrewd newspaper, in time of war, might pursue the same pious with the same success. Without military skill, or information of the difficulties to be met in the rebels' country, or any other than a general knowledge of the number of troops under command of armed men near Washington, and the distances in miles to Richmond; without the least comprehension of necessary military detail, without which advance would be a crime, it might incessantly shout, "Forward! forward!" and when the Government, having made all its preparations, based upon all its knowledge, moved at the proper moment and in its own time, forward, such a paper might complacently shake its head and say, "There! don't you see! I did it. If I had not

THE LOUNGER.

THE MESSAGE.

THE Message of the President is truly American. Among all the messages of late years it is the most thoroughly democratic. With an unusually clear position of the essential point of the case—that this is the Government of the people or it is nothing, since the Government is nothing except as the people uphold it—he makes his statement and appeal through their representatives to the people themselves.

But still more than this. While many Presidents of many parties would have endeavored to save the Government as they found it, this President would so clearly comprehend or so simply state what the Government was that they were saying. This President was found not acting upon the rights of man; and for the first time in long years the President recognizes that fact. Presidents' messages have been, as a rule, labored defenses of an oligarchical and aristocratic administration of the Government. At length there is a people's President, who means and says that the Government of the United States is restored to its original principles. It is not a matter of party, but of intelligent congratulation.

The character and scope of our system have never been more admirably stated than in the following extract from this Message. It would have been a good thing to make the reading of the Message a special order for the day in every camp of the citizen soldiery of the United States. Every bounty would have rung from the Missouri to the Penobscot, "God save the President of the United States and the Union of the States!"

"This is essentially a people's contest. On the side of the Union it is a struggle for maintaining in the world that form and substance of government whose leading object is to elevate the condition of men, to lift artificial weights from all shoulders, to clear the path of laudable pursuit for all, to afford a fair field for all motives, for all hopes in the race of life, yielding to partial and temporary departures from these principles as the lesser evil, the Government for whose existence we contend. I am most happy to believe that the plain people understand and appreciate this."

LEARNED VIEWS OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT.

THERE are some people and papers who are sadly distressed by the "unconstitutionality" of General Banks's arrest of Marshal Kane in Baltimore. One of these papers has a right to know that the Act of Congress could make the President's proclamation for troops to put down insurrection against the laws legal.

According to these learned pundits the only constitutional thing is treason and rebellion and overthrow of the Government. Here is a system, they think, which can not lawfully resist its own violent destruction. They merely repeat the doctrine of Mr. Buchanan's Attorney-General, that the Union up the Government; but if any body tries, the Government has no right to help itself.

These are the learned views political existence is going to be saved in spite of rebellion.

WHO ARE AGAINST US?

SHOULD there ever be any surrender to any rebellion in this country, who would be responsible for it? Plainly those who, under the guise of supporting the cause, should have sharpened the public mind by poisoning it with suspicion of the disloyalty or the incompetency of the Administration. If the curious inquirer asks how this could be done, the equally plain answer would be,

By insisting at no charge or occasion.

By intriguing against the Administration.

By always imputing the worst of motives to your own party.

By so sophisticating and magnifying undoubted mistakes as to leave the inevitable impression that there are nothing but mistakes to be mentioned.

By insinuating that all delay indicates treachery or cowardice.

Do this incessantly to an Administration which undertakes the Government under incalculable disadvantages, at a moment when immense difficulties are to be encountered, and many grave errors are inevitable; persist in rubbing every chafe into a fester, and denying that any good can be expected from the management of affairs unless the managers are incessantly kicked and spurred and taunted and ridiculed, and you will have the proud satisfaction of having done all you can do to destroy that hearty public confidence, without which an Administration could grapple with the emergency, and to persuade the people that, as their affairs are in such bad hands, and can not be constitutionally taken out of them for four years, the only way to save themselves is to insist upon making the best terms possible with the rebels.

Then, when you have succeeded in doing this, nothing remains but that you should turn upon the friends who reason with you, and say, "Didn't I told you so; I always knew there would be a compromise!"

If our present visitor be, as has been generally supposed, but as Mr. Bond denies, the comet of Charles Fifth, it is pleasant to reflect that its last appearance was the herald of the great Elizabethan era in England and the beginning of modern history. 1556, the date of its last appearance, was the year in which Charles Fifth abdicated. He had been the arch-enemy of the Reformation, and his abdication may, by the light of the comet, appear to be one of the direct results of the principle which opposed human freedom. It portended also the accession of Elizabeth in 1558. Edmund Spenser and Hooker were three years old and Philip Sydney two, when it shone last. Chapman was born in 1557, Bacon in 1561, Marlowe in 1562, Shakespeare in 1564, Ben Jonson in 1573, Fletcher, Massinger, were not very far off. All the singers and sayers and doers

The spacious times of great Elizabeth,
With sounds that echo still,"

were heralded by the comet of Charles Fifth.

Did it portend also the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572; the gay heroism of Henry of Navarre; the career of the great William of Holland, and the glorious days of Philip Second, a long and desperate struggle with human nature? These carnival events of history occupied the half century that followed the comet. The principles which underlie American civilization were tried then by fire. The comet blazes again in our summer sky. Is it to send forth to the world principles triumphed then in establishing themselves, they shall no less conquer in saving liberty and consequently civilization now, and securing them hereafter?

FAIR CRITICISM.

It is perfectly fair to criticise public men and measures. But malevolent interpretations of every act and word are not just and manly criticism.

If you think a man in power is a traitor, say so; but say it honestly; don't blot it sneakingly.

If you think the administration is inadequate to a crisis and needs bolstering, say so; and let the reader understand that you are bolstering because you think there is danger of weakness.

If you are identified with a party and its President is elected, and you think his cabinet incapable, urge no plaints of the folly of the appointed cabinet advisers; don't waste time and imperil the country by hints and innuendoes.

Certainly, the right of management is to be pointed out; well-grounded suspicions of personal dishonor in high officers should not be hushed; frauds of the public money and public and certain appointments are to be openly stated. Such frank and free discussion is the very soul of our system. But incessant fault-finding, sneering, carping, doubting, and denouncing, are not criticism. It is the tone, the manner, which determines the honesty and value of the criticism. The same thing said in one way shows the wish kindly to help; said in another, it shows the determination to withstand and to injure. One way believes a man honest, and approves his course, upon the whole, and allowing for the exceptions, you will see no occasion to censure any particulars as to make his bitterest enemies chuckle.

No loyal man or paper, at this or any juncture, is bound or expected to approve every act of the Administration through thick and thin. But he is honorably bound to express his disapproval in such a way that he shall not be misunderstood or hindered. If he can not express it so as to help, he has no call to speak at all in so solemn a moment.

WHAT A NEWSPAPER MIGHT DO.

A QUIET man asked a shrewd clergyman who had been praying for rain, whether he thought the Almighty answered a special prayer of that kind. "Certainly," returned the clergyman, "if you only pray long enough." And, indeed, in that way we could hardly ask for any thing in the due order of nature that we should not receive.

A shrewd newspaper, in time of war, might pursue the same pious with the same success. Without military skill, or information of the difficulties to be met in the rebels' country, or any other than a general knowledge of the number of troops under command of armed men near Washington, and the distances in miles to Richmond; without the least comprehension of necessary military detail, without which advance would be a crime, it might incessantly shout, "Forward! forward!" and when the Government, having made all its preparations, based upon all its knowledge, moved at the proper moment and in its own time, forward, such a paper might complacently shake its head and say, "There! don't you see! I did it. If I had not kept shouting 'Go on!' we should have stood still till the judgment-day."

It was a shrewd clergyman: "Only keep on praying long enough," said he, "and you are sure to have your prayer answered, to the infinite credit of your superior piety, or patriotism, as the case may be."

OF LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

The Government of the United States is engaged in a struggle for its own existence. The principle of that Government is the constitutional protection of the rights of men. Its army, therefore, marches to defend those rights, and enforce others that of free speech. Consequently, the unprecedented spectacle is shown to the world of a Government so true to its fundamental principles that it suffers itself in time of war to be most unscrupulously assailed and maligned, and permits the rebellion it is crushing to be openly and unhesitatingly defended by papers which it protects from injury. And those papers which are acting thus can to overthrow the Government which secures these rights, and to establish a system of society in which freedom of speech and of the press shall be annihilated, shamelessly assert that liberty of speech is in danger among us.

Their very boldness and daily issue is the refutation of their own calumny.

When the Baltimore murders of the 19th April occurred, a great excited men, who began to see what papers were really responsible for the exasperation, went to their offices and insisted that the stars and stripes should be raised. But the police, against which those papers had likewise daily inveighed, protected the papers then, as the Government is now protecting them now. No candid man will compare those transient disturbances of popular indignation with the permanent moderation of the malicious States. If any journal within those States should try to take a corresponding position to that of these papers in the Free States, the journal would be suppressed by law the office sacked, and the editors hung at the first door by a mob.

As for the petition of Mr. Guion, he and his friends have the most undoubted right to petition for what they choose. But if other people sign the petition without reading it, they have an equally undoubted right to call the police to help them erase their names; and to take the petition for that purpose and keep it until that purpose is accomplished. It is not to suppress a right, but to correct a fraud.

The right of the freest speech and of petition are the birthright of every American citizen. Those rights are respected in the free, loyal States of this country, with some few and flagrant exceptions. Those rights are outraged in the slave, rebellious States of this country. If the rebellion prevails, those rights will be every where denied and destroyed.

The papers of which we have spoken claim the right of free speech for the purpose of annihilating free speech. That right will be protected in the exercise of that right by the same Government of all the people, which will frustrate the end they seek.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

On the day of the last Presidential election, a protracted meeting was in successful progress at the Methodist church in the village of Pecan, in one of the border counties of Virginia. The minister in charge, the Rev. Mr. T——, was a Democrat, and a very earnest partisan for a minister of his latitude. Evening services were far advanced in the meeting, when, as an excitement consequent to the day, that near the door of the church, the good preacher (who was a good man), mistaking the appearances of fire for the outer the influence of the spirit (nor was he far out of it), approached, in his search for conversions, and whispered in "——," with you not come forward and join us?" "I was, sir," replied the boy, but half-choking reply. "Come forward and join us," earnestly rewhisper. "I will, sir—immediately." "S-s-s-s-s-?" "I shouldn't like," "I am an old-like Whig, and shall live and die one." This reply was received with unexpected merriment by the congregation, while the minister retraced his steps to the altar, there to pray, doubtless mentally calculating that N—was joined to his idols.

An Irishman called on a lady and gentleman, in whose employ he was, for the purpose of getting some assistance. "I had a drame last night, yer honor," said he to the gentleman, "and I want you to help me to interpret it." "What, Patrick, that yer honor made me a present of a pound of tobacco, and last night when I was asleep I dramed I was chewing it, and my tay for the good with." "Ah, Pat, dreams by go contraries, you know," said the gentleman. "Faith, and they may that," said Pat: "so her indyship is to give the tobacco and his honor the tay."

MRS. PARTINGTON ON WIDOWS.—"Oh what trials a poor widow has to go through!" sighed Mrs. Partington, rocking herself to and fro mechanically on a sofa, and holding the morsel of mentachey between her thumb and her finger, terribly afraid she had had a hankchy to be executor to an intestine estate, where enviable people are trying every day to overcome the widow's might; where it's probe it, probe it, probe it all the time, and then you probe it, and then you probe it again. The poor widow never gets justice, for if she gets all she don't get half enough. I have had one trial of it, and if ever I marry again I'll make my pretended husband fabricate our will before he'll have the wedding-ring—I'll take time by the forepot, as the sage says."

Berrynose happening to come late to the theatre, and having to climb over a bench, was obliged to the last moment, when, to heighten his perplexity, the key of his drawer slipped down his leg. "Oh!" he said, "I must have swallowed it."—"Never mind," said his friend Bannister, coolly, "if you have, it will soon be upon your chest."

Two cardinals found fault with Raphael for having, in one of his pictures, given too fleshy a representation of Jupiter and his Paul. "Gentlemen," replied the artist, "don't be surprised: I paint them just as they look to me. They are thinking with shame to see the Church below so badly governed."

Missionary Wolff tells a story of a certain M. Preiswerg, of Geneva, a good and excellent Christian, to whom a ghost appeared as he was going to bed, and said, "I am the ghost of a person who was hanged here six weeks ago." "That's no business of mine," replied Preiswerg; "so, good-night."

A Scotch advocate, pleading the cause of a widow against a drunken, the Judge recommended that the parties should "feel each other's palms." Mr. L——a, looking earnestly at his brethren, exclaimed, "Where there is no beard there can be no palms, my lord."

SIMILAR MISFORTUNES.—A contemporary states that "Mr. Tait was run over and killed in the Cleveland road the other day," and adds that "a similar misfortune occurred to him about ten years ago. A few more such "similar misfortunes" will be the death of him.

"Indie, my boy," said an Irishman to a friend on his arrival at Calcutta, "is jist the finest country in the universe; but a lot of young fellows come out here, and they drink and they sin, and they ate and they shrink, and they die; and then they write home to their friends a pack of lies, and say the climate has killed 'em."

Some say there's nothing made in vain,
While others the reverse maintain,
But I can't see
By citing animals like these—
Lobsters, bedbugs, fleas, and geese—
And worse than all, a dandy.

A retired schoolmaster excuses his passion for angling by saying that, from constant habit, he never feels quite himself unless he is handling the rod.

A man was suspected of stealing a horse, and was taken up. "Why, sir, I takes the horse," said the man to the police. "I take you for a horse," was the reply; whereupon he kicked the fellow down the steps.

"What is the reason that your wife and you always disagree?" asked one Irishman of another. "Because we are both of one mind. She wants to be master, and so do I."

"I am a great gun," said a tipsy printer, who had been on the spree for a week. "Yes," said his companion, "you are a great gun, and half-cocked, and you can consider yourself discharged." "Well," said Typo, "then I had better go off."

A miller, giving a testimonial to the proprietor of a powder for destroying rats, wrote that after using the powder, "I was full of rats a fortnight since, and now I don't see a dozen."

A pragmatical young fellow, sitting at table opposite Lord Eldon, when plain John Scott, asked him, "What difference is there between a goose and Scott?" "Just the breadth of this table," was the reply.

An Irishman who had been hurt a few months in this country, and who had received a gentleman in a subscription, being sent with a note, with the command to make all possible haste, found on the way a turtle, which he picked up, supposing it to be a pocket-book. Determining to keep it, he hurried on to the place where he was to receive the supposed prize, but placed it in his pocket, anticipating a rich reward when he should get home. Before he had reached home the turtle had made its way nearly out of his pocket, when he felt it, and, supposing it was the reward, cried out, "Oh his arrival at the house he took it out, and to his great disappointment, but fall of rage, threw it, he roared wildly into the kitchen, exclaiming to the cook, "Bessie, Bessie, did ye ever see a toad with a knee?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The President, in the Message which was read on 4th before Congress, begins by sketching the condition of the country. "A right result may be confidently expected if the policy" looked to the exhaustion of all peaceful measures before a resort to force as a last remedy. This means within his reach for the reinforcement of Major Anderson, but would have abandoned Fort Sumter, and was a blunder which prevented the reinforcement of Fort Pickens. Fearful that the latter would be attacked and captured, the President determined to attempt to supply Sumter by force, and gave due notice of such purpose to the Governor of South Carolina. The notice was driven to sail out the war in power of the Government, and the fleet with it, and was only obeyed by the Free States and Delaware. Virginia passed an ordinance of secession in April, when the passage seized the arsenal at Harper's Ferry and the navy-yard at Gosport. Referring to the forces in the field concerning which Rockley proposes to maintain, the President calls for "a division of forces." The Secretary of War was put in a calling for troops, and suspending the habeas corpus act, in favor of the military authorities, he asks for such acts to Congress for indemnity. He has forced to choose between breaking one law to enforce the whole body of laws to impunity, and he chose the former as the least evil. What he now asks is that Congress will say in the following sentence:

He now recommended that you give the legal sanction for making this contract a short and decisive one. He asks you to place at the disposal of the Government for the next 400,000 men and $400,000,000. In full view of his great responsibility to his country and his duty, he does not shrink from laying before you these, or any other measures which Rockley proposes to maintain, the President calls

VIEW OF HAGERSTOWN.—PHILADELPHIA RANGERS.

On page 454 will be found a picture, from a drawing by our special artist, now with General Patterson's division, giving a view of Hagerstown as seen from head-quarters, together with a fine group of M'Mullin's Philadelphia Rangers in the fore-ground. The Rangers number a full company, and are encamped near head-quarters as a body-guard to General Patterson. They are the pets of this portion of the army, and have already earned for themselves an enviable reputation by their valuable and daring services to the Government as scouts. Their quiet deportment and unassuming air have won for the Rangers a host of friends among the Pennsylvanians and Marylanders with whom they have thus far sojourned. Captain M'Mullin himself served valiantly in the Mexican war, as did also many of those now under his experienced command. He is a good soldier and an exceedingly popular officer.

Hagerstown is a city of about 4500 inhabitants, contains seven churches and three banks, and is the dépôt for an extensive grain-growing country. Its site is very beautiful, being in the heart of the Cumberland Valley. On either side run the North and South Mountains, about twenty-five miles apart, and along the eastern limits of the place courses a charming rivulet, the Antietam. Washington County, of which Hagerstown is the chief mart, was organized in 1776. Elizabethtown was the name given to the original settlement, but this was changed to its present title by act of Legislature about the year 1813, out of compliment to Christian Hager, a prominent citizen. A corporation charter was also obtained at the same time, and a Moderator and Commissioners formed the officers of the city government. A new charter in 1846 provided for the election of a Mayor and Common Council.

Many delightful drives are to be found around the city, and many elegant residences. Among the more prominent public buildings depicted in our sketch are the Lutheran and Dutch Reformed churches, the Market, and the Washington House. The latter is a surprisingly fine hotel for so small a place, being large, handsome, and well kept. An unwonted prominence has lately been given to Hagerstown by reason of its being selected as the head-quarters of the "Military Department of Pennsylvania," over which Major-General Patterson presides.

LOCOMOTIVE AND TENDER THROWN FROM THE RAILWAY BRIDGE AT HARPER'S FERRY BY THE REBELS.

HARPER'S FERRY.

We publish on this page some engravings of scenes at Harper's Ferry which illustrate the condition in which the rebels have left that romantic spot.

Two of our pictures represent THE DESTRUCTION OF LOCOMOTIVES ON THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD. No less than fifty of the finest locomotives on the road have been destroyed at Martinsburg and other points. The engine represented in our picture was brought up from the Maryland side of the Potomac; the day before the destruction of the bridge it was left standing on the Winchester road, and a few days after the retreat a detachment of rebels returned to the Ferry and run it off the end of the ruined bridge into the river, where it now lies in the position depicted in the sketch.

The sketch of the ARMORY was made from the upper end of the Armory yard, looking down. It shows a portion of the works, but they all look alike now, all in ruins, every vestige of wood-work destroyed. A settled melancholy now hangs over the place with its long lines of blackened walls and deserted, lonely appearance.

The KENTUCKY REGIMENT, Colonel Duncan, whose camp we illustrate, recently composed part of General Johnston's command at Harpe'r's Ferry. They occupied the Heights on the Maryland side of the river. Their principal camp, about a mile from the Ferry, numbered some fifty or sixty log cabins, laid off in streets, having the appearance of quite a town. The fort or stockade is just behind the camp, facing north; it is made of a double row of logs set endwise in the ground. It is loop-holed for the use of musketry, and might prove a very good protection from a bullet, but would stand no chance at all from the fire of a six-pounder. They left it unfinished in their retreat.

VIRGINIA MOUNTAINEERS.

WE publish on this page a picture representing a group of VIRGINIA MOUNTAINEERS. The artist to whom we are indebted for the sketch thus describes it:

I send you a sketch made up from separate drawings taken from life, and which may be relied on as a fair specimen of the Virginia mountaineers. The Blue Ridge at this time swarms with these men, acting as mounted rifles and sharp-shooters. They are all large, few being under six feet high, of powerful muscular build, and from a continuous active life in the open air, are inured to all sorts of hardships. Their dress is both picturesque and comfortable, being composed of a mixture of homespun and deerskin, which, together with a coonskin cap, imparts a somewhat savage expression to their bronzed countenances.

MAJOR-GENERAL PATTERSON.

GENERAL PATTERSON, whose portrait we give above, was born in the County of Tyrone, Ireland, in 1792. His father, being implicated in the rebellion of 1798, was obliged to leave the country; he came here with his family, settling in Delaware County, Pennsylvania. In 1811 the father removed to Tennessee; Robert had previously been placed in the counting-house of Edwin Thompson, the great East India merchant of the day, at Philadelphia. He was at his desk in the counting-house at the breaking out of the war of 1812. Entering this war as a Lieutenant of the Twenty-second Infantry, he left it at its close a Captain, and again returned to his post in the counting-house. He became an acting officer of Volunteer soldiery, rising through all the grades to a Major-General. At the breaking out of the Mexican war, being appointed a Major-General by President Polk, he took command of the Volunteers upon what is known as General Taylor's lines, serving through the war. He had sole command of an expedition against Tampico, with 9000 men. After the occupation of this place he was ordered to join the column of General Scott, with whom he landed at Vera Cruz. The Volunteer division under his command did their full share of the work; the famous naval batteries, which proved themselves so effectual in the breaching of the Mexican fortifications, were manned by men under General Patterson's command. These guns were ship-guns of heavy calibre, and were dragged to their position at night by the soldiers and sailors: so secretly was this done, that the Mexicans were not aware of the position of any battery until a most fearful fire was opened from the concealed batteries upon them.

Returning home with his Volunteers, who were twelve-months' men, he again repaired to Mexico, after an absence of a few weeks only, and took command of the Volunteer division at the city of Mexico, remaining at this place until the declaration of peace.

Again returning home, he entered the counting-house, in which by this time he had long been a partner. At the breaking out of the rebellion he was called upon to hold himself in readiness, by a telegram the 10th of April from Governor Curtin. In a very short space of time we find him ready for active service. Eight regiments of his division are now in the field, and others are daily expected.

The General was married in 1817 to the daughter of the late Judge Engle, by whom he has now six children—three sons and three daughters. Of the sons two are in the field.

CHAPTER LIV.

He was taken to the Police Court next day and would have been immediately committed for trial, but that it was necessary to send down for an old officer of the prison-ship from which he had once escaped to speak to his identity. Nobody doubted it; but Compeyson, who had means to depose to it, was tumbling on the tides, dead, and it happened that there was not at that time any prison officer in London who could give the required evidence. I had gone direct to Mr. Jaggers at his private house, on my arrival overnight, to retain his assistance, and Mr. Jaggers on the prisoner's behalf would admit nothing. It was the sole resource, for he told me that the case must be over in five minutes when the witness was there, and that no power on earth could prevent its going against us.

I imparted to Mr. Jaggers my design of keeping him in ignorance of the fate of his wealthy Mr. Jaggers was querulous and angry with me for having "let it slip through my fingers," and said we must memorialize by-and-by, and try at all events for some of it. But he did not conceal from me that although there might be many cases in which the forfeiture would not be exacted, there were no circumstances in this case to make it one of them. I understood that very well. I was not related to the outlaw, or connected with him by any recognizable tie; he had put his hand to no writing or settlement in my favor before his apprehension, and to do so now would be idle. I had no claim, and I finally resolved, and ever afterward abided by the resolution, that my heart should never be sickened with the hopeless task of attempting to establish one.

There appeared to the reason for supposing that the deluded informer had hoped for a reward out of this forfeiture, and had obtained some accurate knowledge of Magwitch's affairs. When his body was found, many miles from the scene of his death, and so horribly disfigured that he was only recognizable by the contents of his pockets, notes were still legible, folded in the outer case of the watch he wore. Among these, were the name of a banking-house in New South Wales, where a sum of money was, and the designation of certain lands of considerable value. Both these heads of information were in a list that Magwitch, while in prison, gave to Mr. Jaggers, of the possessions he supposed I should inherit. His ignorance, poor fellow, at last served him: he never knew what but this my inheritance was quite safe, with Mr. Jaggers's aid.

After three days' delay, during which the crown prosecution stood over for the production of the witness from the prison-ship, the witness came, and completed the easy case. He was committed to take his trial at the next Sessions, which would come on in a month.

It was at this dark time of my life that Herbert returned home one evening, a good deal cast down, and said:

"My dear Handel, I fear I shall soon have to leave you."

His partner having prepared me for that, I was less surprised than he thought.

"We shall lose a fine opportunity if I put off going to Cairo, and I am very much afraid I must go. Handel, when you must need me!"

"Herbert, I shall always need you, because I shall always love you; but my need is no greater now than at another time."

"You will be so lonely."

"I have not leisure to think of that," said I. "You know that I am always with him to the full extent of the time allowed, and that I should be with him all day long, if I could. And when I come away from him, you know that my thoughts are with him."

The dreadful condition to which he was brought was so appalling to both of us that we could not refer to it in plainer words.

"My dear fellow," said Herbert, "let the new prospect of my separation—for it is very near—be my justification for troubling you about yourself. Have you thought of your future?"

"No, for I have been afraid to think of any future."

"But yours can not be dismissed; indeed my dear, dear Handel, it must not be dismissed. I wish you would enter on it now, as far as a few friendly words go, with me."

"I will," said I.

"In this branch house of ours, Handel, we must have a—"

I saw that his delicacy was avoiding the right word, so I said, "A clerk."

"A clerk. And I hope it is not at all unlikely that he may expand (as a clerk of your acquaintance has expanded) into a partner. Now, Handel—in short, my dear boy, will you come to me?"

There was something charmingly cordial and engaging in the manner in which after saying "Now, Handel," as if it were the open sesame of portentous business exordium, he had suddenly given up that tone, stretched out his honest hand, and spoken like a school-boy.

"Clara and I have talked about it and again," Herbert pursued, "and the dear little thing begged me only this evening, with tears in her eyes, to say to you that if you will live with us when we come together, she will do her best to make you happy, and to convince her husband's friend that he is her friend too. We should get on so well, Handel!"

I thanked her heartily, and I thanked him heartily, but said I could not yet make sure of joining him as he so kindly offered. In truth, my mind was too preoccupied to be able to take in the subject clearly. Secondly——Yes! Secondly, there was a new something lingering in my thoughts that will come out very near the end of this slight narrative.

"But if you thought, Herbert, that you could, without doing any injury to your business, leave the question open for a little while—"

"For any while," cried Herbert. "Six months, a year!"

"Not so long as that," said I. "Two or three months at most."

Herbert was highly delighted when we shook hands on this arrangement, and said he could now take courage to say that he believed he must go away at the end of the week.

"And Clara?" said I.

"The dear darling thing," returned Herbert, "holds dutifully to her father as long as he lasts; but he won't last long. Mrs. Whimple confides to me that he is certainly going."

"Not to say an unfeeling thing," said I, "he can not do better than go."

"I am afraid that must be admitted," said Herbert; "and then I shall come back for the dear little thing, and the dear little thing and I will walk quietly into Little Britain church. Remember! The blessed darling comes of no family, my dear Handel, and never looked into the red book, and therefore is a modest about her grandeur. What a fortune for the son of my mother!"

On the Saturday in that same week I took my leave of Herbert—full of bright hope, but sad and sorry to leave me—as he sat on one of the sea-port mail-coaches. I went into a coffee-house to write a little letter to Clara, telling her he had gone off sending his love to her over and over again, and then went to my lonely home. If it deserved the name, I had no other home to me, and I had no home any where.

On the stairs I encountered Wemmick, who was coming down from the prisoner's application-of his knuckles to my door. I had not seen him alone since the disastrous issue of the attempted flight; and I felt that, in his want of tact and personal capacity, to say a few words of explanation in reference to that failure.

"The late Compeyson, Mr. Wemmick," had by little and little got at the bottom of half of the regular business now transacted, and it was from the talk of those two that Wemmick had (some of his people being always in trouble) that I heard what I did. I kept my ears open, seeming to have nothing to do with it when I was absent, and I thought that would be the best time for making the attempt. I can only suppose now that it was the wrong time, and that clever man, habituated to deceive his own instruments. You don't blame me, I hope, Mr. Pip? I am sure I tried to serve you with all my heart."

"I am as sure of that, Wemmick, as you can be, and I thank you most earnestly for all your interest and friendship."

"Thank you, thank you very much. It's a bad job," said Wemmick, squeezing his hand, "and I assure you I haven't been so cut up for a long time. What I had to do is the sacrifice of as much property as could be got rid of."

"What I think of, Wemmick, is the poor owner of the property."

"Yes, to be sure," said Wemmick. "Of course there can be no objection to your being sorry for him, and I'd put down a five-pound note myself to get a proper bill of the whole look at is this. The late Compeyson having been beforehand with him in intelligence of his return, and having communicated it to that book, I don't think he could have been saved. Whereas the portable property certainly could have been got away. Then, Compeyson between the property and the owner, don't you see?"

I invited Wemmick to come up stairs and refresh himself with a glass of grog before he went to Walworth. He accepted the invitation, and while he was drinking his moderate allowance said, with nothing to lead up to it, and after having appeared rather fidgety:

"What do you think of my meaning to take a holiday one of these days, Mr. Pip?"

"Why, I suppose you have not done such a thing these twelve months."

"You're right, more likely," said Wemmick. "Yes. I'm going to take a holiday. More than that; I'm going to take a walk. More than that; I'm going to ask you to take a walk with me."

I was about to excuse myself, as being but a bad companion just then, when Wemmick anticipated me.

"I know your engagements," said he, "and I know you are out of sorts, Mr. Pip. But if you could oblige me, I should take it as a kindness. It ain't a long walk, and it's an early one. Say it might occupy you the breakfast-time, and I'll walk from eight to twelve. Couldn't you stretch a point and manage it?"

He had so much work for me at various times that this was very little to do for him. I said I could manage it—would manage it—and he was so very much pleased by my acquiescence that I was pleased too. At his particular request I appointed to call for him at the Castle at half past seven on Monday morning, and so we parted for the time.

Punctual to my appointment, I rang at the Castle gate on the Monday morning, and was received by Wemmick himself: who struck me as looking sighter than usual, and having a slecker hat on. Within, there were two glasses of rum-and-milk prepared, and two biscuits. The Aged must have been stirring with the lark, for, glancing into the perspective of his bedroom, I observed that his bed was empty.

When we had fortified ourselves with the rum-and-milk and biscuits, and were going out for the walk with that training preparation on us, I was considerably surprised to see Wemmick take up a fishing-rod, and put it over his shoulder. "Why, we are not going fishing!" said I. "No," returned Wemmick, "but I like to walk with one."

I thought this odd; however, I said nothing, and we set off. We went round Camberwell Green, and when we were thereabouts Wemmick said, suddenly,

"Halloa! Here's a church!"

There was nothing very surprising in that; but again, I was rather surprised, when he said, and in the same animated by a brilliant idea,

"Let's go in!"

We went in, Wemmick leaving his fishing-rod in the porch, and looked all round. In the mean time Wemmick was diving into his coat-pockets, and getting something out of paper bags.

"Halloa!" said he. "Here's a couple of pair of gloves! Let's put 'em on!"

As the gloves were his kid gloves, and as the post-office was widened to its utmost extent, I now began to have my strong suspicions. They were strengthened into certainty when I beheld the Aged enter at a side door, escorting a lady.

"Halloa!" said Wemmick. "Here's Miss Skiffins! Let's have a wedding!"

That discreet damsel was attired as usual, except that she was now engaged in substituting for her green kid gloves a pair of white. The Aged was likewise occupied in preparing a similar service for the altar of Hymen. The old gentleman, however, experienced so much difficulty in getting his gloves on, that Wemmick found it necessary to put him with his back against a pillar, and then to get behind the pillar himself, and pull over them, while I for my part held the old gentleman round the waist, that he might present an equal and safe resistance. The art of these dexterous scheme his gloves were got on to perfection.

The clerk and clergyman then appearing, we were ranged in the usual formal rails. True to his notion of seeming to do it all without preparation, I heard Wemmick say to himself as he took something out of his waistcoat pocket before the service began, "Halloa! Here's a ring!"

I acted in the capacity of backer, or best-man, to the bridegroom; while a little limp pew opener, in a soft bonnet like a baby's, made a fetch of being the friend of the bride. Miss Skiffins. The responsibility of giving the lady away devolved upon the Aged, which led to the clergyman being unnecessarily particularized, and it happened thus: When he said "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" the old gentleman, not at all comprehending what part of the ceremony we had arrived at, stood most amiably beaming at the ten commandments. Upon which Wemmick cleared away, and "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" The old gentleman being still in a state of most admirable unconsciousness, the bridegroom cried out in his accustomed voice, "Now Aged P., you know; who giveth?" To which the Aged replied with great readiness, before saying that he gave, "All right, John, all right, my boy!" And the clergyman came to so gloomy a pause upon it, that I felt it incumbent on me to consider whether we should get completely married that day.

It was completely done, however, and when we were going out of church Wemmick took the cover off the font and put his white gloves in it, and put the cover on again. Mrs. Wemmick, more heedful of the future, put her white gloves in her pocket and assumed her green. "Now, Mr. Pip," said Wemmick, triumphantly wheeling the fishing-rod as we came out, "let me ask you whether any body would suppose this to be a wedding-party?"

Breakfast had been ordered at a pleasant little tavern a mile or so away upon the rising ground beyond the Castle; and there was a bagatelle board in the room in case we should desire to unbend our minds after the solemnity. It was pleasant to observe that Mrs. Wemmick no longer unwound Wemmick's arm when it adapted itself to her figure, but sat in a high-backed chair opposite the wall, like a widowed in its case, and submitted to be embraced as that melodious instrument might have done.

We had an excellent breakfast, and when any one declined any thing on table, Wemmick said, "Provided by contract, you know; don't be afraid of it!" And when he saw me drink to the Aged, drank to the Castle, saluted the bride at parting, and made myself as agreeable as I could.

Wemmick came down to the door with me, and I again shook hands with him, and wished him joy.

"Thankee!" said Wemmick, rubbing his hands. "She's such a manager of fowls you have no idea. You shall have some eggs, and judge for yourself. I say, Mr. Pip!" calling me back, and speaking low. "This is altogether a Wemmick settlement, please."

"I understand. Not to be mentioned in Little Britain," said I.

Wemmick nodded. "After what you let out the other day, Mr. Jaggers may as well not know of it. He might think my basin was softening, or something of the kind."

CHAPTER LV.

He lay in prison very ill, during the whole interval between his committal for trial and the coming round of the Sessions. He had broken two ribs, they had wounded one of his lungs, and he breathed with great pain and difficulty, which increased daily. The one consequence of his hurt that he spoke so low as to be scarcely audible; therefore he spoke very little. But he was ever ready to listen to me, and it became the first duty of my life to say to him, and read to him what I knew he ought to hear.

Being far too ill to remain in the common prison he was removed, after the first day or so, into the Infirmary. This gave me opportunities of being with him that I could not otherwise have had. And but for his illness he would have been put in irons, for he was regarded as a determined prison-breaker, and kept strictly for what else.

Although I saw him every day, it was for only a short time; hence the regularly recurring spaces of our separation were long enough to recast on his face any slight changes that occurred in his physical state. I do not recollect that I once saw any change in it for the better; but I know that as he became more weaker and worse, day by day, from the day when the prison doors closed upon him.

The kind of submission or resignation that he showed was that of a man who was tired out. I sometimes derived an impression, from his manner, or from a whispered word or two which escaped him, that he pondered over the question whether he might have been a better man under better circumstances. But he never justified himself by a hint tending that way, or tried to bend the past out of its eternal shape.

It happened on two or three occasions in my presence that his impending separation was alluded to by one or other of the people in attendance on him. A smile crossed his face then, and he turned his head to me with a tranquil look, as if he were confident that I had seen some small redeeming touch in him, even so long ago as when I was his judge, and as all the rest, he was humble and contrite, and I never drew him complain.

When the assizes came round Mr. Jaggers caused an application to be made for the postponement of his trial until the following Sessions. I forget what the technical reason was that he could not live so long, and was refused. The trial came on at once, and when he was put to the bar he seemed quite a cinder. The only objection was made to my getting close to the dock, on the outside of it, and holding the hand that he stretched forth to me.

The trial was very short and very clear. Such things as could be said for him were said—how he had meant well always, and had been led astray by bad companions, and how he had thriven lawfully and reputably. But nothing could unsay the fact that he had returned, and was then in presence, to receive his sentence. It was impossible to try him for that, and do otherwise than find him Guilty.

The device to which I was the custom (as I learned from my terrible experience of that Sessions) to devote a concluding day to the passing of Sentences, and to have it known beforehand in the Sentence of Death. But for the indelible picture that my remembrance now holds before me, I could scarcely believe, even at the time these words, that I saw two-and-thirty men and women put before the Judge to receive that sentence together. I remember seeing that two-and-thirty was he; seated, that he might get breath enough to keep life in him.

The whole scene comes out again in the vivid colors of the moment, down to the drops of April rain on the windows of the court, glittering in the rays of the April sun. Penned in the dock, as I again stood outside it at the corner with his hand in mine, were the two-and-thirty men and women; some defiant, some callous, some with terror, some sobbing and weeping, some covering their faces, some staring gloomily about. There were two young women who were shortly to be executed, they had been stilled, and a hush had succeeded. The sheriffs with their great chains of office were there, and other officers and monsters, criers, ushers, a great gallery full of people—a large theatrical audience—looked on, as the two-and-thirty and the Judge were solemnly confronted. Then the Judge addressed them. Among the wretched creatures before him whom he was about to doom for capital address was one who almost from his infancy had been an offender against the laws; who, after repeatedly undergoing summary punishment, had been at length sentenced to exile for a term of years; and who, under circumstances of great violence and daring, had broken his bounds, and been resentenced to exile for life. That miserable man would seem for a time to have become morose and brutal in exile: for expelled from the scenes of his old offenses, and to have lived a peaceable and honest life. But in a fatal moment yielding to those remembrances and recollections, the indulgence of which had so long rendered him a scourge to society, he had quitted his haven of rest and repentance, and had come back to the country where he was proscribed. Being here presently denounced, he had for a time succeeded in evading the officers of Justice, but being at length seized while in the act of flight, he had resisted them, and had—he best knew whether by express design, or in the blindness of his hardihood—caused the death of his denouncer, to whom his whole career was known. Therefore he stood condemned, as his return to the land that had cast him out being Death, and his case being this aggravated case, he must prepare himself to die.

The sun was striking in at the great windows of the court through the glittering drops of rain upon the glass, and it made a broad shaft of light between the two-and-thirty and the Judge, lighting both together, and perhaps reminding some among the audience both vividly and unconsciously, with absolute equality, to the greater Judgment that knoweth all things and never errs. Rising for a moment, a distinct speck of face in this way of light, the prisoner said, "My Lord, I have received my sentence of Death from the Almighty, but I bow to yours," and sat down again. There was some hushing, and the Judge went on with what he had to say to the rest. Then they were all formally doomed, and some of them were supported out, and some of them sauntered out with a haggard look of bravery, and a few nodded to the gallery, and two or three shook hands, and others went out chewing the fragments of herb they had taken from the sweetherbs lying about. He went last of all, because of having to be helped from his chair and to go very slowly; and he held my hand while all the others were attended, and while the audience got up (putting their dresses right, as they might at church or elsewhere) and pointed down at this criminal or at that, and most of all at him and me.

I earnestly hoped and prayed that he might die before the Recorder's Report was made, but, in the dread of his lingering on, I began that night to write out a petition to the Home Secretary of State, setting forth the knowledge of him, and how it was that he had come back for my sake. I wrote it as fervently and pathetically as I could, and when I had finished it and sent it in, I wrote out other petitions to such men in authority as I hoped were the most merciful, and drew up one to the Crown itself. For several days and nights after he was sentenced I took no rest except when I fell asleep in my chair, but was wholly absorbed in these appeals. And after I had sent them in, I could not keep away from the places where they were, but felt as if they were more hopeful and less desperate when I was near them. In this unreasonable restlessness and pain of mind I would roam the streets of an evening, wandering by those offices and houses where I had left the petitions. To the present hour the weary western streets of London on a cold dusty spring night, with their ranges of stern shut-up mansions, and their long rows of lamps, are melancholy to me from this association.

The daily visits I could make him were shortened now, and he was more strictly kept. Seeing, or fancying, that I was suspected of an intention of carrying poison to him, I asked to be searched before I sat down at his bedside, and told the officer where I was always there, that I was willing to do any thing that would assure him of the singleness of my designs. Nobody was hard with him or with me. There was duty to be done, and it was done, but not harshly. The officer always gave me the assurance that he was worse, and some other sick prisoners in the room, and some other prisoners, attended on them as sick nurses (malefactors but not incapable of kindness, God be thanked!) always joined in the same report.

As the days went on, I noticed more and more that he would lie, placidly looking at the white ceiling, in a manner of light in his face, until some word of mine brightened it for an instant, and then it would subside again. Sometimes he was dozing, or quiet, unable to speak, then he would answer me with, slight pressure on my hand, and I grew to understand his meaning very well.

The number of the days had mounted up to ten, when I saw a greater change in him than I had seen yet. His eyes were turned toward the door, and lighted up as I entered.

"Dear boy," he said, as I sat down by his bed: "I thought you was late. But I knowed you couldn't be that."

"It is just the time," said I, "I waited for it at the gate."

"You always waits at the gate; don't you, dear boy?"

"Yes. Not to lose a moment of the time."

"Thankee, dear boy, thankee. God bless you! You've never deserted me, dear boy."

I pressed his hand in answer, for I could not forget that I had once meant to desert him.

"And what's best of all," he said, "you've been more comfortable alongst me, since I was under a dark cloud, than when the sun shone. That's best of all."

He lay on his back, breathing with great difficulty. Do what he would, and love me though he did, the light left his face ever and again, and a film came over the placid look at the white ceiling.

"Are you in much pain to-day?"

"I don't complain of none, dear boy."

"You never do complain, dear Magwitch."

He had spoken his last words. He smiled, and I understood his face to mean that he wished to lift my hand, and lay it on his breast. I laid it there, and he smiled again, and put both his hands upon it.

The allotted time ran out while we were thus; but looking round, I found the governor of the prison standing by me, and he whispered: "You needn't go yet." I thanked him gratefully, and asked, "might I speak to him, if he can hear me?"

The governor stepped aside, and beckoned the officer away. The change, though it was made without noise, drew back the film from the placid look at the white ceiling, and he looked most affectionately at me.

"Dear Pip'ch, I must tell you, now at last. You understand what I say?"

A gentle pressure on my hand.

"You had a child once whom you loved and lost."

A stronger pressure on my hand.

"She lives and loves yourn'al friends. She is living now. She is a lady and very beautiful. And I love her!"

With a last faint effort, which would have been powerless but for my yielding to it and assisting it, he raised my hand to his lips. Then he gently let it sink upon his breast again, with his own hands lying on it. The placid look at the white ceiling came back, and passed away, and his head drooped quietly on his breast.

Mindful, then, of what we had read together, I thought of the two men who went up into the Temple to pray, and knew that there were no better words that I could say beside his but than "O Lord, be merciful to him, a sinner!"

ALSTYNE WHITE.

GRANDMOTHER WHITE, in her easy chair,
Sat beside the cottage door,
Where the restless leaves of the maple-trees
Sifted sunbeams on the floor.

Sifted glinting gleams on the old door-stone,
Worn smooth by the tread of feet;
On the narrow walk, where, on either side,
Blossomed flowers opulent and sweet.

Where the four o'clock, with its dial closed,
Told the primrose when to bloom,
And the great red rose, from its bursting heart,
Flung its wealth of sweet perfume.

Sifted fitful rays on the silver threads
Of the grandame's whitened hair—
On her faded cheek, on her trembling hand—
But a flash met the sunbeam there.

For a shining sword, with its trappings gay,
She held with a firm right hand,
Counting, one by one, the days agone
Since it fell from the soldier's grasp—

Since her darling son laid him down to die,
On the battle-fields of Mexico;
And only this, by a comrade's care,
Came back from that scene of woe.

And ever since, when the roses bloom,
She brightens its blade once more,
And holds a mock parley with the steel,
Sitting thus by the cottage door.

From her listless dream she starts to hear
A voice mingled still with the past,
Saying, "Good-by, mother dear! good-by!"
Then a shadow is quickly cast.

And glancing up in her strange amaze,
Before her there seems to stand
Her son, as he looked when he took the field
For the right, and his native land.

"Grandmother White," said the soldier lad,
"I am going, with all my might,
To fight for the flag that he loved so well,
Ere its stars from its blue were rent.

"And, grandmother, now will you bless your boy,
And bid him to-day God-speed?
That I and my men, in the darkest hour,
May have one with Him to plead?"

"Bless thee, my child!" and the wrinkled hands
Were laid on the low-bowed head,
And a murmured prayer, in her trembling tones,
O'er the kneeling man she said.

"And now, Alstyne, take your father's blade,
My care o'er its shein is o'er;
I shall watch and wait, when the roses bloom,
Ever thus by the cottage door.

"But my watch shall be for the sword no more:
It will be for the reaper's tread,
With his shining sickle ready whet
For the ripe and whitened head.

"And waiting thus, if I chance to hear
Of a brave deed done by you,
I shall know the steel, I shall know the name,
Even that of Alstyne White."

THE NAVY-YARD, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

On pages 456 and 457 we give a large picture of THE BROOKLYN NAVY-YARD, from a sketch taken in June last, just before the departure of some of our finest vessels of war for the Southern coast. The scene was picturesque and magnificent—nearly equaled in our naval experience. Seldom if ever have so many fine ships and so many men been assembled in any port in America—on actual war intent. At the present time, of course, the scene is changed; the ships are mostly gone, and the Yard is comparatively quiet.

MAJOR KNIPE WINGING A SECESSIONIST.

OUR special war correspondent and artist of General Patterson's Division, Captain VIZETELLY, furnishes us this week with a sketch of an exciting incident which lately occurred at Williamsport, which we reproduce on page 454. Major KNIPE, of General Williams's staff, was one morning riding leisurely along the already historic Potomac banks, accompanied by our artist, also a staff officer of the brigade, when he discovered a rebel soldier, likewise riding, upon a hill-side on the opposite shore, and at the distance of a mile distant.

As our volunteers have of late been annoyed by stray shots from Virginia at this point, and since to receive either Minié or spherical ball into one's soup-plate or pea-soup, when the latter is to the act of finding its way mouth ward; is, to say the least, unpleasant—as well as one of the most unfortunable dispositions, the gallant Major Knipe deemed the gay cavalier of the Old Dominion fair game for his rifle practice, and drawing a bead on Western rifle. So springing from his saddle, he drew bead upon Mr. Secessionist. A report, a thin cloud of blue smoke curling upward, and in an instant, like a wounded bird, the doomed foe was seen to fall off his steed. His two companions-in-arms, dismounting rapidly, rushed to his assistance, and presently laid him carefully beneath the sheltering branches of a neighboring tree. Whether death followed the unexpected wounding of not is unknown.

The rapidity with which this little drama was enacted, and the extraordinary success of Major Knipe's aim at so distant an object, lend to the incident an interest by no means common.

THE PIRATES.

On page 459 we publish an engraving of M. Francois Biard's well-known painting—THE PIRATES. It will be timely just now. The picture represents a pirate ship in a tropical climate, waiting for its prey, which the crew are artfully luring into their clutches. All the side of the ship we behold some of them disguised; one with a bonnet and parasol, another as a female hanging on the shoulders of a well-dressed passenger, the respectable looking master with his speaking-trumpet under his arm—all earnestly hailing the American clipper, which, unsuspecting their real character, is nearing them. Every man of this vile crew is armed to the teeth; and all except the prominent actors are crouching in the deck for the sake of concealment until the word is given for the murderous attack. One fellow standing on a cask is playing over innocence to his credit; and a knowing-looking lad sits perched up with a book in his hand pretending to read—obviously to help in keeping up the delusion that it is "all right" and pleasant on board. A broken spirit-chest shows that strong drinks have been pretty freely resorted to to bring up the courage or excite the ferocity of the ship's company. All who view this picture, after admiring the general dramatic effect, and the skillful grouping, will be struck with the great variety thrown into the expression of the faces, in which, however, the type of villainy and brutal sensuality still prevail as the only living principle. The general effect of atmosphere and locale also are well rendered; M. Biard having, we believe, had much personal experience of sea-life.

Francois Biard is a pupil of Revoil, school of Lyons. He received the second-class medal (gemme) in 1828, the first-class medal in 1834, and was made CHEVALIER of the Legion of Honor in 1838.

THE ELEVENTH INDIANA ZOUAVES.

We devote page 452 to the Eleventh Indiana Zouaves Colonel Lewis Wallace, a regiment which is likely to make a name for itself in the present war. Some of our sketches are from photographs sent us from the West. Others from sketches by Mr. Gosling, to whom we have been frequently indebted for illustrations of the Eleventh Indiana boys. The camp of the Zouaves has been at Wills Gap, near Cumberland—a place somewhat noted, as it was on the mountain on which Wills Creek takes its rise that George Washington, then a provincial colonel, began the long while mustering his forces at Fort Cumberland to march under General Braddock to the memorable battle in which the latter was defeated. We "Camp Recreations" show that the Indiana boys, who are serious enough in fight, are as merry as ever when the grim work of war is over. The illustrations of the drill and manœuvres—from photographs—are quite striking.

SPEAKER GROW.

On page 461 we publish a portrait of SPEAKER GROW, of the House of Representatives, from a photograph by Brady.

Galusha A. Grow was born at Ashford, Windham County, Connecticut, on 31st August, 1823, and is consequently thirty-eight years of age. His father dying when he was three years old, young Grow, with his brothers and sisters, was left dependent on his mother for support. That lady took a farm, and opened a little store at Valentown, in Windham County, and managed so well that she not only educated her whole family but actually realized a little competency besides. When Galusha was twenty-one of age his mother turned over all her little property into money, and removed to Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, where her sons commenced life on their own account. It is recorded of Galusha that when he was twelve years old he would stay a week or ten days alone in the woods, looking after the cattle and trusting to himself for a supply of food, and that when he was fourteen he was quite well known as a dealer in lumber in the section in the hi'rels.

At seventeen, Galusha's brothers sent him to college; after graduating he studied law, and was admitted to the Bar in 1850. In the same year he was elected to Congress as a Democrat, being the youngest member of the Thirty-second Congress. He has retained the seat ever since: his third re election was unanimous, all parties being perfectly satisfied with his course in the House. On Mr. Banks's election to the chair in the course of the leaders, if not the leader of Congress, and was Republican candidate for Speaker when Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, was elected. He has now been selected to preside over the House; and from his first speech we judge that he will do it thoroughly.

MY HERO.

My here came to say farewell to me:
There was no school-boy burst
Of needless speech from him. He simply said,
"The country's call was first."
I looked from him—so full of life and fire—
Up to the grave, calm face of Washington
Upon the wall above us, and replied,
"Go, fight like him, until your cause be won!"
Oh! he'll be foremost in the ranks, I know,
And yet I could not ask him not to go!
For I would rather yield my life to-day
Than see the dear old Stars and Stripes give way!
My woman heart should teach me how to die.
Shall he—my hero—be less brave than I?

I think sometimes that when the trump of peace
Again our land shall fill,
And treason shall be crushed from out the soil,
He may be living still.
I sit and muse of him hour after hour,
Until I almost fancy I can see
His well-known form and hear his springing step.
Ah! how my heart longs then for victory!
How I would weep for joy! how proudly then
I'd bid him welcome to my arms again,
And whisper, while the orange flowers I'd twine,
"Thou hast obeyed thy country's call—hear mine!"

Yet many a woman nearer God than I,
With mingled pride and pain
Awaits in seeming calmness news of those
Who near us'er come again:
And when the tidings of some battle ring
Upon the startled air,
With me she'll ask, "Did our side win?" and then
If he were fighting there.
And many a loving one shall look with dread
Upon the list of Columbia's dead,
To see one name—the dearest and the best,
It may be—who in battle sunk to rest.
But, God knows, with no base, unworthy tear
We'll desecrate the patriot's honored bier,
Nor mourn for those who, when from earth they rise,
Shall well our banner nearer to the skies!

GENERAL PRENTISS.

On page 465 we publish a portrait of General Prentiss, Commanding the Illinois Volunteers at Cairo, Illinois. Of General Prentiss's previous career but little is known. He was a very distinguished officer in the Mexican war, having served in Colonel Hardin's regiment, and been present at the battles of General Taylor's campaign. At Buena Vista he was particularly conspicuous for gallantry. When Hardin fell Prentiss was with him, and received from the dying hero his sash, which he still wears. At the outbreak of the present war General Prentiss was one of the first men in Illinois to tender his services to the Government, and he was at once elected to the post of Brigadier-General. His dispositions at Cairo are said to evince equal judgment and vigor.

GEN. EDWARD WILLIAMS.

General Edward C. Williams, whose portrait we give on the preceding page, was born on the 10th of February, 1820, in the city of Philadelphia, where he resided until the year 1838. In the spring of that year, being then but a youth of 18 years, he removed to the city of Harrisburg, there to commence the journey of life. Upon his arrival he accepted a lucrative employment in the book-binding of the Messrs. Cantenen. Here he remained for some time. Quiet and industrious in manner, he became extremely useful to his employers.

But the quiet of life was not compatible with his disposition. In December, 1846, he left the city of Harrisburg, in command of the Governor's Guards, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, to join our army, then in Mexico. At the head of his company he took an active part in the investment of Vera Cruz, thence through the different battles which took place upon the lines of our veteran Commander-in-Chief. Being wounded at Chapultepec, in the hottest of the fight, he did not leave his command, but bravely led them to the taking of the castle upon the top of which, with his own hand, he hoisted the stars and stripes. Again, at the city of Mexico, his hand was the first to grasp the bulletin to which was attached the first American flag that floated over the Mexican capital. At the close of the war he returned to the city of Harrisburg, since which time he has filled different offices of trust with credit to himself and his constituents. At the breaking out of the war we find him among the first to offer his sword for the preservation of our Union.

General Williams was married in the year 1841 to Miss Hetzel, of Harrisburg. Three brothers of this lady served with distinction through the entire Mexican war. A nephew of General Williams, just graduated at the Military Academy at West Point, is now serving his country in the city of Washington, being a second lieutenant in the First Artillery. Another nephew is still at West Point. Since the election General Williams has been constantly engaged with his many duties.

DEPARTURE OF GENERAL LYON FROM BOONVILLE.

On page 465 we illustrate the Departure of General Lyon with his Column from Boonville, Missouri, for the Arkansas Border, near which he expects to capture the runaway Governor Jackson, Ben McCulloch, and the other secessionist leaders at that region. At Springfield he will join Colonel Siegel's corps and Colonel Brown's command. The correspondent of the Times thus describes the preparations for the departure:

The time, since the battle at this point, has been spent in preparations for a march to the southwestern portion of the State. For this purpose three thousand men will leave from here, and as thirty-seven days' rations are to be taken along, it can easily be imagined that the preparations are not few nor small. About one hundred and fifty wagons are necessary to transport the requisite number of each of which will be drawn by four mules. Then a large number of saddle horses is required to carry the officers and others, making in all a force of some five or six hundred draught and saddle animals necessary to the interior expedition. All these materials, together with forage, harness-ke, canteens and many other articles, have been procured at this point. General Lyon gave out word that he needed a certain number of horses and wagons. If they came in peaceably—good—if not, he would have to send for them. A committee, composed of three officers and two civilians, was appointed to appraise the value of the horses and wagons as they came in, and when purchased were paid for by draft on St. Louis. It was thought best not to hire the conveyances, but to buy them outright—a determination on the part of the Government that met with the entire approbation of owners irrespective of politics.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1861.

Early in August we shall commence the publication of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer's new Tale, entitled

A STRANGE STORY.

It will be handsomely illustrated, and will be continued from week to week till it is completed.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Two weeks before the meeting of Congress simple people and papers talked the quality of the loyalty of this nation to its government, in other words, to itself, by suggesting either that there ought to be "peace"—by which was meant the destruction of the Government—or that the loyal citizens of the country and the rebels ought to join forces and drive all other nations off the continent. This last proposition that the Government of the United States should give up the suppression of an internal rebellion in order to engage in foreign piracy was singularly ingenious.

All these suggestions ignominiously failed. They failed more ignominiously than any political dodges in our history. They were the feeble efforts of treason to discover if it had any hope in the city of New York. And the result was the making more evident the truth that the eager enthusiasm with which the movement was inaugurated by patriot hearts has settled into a sober, solid resolution that there shall be no parley with rebellion; that it shall voluntarily lay down its arms and its spirit of violence, or be compelled to do so by the military force of the nation.

That was the first sign.

Then Congress met, and the Message and reports were published. They were ell, without exception, papers of great and unusual ability. But they all assumed the resolution of suppressing rebellion as the only and natural course. The President, as was proper in a message to which foreign nations would turn with peculiar interest, in his diplomatic paragraphs exposed the fallacy of the doctrine upon which the traitors try to justify their treason. But he and the Secretaries quietly invited the necessary authority and money from the Congress to bring the rebellion to speedy destruction. The possibility of any issue but that of the forcible absolute re-establishment of the national authority all over the land was not even hinted at.

That was the second sign.

Congress came together, and not any partisan or factious opposition. The necessary war-bills were put upon their passage. Senator Sailsbury attempted to withstand one of them in the Senate. He was asserted by one Senator from Missouri, one from Maryland, and one from Kentucky. The rebels had five votes against thirty-three. In the House, Mr. Vallandigham attempted to bully and browbeat and discourage treason by savagely denouncing the Government which is guilty of the effort of maintaining itself. He had four votes besides his own, one of them being that of the Honorable Benjamin Wood, of New York. The vote against Messrs. Vallandigham and Wood was one hundred and forty-nine, including Mr. Crittenden's.

This is the third sign.

While these things were happening in Washington the Government asked New York for five millions of dollars, and got it in three hours.

These signs show that the people of this country are fully persuaded that as their Government is the best to live under, so it is the best to give life and fortune to maintain, if necessary. If any man wishes to know the differences between the action of a people when they are perfectly united in resolution and when they differ, let him compare the debates and conduct of this Congress, in which every thing moves with majestic harmony, and the discordant action of the Congress of 1812, which prepared for the last war.

☞ The portrait of General Scott, published in a recent number of Harper's Weekly, was from a photograph by Gurney, not Brady. It is considered the finest photograph of the old hero ever taken, and Messrs. Gurney & Son are fairly entitled to the credit of it.

THE LOUNGER.

DIFFERING DOCTORS.

The London Saturday Review has an article upon the letters of Mr. Motley to the London Times. It thinks that he is not equal to Thucydides. It thinks that he tells much more of what befell himself than of what he saw in the land he described. And it is persuaded that nobody who travels, under the present circumstances of this country, to give accurate information to another country, can possibly acquire that accurate information if he constantly announces his purpose and travels as an "illustrious stranger." The Saturday Review is of opinion that the English people would know as much of the real condition of the Southern States if this Union of Doctor Russell had staid at home.

The New York Tribune, on the other hand, is of opinion that the Doctor has "thus far discharged a difficult duty with great discrimination and honorable dignity, that it is a matter of regret that he should have fallen into any personal difference.

The truth evidently lies between these eminent Doctors. When the correspondent of the London Times and Herald says that there was a great deal of unnecessary guesonade about the embassy of the press, and of the people of England, etc., etc., the pure humbug of which Doctor Russell being an old hand upon the press, perfectly understood. The Doctor departed very soon for the South. In England, the reporter of a newspaper has a taste for the flavor of aristocracy. He found it also at the South; he enjoyed it, and he reported it. The tone of admiration and confidence in his first letters undoubtedly helped the rebellion in the public opinion of England. The worthy Doctor ventured upon a Confederate Coalition which you could buy in the streets for three cents. Is that the sort of thing to endorse? quoth the politic old philosopher. Three cents! Put one word, you know, that's a little too jolly, you know.

From this point of view the Doctor has contended the most unfortunate country; and this determines the value of his observations. Of course that value is not great. When the Doctor says that he saw a cannon in a fort, that the commander gave him ice in his Champagne; and that the wind blew a gale as he sailed, as he sailed, there is no doubt of the fact, but of the wind —not the least. But when he talks of causes and character and influences and opinion—is he sure, Doctor, that you think of that? Of course!

Whoever has read the previous performances of Doctor Russell knows very well that he is a picturesque narrator. He has the eye and the hand can describe. That is his peculiar excellence. He has given no proof of any thing further. As a reporter of the scope and character of a great rebellion in America his opinion can be of no possible importance. As a narrator of the events and scenery of that rebellion he is likely to be copious, lively and detailed.

The Saturday Review, true to itself, is too flippantly severe. The London Times is unqualified commendation of letters which have undoubtedly injured the Constitutional cause in this country by prejudging the case. It is too true to its extraordinary policy of embarrassing the Administration.

DU CHAILLU.

The story of Du Chaillu has all the old fascination of Mungo Park's and Captain Parry's. It is a story of wild adventure in new lands and among new dangers. Some of our known readers have been threatened by the gorilla. The style of the narration is simple and spirited, and the personality of the narrator is very often just pleasantly enough conspicuous to give an individual interest to the details.

Mr. Du Chaillu passed eight years in Africa, and half of that time was devoted to the journeys and explorations of which his book is the history. That time he passed in the midst of the native company of the natives, about eight thousand miles. He shot, stuffed, and brought home more than two thousand birds, of which some sixty are believed to be new species. He killed more than a thousand quadrupeds, stuffing and bringing home two hundred specimens, and the eighty skeletons.

Upon his arrival in this country, about eighteen months since, the Lounger called attention to these specimens, which were exhibited in Broadway, and excited only a limited interest. The reason of it was, of course, that to most of us new specimens of animals differ very little from old ones of the same general kind; and one museum of natural history is, therefore, very much like another.

In Boston, however, the skilled eyes of Agassiz and Jeffries Wyman certified at once the value of the collection as a contribution of novelties to the stores of zoological science. In England Professor Owen, perhaps the highest authority—certainly one of the highest authorities—in the world of science, called Du Chaillu famous by the warmth of his praise.

The book of the traveler will interest the public at large as much as his discoveries interested men of science. All the boys in the land will pore over it, as we who were boys once used to hang over Captain Riley's Narrative and Denham and Clapperton. And he is a happy author who writes a book that boys love to read, and which charms their parents.

ASKING A FRIEND TO BREAKFAST.

We are certainly not fortunate, at this juncture, in our letter-writers abroad—excepting always the clear, calm, masterly hand of the historian Motley. But the epistolary performances of the worthy Minister to Rome, and the late breakfast invitation of Mr. Tramway Train, must have produced the most ludicrous emotions in the mind of the cool British reader.

We Americans have always laughed with a good deal of impatience at the extravagance of phrase and costume with which the French and Italians adorn their praises of liberty and their republican persons. If they were not so intent upon the color of the ribbon or the form of the hat we are wont to say, they might secure a little more of the substance of liberty.

As we grow older, we grow more expansive and explosive in our style. "On mighty pens" we soar. At least Mr. Train does in his invitation to a Bunker Hill breakfast in London. He has the true flavor of the exalted French Republican literary style:

"Anniversary of the Battle of Bunker's Hill. Will you come to a Union Dejeuner, at 2 o'clock, on the 17th of June, at the Westminster Palace Hotel?—sixty pistes. Sincerely hoping that you and the other representative men in this garden land of free opinions who bear kind wishes for the continued unity of our people and independence of our nation, I have taken this method to bring together some of the bright minds of the age, in the hope of countenancing the exercise of those liberal journalistic and statesmen who cheer so loudly whenever the bursting of the republican bubble is spoken of. Let Lancashire and Yorkshire sympathize with the Pirates' Rebellion, and stimulate the latter in their certain destruction; but London, the first city of the world, is too proud and too independent to misrepresent the great English people by giving the cheer of right to the cry of cotton. Nothing will please me more than to have you say 'Yes' addressed to George Francis Train, 78 St. James's Street, Piccadilly. London, June, 1861."

It is a good rule always to speak and write in such a manner that people will believe you to be in earnest.

BLONDIN AND HUMANITY.

Our Niagara lion of last year, Blondin, has been exciting the utmost attention at England. The nation which banishes the prize fight was delighted with his feats. The Saturday Review might, consistently, to have waxed rhetorically rapturous over his fulfillment of the best destiny of man. Its due continuation of its last year's twaddle about Heenan and Sayers. But the House Office thought that to walk his child along the rope was carrying the thing a little too far; and a letter was written to the Directors of the Crystal Palace, suggesting that humanity required them to forbid the inhuman life. Being thus officially notified of the requirements of humanity, the directors interfered, and the child was not exposed.

According to the last accounts, Blondin was to wheel "Tom Sayers" along the rope. What Humanity requires in this case the Post Office has apparently not informed any body. Doubtless it considers that Blondin and Sayers have both reached years of discretion, that the young Blondin had not. Still it would seem to be a fair question at what time years of discretion commenced; and whether a man who would allow another to wheel him in a barrow on a tight-rope might not properly be treated as a child, and be protected by the requirements of humanity and the Home Office.

TOSSING UP A COPPER TO DECIDE.

The Tribune proposes that the question of free popular government and of progressive human liberty and civilization shall be decided by the chance of what is called "a fair fight." When the rebels "are beaten," it says, "they must give it up; while, if they beat us, we ought to do the same." The Tribune thinks that fifty thousand men upon each side would be the proper number for the "fair battle," and then if the rebels prove to be the strongest, they will, it says, "have fairly won it, and promptly arrest the wanton effusion of blood."

But since it is entirely impossible to have "a fair battle" between fifty thousand men upon a side, but comparatively easy to secure fairness between two or three, why not settle the question by a duel between Beauregard and one of our generals?

Or, better still, why fight at all? Why not have Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Davis toss up a copper to settle the point?

The Tribune would have considered the question of our Revolution settled by the battle of Bunker Hill, which we lost; and have inveighed against the wicked inaction of Valley Forge, the gloomiest and most glorious epoch of our history.

WHAT TO DO WITH PRISONERS OF WAR.

The question is constantly asked, What is to be done with citizens of the United States who are taken in armed rebellion against the Government?

The reply seems to be obvious enough, that the Constitution of the United States defines treason, and the laws distinctly state its penalty.

But when General McClellan, or any other General, captures six hundred or six thousand soldiers in arms, shall they be tried at a drum-head court-martial and summarily hung?

Is the right answer

It would be a solemn vindication of the power of the Government. It would be an earnest to the world that it meant to maintain itself; and to loyal citizens that it meant to restore its authority and protect their rights.

We all owe it to ourselves and to the rebels to show that we mean the supremacy of the Government and the punishment of all who lead the fight against it in the same way that, when the laws are broken by a riot, the Government proceeds against the ringleaders.

If this were a war with a foreign nation, when soldiers were taken prisoners they would be shipped home again and their officers retained upon parole, and exchanged as opportunity offered. But we can not ship our prisoners out of the country; and we certainly do not wish to perpetually fight with the same men. Therefore, to deal with their leaders as they shall be found to merit will disheaten and weaken the men.

RETALIATION.

IF the Government punishes traitors—if it hangs pirates, for instance, will not the rebels retaliate?

Very possibly; and what then? Which is best that every man who takes up a musket or ships upon a privateer to shoot and rob honest American citizens shall know that he does so at his extremest peril, or that it is a game in which if he be caught he will be let go again?

A Government that fears retaliation is not sure of itself. When Washington was personally entreated by André, not to spare his life, but to mitigate his sentence, the Commander-in-Chief was deeply pained by the sad necessity of refusal; but his duty to a people was stronger than his pity for a single man, and he executed the utmost penalty.

Did he do wrong? Did he not endanger the lives of American prisoners in the enemy's hands? Did he not court retaliation? At this day we all sigh over the tragedy of André—but do we blame Washington? Do we not know that to have done otherwise than he did would have been a betrayal of the cause confided to him? Do we not know, as he did, that sharp severity is often the tenderest mercy?

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

A FRIEND at the West writes to know why General Scott, who was a Major-General forty years ago, is supposed to be advanced in rank by the title Lieutenant-General?

A wiser friend in the East replies that the rank of Major-General is one of the regular grades of army promotion; but the Lieutenant-Generalcy is a rank of honor especially created by Act of Congress for General Scott.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

IRISH FERTILITY IN EXCUSE MAKING.

An Englishman, traveling in Ireland, remarked to the driver of a coach upon the tremendous length of the Irish miles.

"Confound your Irish miles! Why, there's no end to them!"

"Sure, Sir," said the coachman, "the roads are bad about here, and so we give good measure."

A PRETTY HOUR THING.—Man may be the Head of the Family; but, far better than that, Woman is the Heart of it.

A shoemaker was taken up for bigamy and brought before the sitting magistrate. "Which wife," asked a lynx-eyed justice, "will he be obliged to take?" Brown, always ready at a joke, replied, "He is a cobbler, and of course must stick to his last."

When Louis XIII. passed through the little town of Languedoc, the mayor and the council were very much embarrassed about his reception. They consulted a lawyer of the place, who was reckoned a very learned man. The fellow, proud of being sought after, offered his services to astonish them to the king, and performed his duty by saying, "Sire, as I am a butcher by trade, I bring you a few of my wares." The mayor and the council were struck dumb for awhile, and the ceremony ended to the general satisfaction of all.

A WONDERFUL MAN.

A Turkish letter, describing the new Indian Minister, declares inter alia—

"M. Rizzonli never feels fatigue. Four hours' sleep, a piece of bread and butter, and a glass of water, are sufficient to supply his daily waste. He has no rest, but he displays a greater haughtiness than Louis the Fourteenth. Hardly is he risen in bed. He is generous, but is feared. He has personal trouble at his approach, yet he has made them rich and comfortable. Never was a character more strongly marked."

This is quite exact so far as it goes, but it is incomplete. We are glad to be able to finish the description from an equally accurate source:

"For his appearance—M. Rizzoli is seven feet high, but has the delicate feet and hands of a child of four years old. His head is snow-white, but brown, with a coal-black tache, and beard of the jettiest black.

"For his manners—he is the high-sinewed, lymphatic brown-ness. He will sway over the pages of Manzoni, but will not shed a tear when his mother dies.

"For his habits—he tastes pomp and form, but never goes out without first running Satan, and insists upon being served upon the knee.

"With an annual income equivalent to £10,000 10s. 6d. in English money, his personal expenditure amounts to 1 penny 3 qrs. daily. He is fond of the society of old and quaintest, amiable and sulky, impetuous and cob-blooded, tall and short, young and old.—In one word, he is exactly the man whom clever correspondents delight to paint, but whom nobody ever knows."

It will be interesting to learn to know exactly the difference between a kiss and a trashing on the toe—as to the time each demonstration takes, and as to style, in making the lady aware of it. Science has lately decided that the human sensation travels one hundred and twenty feet per in a second, and that a touch on the cheek, therefore, is more communicative to the brain one-thirtieth of a second sooner than the pressure on the toe.

A man in Kentucky killed a cow a few days since, in whose stomach was found a large brass pin, a tack pin, and a quantity of brass and tin. It is inferred that the old cow swallowed the milk-maid.

"Is this your house and home?" asked a traveler of a farmer as he saw him handling up a post. "No," replied the farmer. "I'm only boarding here."

"How much can you pay us?—what can you offer in the point?" demanded the creditors of a bankrupt farmer. "Alas! gentlemen, all I really have is a donkey in the county," replied the unfortunate debtor.

"I'll let you know when I come again," as the rheumatism said to the leg.

"Well, Patrick," asked the doctor, "how do you feel to-day?" "Och, doctor, dear, I regret very pore health intirely. This rumatics is very distressin' indade; when I go to sleep I lay awake all night, and my face is swilled as large as a goose hen's eggs, so when I stand up I fall down immediately."

A man down East has invented yellow spectacles for making lard look like butter. They are a great saving of expense if worn while eating.

An emigrant to Fort Natal, writing home to one of his friends, says, "We are getting on finely here, and have already laid the foundation of a larger jail."

An empty bottle must certainly be a very dangerous thing, if we may judge from the fact that many a man has been found dead with one at his side.

"Very good, but rather too pointed," as the fish said when it swallowed the hook.

Why is a fo-fi in high station like a man in a balloon? Because every body upposes little to him, and he appears little to every body.

The following is a true copy of a letter received by a village schoolmaster: "Sur, as you are a man of nolidge, I take the liberty to write to you on your chrisli."

Water isn't a fashionable beverage for drinking your friend's health, but it is a capital one for drinking your self's.

The man who "challenged contradiction" got into an awful fight, and was severely beaten.

A man, whose son ran away for "parts unknown," addressed him in the public newspaper that he was "still in the blow-pipe, and having a turned-up nose." One evening, while the amateur father was at work, hoeing corn, a neighbor saw something like runaway son, a wag, who was standing by exclaimed,

"I'm positive your son will turn up soon, my man."

"Have you seen him, my friend?" asked the father, grasping the other by the hand.

"Yes; you'll see him turned up, don't you?"

"No, I haven't; but if his nose turned up, he'll turn up too; for nevertheless father follow his nose, you know."

The father groaned at this poking fun at misery.

FANCY SKETCH OF RIGHT REVEREND MAJOR-GENERAL BISHOP POLK READING HIS "DIVISION."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday 9th, in the Senate, a bill passed to refund and remit duties on firearms imported for the use of a State. The bill to increase the army was reported from the Military Committee with an amendment to increase the new regiments to the same number as the old ones. The death of Senator Douglas was announced, and eulogies upon the character of the deceased by Senators Trumbull, Wigfall, Chandler, Nesmith, Browning, and Anthony, the customary resolutions were adopted and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill appropriating $6,000,000 for the payment of militia and volunteers was passed. The Chairmanship of the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill for a national loan. The Committee on Commerce reported a bill to provide for the entry of recorded States to collect duties on shipboard, and to seize the vessels of those refusing to submit to pilots. It was ordered to be printed and recommitted. Mr. Lovejoy moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill to confiscate the property of the duty of the army to capture or return fugitive slaves; and it was negatived by a vote of 82 to 42.

On Wednesday, 10th, in the Senate, much time was occupied in debating a resolution approving of the acts of the Administration with reference to the suppression of the rebellion. The amendment, declaring that nothing shall authorize the permanent increase of the army or navy, was agreed to, and the further discussion of the subject was postponed. The Secretary of the Treasury to employ volunteers to aid in suppressing the insurrection in particular districts. The bill was passed, and on the question, was passed by a vote of 34 to 4.——In the House, the bill to increase the army and duties on arms imported by States since the 1st of May, or until January next, was passed by a vote of 124 to 2. The Senate bill, after an hour's debate, passed the bill authorizing a loan of $250,000,000, by a vote of 93 to 33. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow on the credit of the United States, for the public service and for the expenses of the act, a sum not exceeding two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and to cause certificates to be issue certificates of coupon, or registered 7 per cent. stock, or Treasury notes of any of the denominations. The bill also provides that whenever it shall, in the judgment of the President, be necessary to collect duties on goods at any port in opposition to the laws of the United States, license imposed by the existing laws, or any other duties which by law may be collected by the officers of the customs, the President is authorized to cause such duties to be collected at any port or district within the United States in which a blockade of the collection of such duties is going from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumter, and the Secretary of the Treasury and subject to all the obligations of collectors at ports of entry.

On Thursday 11th, in the Senate, various bills, all having reference to a vigorous prosecution of the war, were introduced and referred to the appropriate committees. The Loan Bill was referred to the Committee on Finance. Bills for the appointment of additional officers in the army, to regulate the marine force, to increase the navy in time of war, increasing the number of paymasters in the navy, and in relation to the Naval Academy, were introduced, and all referred to the Naval Committee. The House bill for the payment of volunteers was passed by unanimous consent by the appropriation five and three-quarters, instead of six millions, and the bill was passed. The joint resolution offered on Wednesday for the expulsion of the rebellious Senators was then taken up, and, after some discussion, adopted by a vote of 32 yeas to 10 nays. Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, in favor of his intention to introduce a resolution for an amendment of the Constitution, with a view to the adjustment of the present difficulties. The Senate took up the resolution approving of the acts of the President, with the single exception of remarks from Senators Polk of Missouri, and Powell of Kentucky, in opposition to it, when the Senate then held a short executive session, and adjourned.——In the House, bills were introduced for the organization of the militia; for the legislative, executive, judicial, and civil departments of the Government; for the collection of the revenue of the army, and for the employment of volunteers, which were referred to the Committee. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the Army Bill, for the appropriation of $500,000,000 for the service of the army, and one hundred thousand men to uphold the Government, a warm debate arose, in which several members participated, after which the bill was reported to the House and passed. The Naval appropriation bill was also passed, and the House concurred in the Senate's amendments to the bill for the payment of the volunteers.

On Friday, 12th, in the Senate, the Force bill, after considerable discussion, was passed, by 30 yeas to 6 nays. The previous question was put, terminating the employment of volunteers was reconsidered, some amendments made, and the bill was passed, by 30 yeas to 6 nays. It was introduced relative to the Sanitary Commission, and referred to the Military Committee. A resolution for a bill to be introduced authorizing the Federal Government to take possession of property used in the rebellion during the times the owners have been found in rebellion. Senator Bayard, of Delaware, offered a joint resolution proposition for an amendment to the Constitution, with a view to putting a stop to the war. It is in substance the Crittenden Compromise of the last Congress. On the presentation of credentials of Senator Baker of Missouri, appointed by the Governor of Kansas to fill a supposed vacancy from that State, objection to be started by the appointment of Senator James Lane to a command in the regular army, Senator Baker proposed to bring about the same by Senatorial functions before his military commission had been confirmed, and the matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee. Various bills received consideration, all looking to the strengthening of the active and effective army of Government.——In the House, the bill to authorize the President to accept the services of five hundred thousand volunteers for the prosecution of the war, and appropriating five hundred millions of dollars to pay for the same, when a spirited discussion took place, participated in by various members. The bill then passed the House. It has yet to pass the Senate. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, offered a preamble and resolution declaring vacant the seats of such members as have accepted commands in the militia of their several States, which occasioned a lively passage of words between various representatives, when the matter was tabled by 92 to 51. A resolution was adopted requesting the Attorney-General to lay before the House a copy of his opinion in relation to the objection of the writ of habeas corpus.

On Saturday, 13th, in the Senate, a bill was introduced providing for an Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, presented the credentials of Messrs. W. B. Wiley and J. S. Carlile, Senators elect from Virginia, in place of Senators Mason and Hunter respectively. Senator Bayard, of Delaware, moved to refer the credentials to the Judiciary Committee before administering the oath, which was agreed to by yeas 24 nays 23. The new Senators from Virginia were then sworn in amidst expressed opinions from the spectators. The $500,000,000 Loan Bill was taken up, and several unimportant amendments proposed by the Finance Committee, were adopted. Senator Saulsbury moved to make the sum $150,000,000, as that amount would be sufficient till the next session of Congress. The motion was rejected—yeas 4, nays 40—and the bill was then passed by a unanimous vote. The bill to increase the present military establishment was discussed, and reported to the Senate. The Senate, after an executive session, then adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Elliot offered a preamble and resolution that John B. Clark, a member of the House from Missouri, hold a commission in the rebel State Guard of Missouri, accompanied by a resolution declaring that said Clark has forfeited his rights as a representative, and that he be forthwith expelled. After some debate the resolution was adopted by a vote of 93 to 45. The bill to promote the efficiency of the army, by retiring disabled and infirm officers, was passed. The bill to make good the losses of private property incurred by soldiers in going from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumter was passed. The amendment involved in the bill. A message was received from the President, stating that he had signed the bill authorizing the payment of troops called into service up to 30th of June last.

On Monday, 15th, in the Senate, John W. Forney was elected Secretary; he received 36 of 39 votes cast. The Army Appropriation bill and the bill providing for an increase of the military establishment were passed. The previous approving of the acts of the President with reference to the suppression of the rebellion was, on motion of Senator Breckinridge, made the special order for 10th, when he said he would make a speech on the position of public affairs. The $250,000,000 Loan Bill was taken up, and several of the Finance Committee's amendments were adopted. A bill providing for the confiscation of the property of rebels was brought in. The Loan measure coming the Senate adjourned.——In the House a large amount of business was transacted. A resolution was offered by Secretary of the Navy to supply a sufficient force to suppress piracy forthwith; the resolution was adopted. Ben Wade, New York, offered a resolution providing for a National Convention, to devise measures for the restoration of peace to the country. It was laid on the table by a vote of 97 to 55. Bills for the organization of the militia were reported and referred. A select committee was appointed on the subject of the relief of bankrupt laws, to report to the next session of Congress. Mr. Vallandigham offered resolutions censuring Secretary Seward's action in reference to the war, which were promptly laid on the table. A bill to define and punish conspiracy was passed by a vote of 123 to 7. The Senate amendments to the appropriation bill making money due on account of the steamer Caledonia until the 30th December, on Contracts repaired thereon. A resolution directing the Committee on Elections to inquire whether Mr. Henry Winter Davis is a member of Maryland, has been holding criminal intercourse with the rebels, and to report what measures should be taken in the premises, was adopted. The Senate's amendments to the Volunteer bill were concurred in, and the House adjourned.

THE BATTLE OF RICH MOUNTAIN.

A brilliant battle, resulting in a complete success, signalized the more prominent movement of General McClellan in Western Virginia. It occurred on Thursday afternoon last (11th) instant, where a force of rebels, under the command of Colonel Porterfield, had been encamped for some days past. The official dispatch from General McClellan to the War Department states that Rich Mountain, states that he dispatched Brigadier-General Rosecrans, with a strong and able force, of corps of engineers, with four regiments of Ohio and Indiana troops, as an advance guard, to attack the enemy's camp at Rich Mountain, a distance of eight miles, over which routes they had to cut their way through the wood. After a march of nearly twelve hours, General Rosecrans came on the rear of the rebels, and, after a desperate fight of an hour and a half, completely routed them, driving them in the utmost confusion from their encampment, with their tents, wagons, and camp equipage, as on General McClellan says, "all their baggage." The rebels were in great force, and the officers among them. Sixty of the rebels were killed, and a large number wounded. Of the Union troops, nine were killed and forty wounded. General McClellan had his eye personally upon the movements of his troops, and found that the gallantry of Rosecrans spared him the trouble of going into action.

SURRENDER OF PEGRAM.

A dispatch was received at Washington from General McClellan a few hours after the receipt of the news of the victory at Rich Mountain announcing the surrender of Colonel Pegram to surrender his whole force, who are represented as being quite numerous. They have since been again against the Federal Government. The following is Pegram's letter of surrender:

"HEAD-QUARTERS, BEVERLY, VA., July 13, 1861.

"Colonel E. D. Townsend, Washington, D. C.:

"I have received from Colonel Pegram propositions for his surrender, and that of his command, which I have determined, my 600 men. They are said to be extremely penitent, and desirous to return again to serve under the General Government. I shall have near 900 or 1000 prisoners for the present, and more probably soon. The latest accounts make the loss of the rebels in killed some 150.

"Major-General Department of Ohio.

ROUT OF GARNETT'S CORPS D'ARMEE.

The rebel General Garnett, General Lee's Consul, a native of Virginia, and formerly a Major in the United States Army, while retreating from Laurel Hill to Georges, were overtaken on Sunday by General Morris, with the Fifteenth Ohio and the Seventh and Sixth Indiana regiments. When within eight miles of St. George, at a place called Carrick's Ford, the rebels made a stand. At this fight our troops were completely routed and scattered by the troops of General Morris. While General Garnett was endeavoring to rally his men he was shot through the spine with a rifle ball, and fell dead on the field. It is believed that the rebels are said to have been killed in the recent actions in this quarter, a large number wounded, and many taken prisoners, which the Federals can take care of. The flight of the rebels is represented as a most disorderly one.

THE PRIVATEER "JEFF DAVIS."

This city was startled last week by the news that a rebel privateer was off the bar, and had overhauled our merchant ships in the vicinity of Cape Hatteras. The audacious vessel was reported to be off the Cape Fear, and is heavily armed, and commanded by an ex-officer of the United States Navy. She has captured eight fine vessels—one ship, two brigs, and two schooners—and has destroyed their cargoes, principally naval stores. Captain Howard, of the United States Navy, despatched the steamers Keystone State and Quaker City in search of the privateer, and two other cutters started from Boston on the same errand. The result of their search has left in pursuit.

THE PRIVATEER "SUMTER."

Information reached us last week of the seizure of eight more vessels, bound for American ports, by the privateer Sumter, off the Spanish coast. Of these, seven of which were run into the port of Cienfuegos, and one barned off the Isle of Pines. The vessels thus destroyed were the Joseph Maxwell, one of Minturn's Mexican steamers, which left New York for the United States expressly for the use of the blockade; the Machias, and two other cutters started from Boston on the same errand. The result of their search has left in pursuit.

A NEW GOVERNOR TO BE CHOSEN IN MISSOURI.

The political and financial condition of Missouri is to be considered by the Call of a Convention to be held at Jefferson City on the 22d of 9th month, for the purpose of nominating a Governor, Lieutenant Governor and other State officers, in place of Governor Jackson, who is a traitor, and the others who are not willing to act under the laws and Constitution of the United States. It is thought that the Call for the appointment of Delegates will be appointed by this Convention, to act in the present crisis.

PERSONAL.

Major-General Polk, and Right Reverend Bishop of Louisiana, who has superseded General Pillow, is to have command of all the rebel land and water defence of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Red River so far up as it was thrown off by the great rain here to-day. What is to be done with Pillow does not yet appear.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

RECOGNITION OF THE NEW KING OF ITALY.

NAPOLEON'S note of recognition to Victor Emmanuel as King of Italy had been published. He does not fix a day for the withdrawal of the French Cabinet of Turin, will not recognize acts of aggression which threaten the peace of Europe, and will retain his troops in Rome "so long as the interests which look them to Rome are not guaranteed."

ARREST OF A PRIEST IN THE PATTERSON CAMP.

The Imperial Court of Paris delivered judgment on the 1st of July in the Pétition-Dumoncel case. The Court, after hearing the arguments of the Procureur-General, declared that the suit instituted by Madame Patterson and her son Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte was not maintainable, and condemned them to pay the costs.

AN INFERNAL MACHINE.

WE publish on this page an engraving of the INFERNAL MACHINE lately discovered by the Pawnee. The correspondent who kindly sent us the sketch writes us as follows about it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10, 1861.

The Pawnee, by the activity with which she has carried on the blockade of Virginia, and by the great number which she has, on more than one occasion, thrown her nine-inch shell among the rebels, has given the steamers a strong desire to cause her destruction. Feeling unable to subdue her by the rules of regular warfare, they resort to the Chinese expedient of fire-dogs and infernal machines. The accompanying drawing is a correct representation of one of those instruments of destruction placed up in the Potomac, a few hundred yards from the Pawnee, on the evening of Sunday, 7th inst.

In the casks used for floating the iron cylinders were placed platforms on which were coiled the fire-matches for communicating fire to the fuses. The fuses connect with the cylinders which are filled with powder. Had this machine drifted, as was intended, athwart the bows of the Pawnee, and there exploded, its destructive effects would indeed have been great. JEROME.

THE BATTLE AT HOKE'S RUN.

OUR artist with General Williams's brigade has sent us a sketch, from which we publish, on page 475, an engraving of the WISCONSIN REGIMENT DEPLOYING AS SKIRMISHERS AT THE BATTLE OF HOKE'S RUN, on the march of Patterson's Division from Williamsport to Martinsburg. A correspondent of the Herald thus describes the affair:

As soon as the advance reached the brow of the hill, opposite Williamsport, the Wisconsin regiment deployed to skirmishers two or three companies, the Philadelphia Independent Rangers still leading. These were supported by the Eleventh Pennsylvania. In this order of march the advance continued slowly along the direct road to Martinsburg. They passed Falling Waters without more than casually seeing a rebel trooper as a most respectable distance. They had almost begun to despair of finding a foe. About two miles from Falling Waters they almost stumbled upon his camp, concealed in a farm-house or barn, behind a stone fence, in a grain field. With this advantage of concealment and position the latter opened. Our troops saw and green, never having been under fire before, did not hesitate a moment. They at once returned the fire and the skirmish grew brisk.

The first skirmish must have lasted a full half hour between the infantry and riflemen of both sides. Neither party showed any disposition to give way. In the mean time M'Mullin's Rangers, the whole Wisconsin, and the left wing of the Eleventh Pennsylvania, became involved. The right wing of the Eleventh was moved forward rapidly to outflank the rebels.

While these movements were rapidly progressing, a section of Captain Perkins's flying battery was pushed forward and opened upon the enemy, who by this time had brought into action two full regiments and the right wing of a third. The round shot told beautifully upon them, but when the shell began to burst among them, their Virginia "chivalry" departed. They seemed to have forgotten that "the illustrious blood of the cavaliers flowed in their veins." They didn't stand shot as well as their forefathers did at—Manton Moor and Naseby—and they ran with higher speed.

They brought forward a cannon and attempted to reply to Perkins's two guns, but the order was given to our troops and about to be executed, to charge bayonets in double-quick time to carry the piece, when the piece was withdrawn. I do not think it fired but a few shots in reply. The skirmish was continued over a space of two miles, when the enemy retreated with singular facility.

CAMP-LIFE WITH GENERAL WILLIAMS'S BRIGADE.

OUR special artist with General Williams's brigade has sent us the sketches which we reproduce on page 474, and which will enable our readers to understand the published descriptions of the movements of that gallant corps. The pictures need no elaborate description. We may observe, however, that the members of the COUNCIL OF WAR which is illustrated were Generals Williams, Cadwallader, Keim, Nagle, Wynkoop, and Colonels Thomas and Longnecker. It was at this council that the plan of the movement was determined. M'MULLIN'S RANGERS crossed the river at 2.30 A.M., and attacked the enemy's picket, which gave way at once. The head-quarters of General Cadwallader were a RATHER PICTURESQUE LOG-HOUSE.

WILSON'S ZOUAVES AT FORT PICKENS.

WE publish on page 469, from a sketch by an officer of the garrison, a picture of the DITCH AND RAMPART AT FORT PICKENS, with some of WILSON'S ZOUAVES strolling about. A letter from the Fort, of recent date, thus describes the state of affairs there:

There are now in Fort Pickens some 1500 regular United States troops, which, together with our regiment, will make about 5400. These will be increased by the arrival from New York of additional volunteers, swelling our army to between 6000 and 6500 men. Our regiment will not take quarters in the fort but will camp outside, and engage themselves in the erection of batteries, which, when completed, will pay especial attention to the Pensacola Navy-yard. When the troops I have just alluded to have arrived, and sufficient execution been done by the batteries to the Navy-yard, the fleet will open on it in one direction while the troops will attack it in another by escalade, and attempt to carry it at the point of the bayonet. General Bragg is now in Pensacola at the head of 7000 or 8000 men. Fortunately the walls of the Navy-yard are of no great height or thickness, and those who understand these matters give it as their opinion that there will be but two or three volleys, a general rush, a close hand to hand combat, in which the bayonet, sabre, and butt-end of the musket will be the most conspicuous weapons, and in a short time the affair will be settled. Should it come to this it will be both desperate and bloody. We have been selected to lead the van. The remainder of the volunteers will follow next, and then the regulars. The boys seem to enjoy it mightily. That this regiment possesses the raw material for fighting there can exist no question, but they will be more effective after they shall have had more discipline.

THE LOUISIANA ZOUAVE PRISONERS.

WE publish on this page a group of the LOUISIANA ZOUAVE PRISONERS, now in the hands of our troops at FORTRESS MONROE. Two of them, who claimed to be deserters, gave the following account of themselves to the correspondent of the Herald:

The elder of the two, FRANZ MINALO, is thirty years of age, and was born in BAVARIA. He arrived in this country about a year since, landing at New Orleans, where he has since lived, working his way as a shoemaker. He was taken off by force on the evening of the 16th of last April, while returning home, having visited some friends. His brother, on hearing of his impressment, offered $200 for his release, but to no purpose, and he left the city of New Orleans on the 18th, forced into the army of the rebels. The other, JOHN ALTOFF, is twenty-four years of age, and was born in the province of SAXONY; has lived in this country but two years, and speaks a little English. He landed in New Orleans, and thence went to Quincy, Illinois, where he gained his livelihood as a journeyman printer in the office of the Illinois Courier. A short time before the Presidential election he went to St. Louis, and was employed on the St. Louis Democrat. In December he started for New Orleans, and until his impressment, on the 18th of April, he worked on the Louisiana Deutches Zeitung. They are both intelligent men.

The First Louisiana Zouaves (of which they were members) number four hundred men. They have a coarse Zouave uniform, and carry the old style of musket. In lieu of food, which they had not tasted for twenty-four hours, they were supplied with twenty rounds of hard cartridges.

After these two men left New Orleans on the 18th of April last, they went by boat to Hall's Landing (eleven miles from Mobile), and thence started for Pensacola on foot, a distance of sixty miles, which they accomplished in three days. Their regiment is composed of more than one-half Germans and poor Frenchmen. From thence they went to Montgomery, where they staid but two days, when they proceeded to a place called West Point, then to Atlanta, and finally reached Augusta, in Georgia. While in Augusta a poor soldier was villainously sacrificed by a wretch named M'Neil, who held the position of second lieutenant. The company had* halted, when he started a few rods to buy some tobacco, and, without any warning, was shot dead on the spot. No excuse was given for the wanton cruelty. They then proceeded on their way to Richmond. Soon after leaving Augusta they lost one man, who was accidentally shot in the right foot. He died from the want of proper surgical attendance. They arrived in Richmond about the 3d of June, and remained there at Camp Benjamin, near Howard's Grove, until the 10th inst., when they left in a steamboat, and were landed about eleven miles from Yorktown, which they reached by a forced march the same evening.

They were at first mistaken by Colonel Hawkins's Zouaves, they thinking they belonged to their own corps. The uniform is that of the French Zouaves—very full pants, tied about the ankle, and made of very coarse and heavy material.

THE FOURTH AT FORTRESS MONROE.

WE devote page 470 to illustrations of the GLORIOUS FOURTH AT FORTRESS MONROE, from sketches by our special artist with General Butler's command. A correspondent of the Times describes the celebration as follows:

Virginia never before saw such a celebration of the nation's natal day as that which was the "Fourth Par Excellence" held yesterday. On the Fourth, the Fifth Regiment was ordered by a picked-upon detachment to take quarters in the camp, while their comrades within were making merry. Their own celebration was, therefore, deferred to the fifth. In the afternoon the New York Brigade, which is again under the command of Acting Brigadier-General Duryee, General Pierce having been assigned to the command of the Massachusetts troops, was reviewed by General Butler and staff. It was nightfall when the regiment arrived at its quarters, and immediately after the men were dismissed the illumination of the company streets began. In each of these there was a row of transparent trees, brought from an adjacent thicket. Among the branches candles were placed, and the outer parts of the camp huge fires were kindled, around which the "Red Eagles" danced and sang like so many imps of Hades. Meantime, in front of the color-line all manner of fireworks were blazing and whirling, and exploding and bursting, and in the red, white, and blue light the Zouaves, in picturesque costumes and postures, were studies for a painter. It was a scene to remember, and tell one's grandchildren of when we take them on our knees, next century, and fight the battles of the present over again. Tattoo was postponed for one hour that the men might more fully enjoy it.

A correspondent of the Herald writes:

A grand concert had been projected by the Twentieth Regiment for the evening; but unexpected orders to parade in the fortress before General Butler, in the morning, disconcerted the general plan, and it was thought by the Colonel that no entertainment would be offered in the evening. But Captain Myers, of Company A, was not satisfied with this, and they determined to take hold of it alone. They gathered a large quantity of evergreens, and planted them on Driswney, the main street in camp, so thickly that it resembled in the dark of evening a small forest. In the absence of candles or other lights they placed oyster and clam shells in all parts of the trees, and with oil and wick they speedily improvised brilliant lights, that shed a flood of light upon the ground. At eight o'clock the bugle gave the signal for the commencement of the concert, and speedily the benches about the musicians' stand were occupied by the officers and wives and invited guests, while the soldiers standing ranged themselves in front. The scene was most beautiful and picturesque. Hundreds of ring lights glanced among the dark branches of the evergreens, and partially lit up the forms of the soldiers in their fine uniforms as they were gracefully grouped about. The best of decorum was preserved at all times. The German Band, Herr Steiger leader, formed the assemblage with fine selections from operas and the German composers, most excellently and carefully executed. At intervals a glee club, made up of members from the singing bands of New York, sang some choice glees, under the leadership of Lieutenant Hemmeter, of Company F, and Sergeant Priels played several pieces in excellent style upon an accordeon. A large quantity of lager bier was rationally discussed by the company, and at ten o'clock the concert was closed by the sound of the drummer's tattoo. The affair was a grand success, and every one expressed his delight with the music. An equally pleasant concert was given the previous night by Captain Brooks's Company B, the only company from Newark, and the affair passed off most agreeably. The Germans certainly know how to enjoy themselves under all circumstances, and their mode of enjoyment gives pleasure and a relief from the monotony of camp life to others who do not know how to discover the bright side of the picture. The health of Colonel Weber's regiment is most excellent.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

CHAPTER LVI.

Now that I was left wholly to myself, I gave notice of my intention to quit the chambers in the Temple as soon as my tenancy could legally determine, and in the mean while to underlet them. At once I put bills up in the windows; for I was in debt, and had scarcely any money, and began to be seriously alarmed by the state of my affairs. I ought rather to write that I should have been alarmed if I had had energy and concentration enough to help me to the clear perception of any truth beyond the fact that I was falling very ill. The late stress upon me had enabled me to put off illness, but not to put it away; I knew that it was coming on me now, and I knew very little else, and was even careless as to that.

For a day or two I lay on the sofa or on the floor—any where according as I happened to sink down—with a heavy head and aching limbs, and no purpose and no power. Then there came one night which appeared of great duration, and which teemed with anxiety and horror; and when in the morning I tried to sit up in my bed and think of it I found I could not do so.

Whether I really had been down in the Court in the dead of the night, groping about for the boat that I supposed to be there; whether I had two or three times come to myself on the staircase with great terror, not knowing how I had got out of bed; whether I had found myself lighting the lamp, possessed by the idea that he was coming up the stairs, and that the lights were blown out; whether I had been inexpressibly harassed by the distracted talking, laughing, and groaning of some one, and had half suspected those sounds to be of my own making; whether there had been a closed iron furnace in a dark corner of the room, and a voice had called out over and over again that Miss Havisham was consuming within it; these were things that I tried to settle with myself and get into some order, as I lay that morning on my bed. But the vapor of a lime-kiln would come between me and them, disordering them all, and it was through the vapor at last that I saw two men looking at me.

"What do you want?" I asked, starting; "I don't know you."

"Well, Sir," returned one of them, bending down and touching me on the shoulder, "this is a matter that you'll soon arrange, I dare say, but you're arrested."

"What is the debt?"

"Hundred and twenty-three pound, fifteen, six, Jeweler's account, I think."

"What is to be done?"

"You had better come to my house," said the man. "I keep a very nice house."

I made some attempt to get up and dress myself. When I next attended to them they were standing a little off from the bed, looking at me. I still lay there.

"You see my state," said I. "I would come with you if I could; but indeed I am quite unable. If you take me from here I think I shall die by the way."

Perhaps they replied, or argued the point, or tried to encourage me to believe that I was better than I thought. Forasmuch as they hang in my memory by only this one slender thread, I don't know what they did, except that they forbore to remove me.

That I had a fever and was avoided; that I suffered greatly; that I often lost my reason; that the time seemed interminable; that I confounded impossible existences with my own identity; that I was a brick in the house-wall, and yet entreating to be released from the giddy place where the builders had set me; that I was a steel beam of a vast engine, clashing and whirling over a gulf, and yet that I implored in my own person to have the engine stopped, and my part in it hammered off; that I passed through these phases of disease I know of my own remembrance, and did in some sort know at the time. That I sometimes struggled with real people, in the belief that they were murderers, and that I would all at once comprehend that they meant to do me good, and would then sink exhausted in their arms, and suffer them to lay me down. I also knew at the time. But, above all, I knew that there was a constant tendency in all these people—who, when I was very ill, would present all kinds of extraordinary transformations of the human face, and would be much dilated in size—above all, I say, I knew that there was an extraordinary tendency in all these people, sooner or later, to settle down into the likeness of Joe.

After I had turned the worst point of my illness, I began to notice that while all its other features changed this one consistent feature did not change. Whoever came about me still settled down into Joe. I opened my eyes in the night, and I saw in the great chair at the bedside Joe. I opened my eyes in the day, and, sitting on the window-seat, smoking his pipe in the shaded open window, still I saw Joe. I asked for cooling drink, and the dear hand that gave it me was Joe's. I sank back on my pillow after drinking, and the face that looked so hopefully and tenderly upon me was the face of Joe.

At last, one day, I took courage, and said, "Am I not Joe?"

And the dear old home-voice answered, "Which it is, old chap."

"O Joe, you break my heart! Look angry at me, Joe. Strike me, Joe. Tell me of my ingratitude. Don't be so good to me!"

For Joe had actually laid his head down on the pillow at my side and put his arm round my neck in his joy that I knew him.

"Which dear old Pip, old chap," said Joe, "you and me was ever friends. And when you've well enough to go out for a ride—what larks!"

After which Joe withdrew to the window, and stood with his back toward me wiping his eyes. And as my convalescence progressed me from getting up and going to him, I lay there, penitently whispering, "O God bless him! O God bless this gentle Christian man!"

Joe's eyes were red when I next found him beside me; but I was holding his hand, and we both felt happy.

"How long, dear Joe?"

"Which you meantersay, Pip, how long have your illness lasted, dear old chap?"

"Yes, Joe."

"It's the end of May, Pip. To-morrow is the first of June."

"And have you been here all the time, dear Joe?"

"Pretty nigh, old chap. For, as I says to Biddy when the news of your being ill were brought by letter, which it were brought by the post, and being formerly single he is now married though underpaid for a deal of walking and shoe-leather, but wealth were not a object on his part, and marriage were the great wish of his hart—"

"It is so delightful to hear you, Joe! But I interrupt you to what you said to Biddy."

"Which it were," said Joe, "that how you might be among strangers, and that how you and me having been ever friends, a visit at such a moment might prove unacceptabobble. And Biddy, her word were, 'Go to him without loss of time.' That," said Joe, summing up with his judicial air, "were the word of Biddy. 'Go to him,' Biddy say, 'without loss of time.' In short, I shouldn't greatly deceive you," Joe added, after a little grave reflection, "if I represented to you that the word of that young woman were, 'without a minute's loss of time.'"

There Joe cut himself short, and informed me that I was to be talked to in great moderation, and that I was to take a little nourishment at stated frequent times, whether I felt inclined for it or not, and that I was to consider myself to all his orders. So I kissed his hand and lay quiet, while he proceeded to indite a note to Biddy, with my love in it.

Evidently Biddy had taught Joe to write. As I lay in bed looking at him, it made me, in my weak state, cry again with pleasure to see the pride with which he set about his letter. My bolstead, divested of its curtains, had been removed, with me upon it, into the sitting-room, as the airiest and largest, and the carpet had been taken away, and the room kept always fresh and wholesome night and day. At my own writing-table, pushed into a corner and cumbered with little bottles, Joe now sat down to his great work, first choosing a pen from the pen-tray as if it were a chest of large tools, and tucking up his sleeves as if he were going to wield a crow-bar or sledge-hammer. It was necessary for Joe to hold on heavily to the table with his left elbow, and to get his right leg well out behind him, before he could begin, and when he did begin he made every down-stroke so slowly that it might have been six feet long, while at every up-stroke I could hear his pen spluttering extensively. He had a curious idea that the inkstand was on the side of him where it was not, and constantly dipped his pen into space, and seemed quite satisfied with the result. Occasionally he was tripped up by some orthographical stumbling-block, but on the whole he got on very well indeed, and when he had signed his name, and had removed a finishing blot from the paper to the crown of his head with his two forefingers, he got up and hovered about the table, trying the effect of his performance from various points of view, as it lay there, with unbounded satisfaction.

Not to make Joe uneasy by talking too much, even if I had been able to talk much, I deferred asking him about Miss Havisham until next day. He shook his head when I then asked him if she had recovered.

"Is she dead, Joe?"

"Why, you see, old chap," said Joe, in a tone of remonstrance, and by way of getting at it by degrees, "I wouldn't go so far as to say that, for that's a deal to say; but she ain't—"

"Living, Joe?"

"That's nigher where it is," said Joe; "she ain't living."

"Did she linger long, Joe?"

"After you was took ill, pretty much about what you might call (if you was put to it) a week," said Joe, still determined, on my account, to come at every thing by degrees.

"Dear Joe, have you heard what becomes of her property?"

"Well, old chap," said Joe, "it do appear that she had settled the most of it, which I meantersay that it up, on Miss Estella. But she had wrote out a little coddlehell in her own hand a day or two afore the accident, leaving a cool four thousand to Mr. Matthew Pocket. And why, do you suppose, above all things, Pip, she left that cool four thousand unto him? Because of Pip's account unto the said Matthew. I am told by Biddy that air the writing," said Joe, repeating the legal term as if it did him infinite good, "on account of him the said Matthew.' And a cool four thousand, Pip!"

I never discovered from whom Joe derived the conventional temperature of the four thousand pounds; but it appeared to make the sum of money more to him, and he had a manifest relish in insisting on its being cool.

This account gave me great joy, as it perfected the only good thing I had done since I left the forge. I asked Joe whether he had heard if any of the other relations had any legacies?

"Miss Sarah," said Joe, "she have twenty-five pound peramnium fur to buy pills, on account of being bilious. Miss Georgiana, she have twenty pound down. Mrs.—what's the name of them wild beasts with humps, old chap?"

"Camels?" said I, wondering why he could possibly want to know.

Joe nodded. "Mrs. Camels," by which I presently understood he meant Camilla, "she have five pound fur to buy rush-lights to put her in spirits when she wake up in the night."

The accuracy of these recitals was sufficiently obvious to me to give me great confidence in Joe's information. "And now," said Joe, "you ain't that strong yet, old chap, that you can take in more nor one additional shovelful to-day. Old Orlick he's been a 'astin' open a dwelling-ouse."

"Whose?" said I.

"Well! Not but what his manners is given to blusterous," said Joe, apologetically: "still a Englishman's ouse is his Castle, and castles must not be husted 'cept when done in war time. And wotsumever the failings on his part, he were a corn and seedsman in his hart."

"Is it Pumblechook's house that has been broken into, then?"

"That's it, Pip," said Joe; "and they took his till, and they took his wine-box, and they drinked his wine, and they partook of his cold meat, and they slapped his face, and they pulled his nose, and they tied him up to his bedpust, and they giv' him a dozen, and they stuffed his mouth full of flowering annuals to prevent his crying out. But he knowed Orlick, and Orlick's in the county jail."

By these approaches we arrived at unrestricted conversation. I was slow to gain strength, but I did slowly and surely become able to walk, and Joe staid with me, and I fancied I was little Pip again.

For the tenderness of Joe was so beautifully proportioned to my need, that I was like a child in his hands. He would sit and talk to me in the old confidence, and with the old simplicity, and in the old unassertive protecting way, so that I would half believe that all my life since the days of the old kitchen was a sick dream, and troubles of the fever that was gone. He did every thing for me except the household work, for which he had engaged a very decided woman, after paying off the laundress on his first arrival.

"Which I so assure you, Pip," he would often say, in explanation of that liberty, "if found her a tapping the spare bed, like a cask of beer, and drawing off the feathers in a bucket for sale. Which she would have tapped next and drawed it off with you a laying on it, and was then a carrying away the coals gradually in the soup-tureen and wegetable-dishes, and the wine and spirits in your Wellington boots."

We looked forward to the day when I should go out for a ride, as we had once looked forward to the day of my apprenticeship. And when the day came, and an open carriage was got into the Lane, she trimmed me up, took me in his arms, carried me down to it, and put me in, as if I were still the small helpless creature to whom he had so abundantly given of the wealth of his great nature.

And Joe got in beside me, and we drove away together into the country, where the rich summer growth was already on the trees and on the grass, and sweet summer scents filled all the air. The day happened to be Sunday, and when I looked on the loveliness around me, and thought how it had grown and changed, and how the little wild flowers had been forming, and the voices of the birds had been strengthening, by day and by night, under the sun and under the stars, while poor I lay burning and tossing on my bed, the mere remembrance of having burned and tossed there came like a check upon my peace. But when I heard the Sunday bells, and looked around a little more upon the outspread beauty, I felt that I was not nearly thankful enough—that I was too weak yet to be even that—and I laid my head on Joe's shoulder, as I had laid it long ago when he had taken me to the Fair or where not, and it was too much for my young nerves.

More composure came to me after a while, and we talked as we used to talk, lying on the grass at the Old Battery. There was no change whatever in Joe. Exactly what he had been in my eyes then he was in my eyes still; just as simply faithful, and as simply right.

When we got back again and he lifted me out and carried me—so easily—across the court and up the stairs, I thought of that eventful Christmas Day when he had carried me over the marshes. We had not yet made any allusion to my change of fortune, nor did I know how much of my late history he was acquainted with. I was so doubtful of myself now, and put so much trust in Joe, that I could not satisfy myself whether I ought to refer to it when he did not.

"Have you heard, Joe," I asked him that evening, upon further consideration, as he smoked his pipe at the window, "who my patron was?"

"I heard," returned Joe, "as it were not Miss Havisham, old chap."

"Did you hear who it was, Joe?"

"Which I heard as it were a person what sent the person what giv' you the bank-notes at the Jolly Bargemen, Pip."

"So it was."

"Astonishing!" said Joe, in the placidest way.

"Did you hear that he was dead, Joe?" I presently asked, with incre sing diffidence.

"Which? Him as sent t e bank-notes, Pip?"

"Yes."

"I think," said Joe, after meditating a long time, and looking rather evasively at the window-seat, "as I did hear tell that how he was something or another in a general way in that direction."

"Did you hear my thing of his circumstances, Joe?"

"Not partickler, Pip."

"If you was to like to hear, Joe—" I was beginning, when Joe got up and came to my sofa.

"Lookee here, old chap," said Joe, bending over me. "Ever the best of friends; ain't us, Pip?"

I was ashamed to answer him.

"Why's prentice hand," said Joe, as if I had answered; "that's all right; that's agreed upon. Then why go into subjects, old chap, which as betwixt two such can be forever onnecessary? There's subjects enough as betwixt two such, without onnecessary ones. Lord! To think of your poor sister and her Rampages! And don't you remember Tickler?"

"I do indeed, Joe."

"Lookee here, old chap," said Joe. "I done what I could to keep you and Tickler in sunders, but my power were not always fully equal to my inclinations, but I did endeavor to persuade her mind to drop into you, it were not so much," said Joe, in his favorite argumentative way, "that she dropped into me, for I put myself in opposition to her, but that she dropped into you always heavier for it. I noticed that. It ain't a grain of use a man's asmoking, nor yet a shaker or two of a man (to which your sister was quite welcome) that 'ud put a man off from getting a little child's undoubted punishment. But when that little child is dropped into heavier for that grog of whisker or shaking, then that man naturally up and says to himself, 'Where is the good as you are a doing? I grant you I see the arm,' says the man, 'but I don't see the good. I call upon you, sir, therefore, to point out the good.'"

"The man says," I observed, as Joe waited for me to speak.

"The man says," Joe assented. "Is he right, that man?"

"Dear Joe, he is always right."

"Well," said old Joe, "then abide by your words. If he's always right (which in general he's more likely so ong), he's right when he says that whenever you key your little matter to yourself when you was a little child, you kep' it mostly because you know'd as J. Gargery were dead set against Tickler in sunders were not fully equal to his inclinations. Therefore, think no more of it as betwixt two such, and do not let us pass remarks upon onnecessary subjects. Biddy giv' herself a deal o' trouble with me afore I left (for I am most awful dull), as I look back view it in this light, and viewing it in this light, as I should so put it. Both of which," said Joe, quite charmed with his logical arrangement, "being done, now as this to you a true friend, say, Namely. You mustn't go a over-doing on it, but you must have your supper and your wine and water, and you must be put betwixt the sheets."

The delicacy with which Joe dismissed this theme, and the sweet tact and kindness with which Biddy—who with her woman's wit had found me so unmanned—prepared him for it, made a deep impression on my mind. Not whether Joe knew how poor I was, and how my great expectations had all dissolved, like our own marsh mists before the sun, I could not understand.

Another thing in Joe that I could not understand when it first began to develop itself, but which I soon arrived at a sorrowful comprehension of, was this: As I became stronger and better Joe became a little less easy with me.

In my weakness and entire dependence on him the dear fellow had fallen into the old tone, and called me by the old names, the dear "old Pip, old chap," that now were music in my ears. I too had fallen into the old ways, only happy and thankful that he let me. But, imperceptibly, though I held by them fast, Joe's hold upon them began to slacken; and whereas I wondered at this at first, I soon began to understand that the cause of it was in me, and that the fault of it was all mine.

Alas! I had I given Joe no reason to doubt my constancy, and to think that in prosperity I should grow cold to him and cast him off? Had I given Joe's innocent heart no cause to feel instinctively that as I got stronger his hold upon Joe should it be slacker and let me go before I plucked myself away?

It was on the third or fourth occasion of my going out with Joe and walking home leaning on Joe's arm that I saw this change in him very plainly. We had been sitting in the bright warm sunlight, looking at the river, and I chanced to say as we got up:

"See, Joe! I can walk quite strongly. Now you shall use your own pace, dear Joe."

"Which do not overdo it, Pip," said Joe; "but I shall be happy for to see you able. Sir."

The last word grated on me. I knew could I remonstrate! I walked no further than the gate of the gardens, and then pretended to be weaker than I was, that I might go for his arm. Joe gave it me, but was thoughtful.

I, for my part, was thoughtful too; for how best to check this growing change in Joe was a great perplexity to my remorseful thoughts. That I was ashamed to tell him exactly how I was placed, and that I had come down to do not seek to conceal; but I hope my reluctance was not quite an unworthy one. He would want to help me, in his dear fellow heart, I knew, and I knew that he ought not to help me, and that I must not suffer him to do it.

Yes, a thoughtful time for both both of us. But before we went to bed I had resolved that I would wait over to-morrow, to-morrow being Sunday, and would begin my life again with the new week. On Monday morning I would speak to Joe about this change; I would lay aside this last barrier between us, and would tell him what I had in my thoughts (that Secondly, not yet arrived at), and why I had not ventured to go out to Herbert, and then the change could be conquered forever. As I cleared Joe clear ed, and it seemed as though he had set up other lofty barriers between us.

We had a quiet day on the Sunday, and we rode out into the country, and took walked in the fields.

"I feel thankful that I have been ill, Joe," I said.

"Dear old Pip, old chap, you're almost come round, Sir."

"It has been a memorable time for me, Joe."

"Likewise for myself, Sir," returned Joe.

"We have had a time together, Joe, that I can never forget. There were days once, I remember, that I felt a while forget; but I never shall forget these."

"Pip," said Joe, appearing a little hurried and anxious, "I ain't a saying nothing, old dear Sir, what has been betwixt us—have been."

At night, when I had gone to bed, Joe came into my room again, and asked enough my recovery. He asked me if I felt sure that I was as well as in the morning?

"Yes, dear Joe, certainly."

"And are always a getting stronger, old chap?"

"Yes, dear Joe, steadily."

Joe patted the coverlet on my shoulder with his great good hand, and said, in what I thought a very tender voice, "Good night!"

When I got up in the morning, refreshed and stronger yet, I was full of my resolution to tell Joe all, without delay. I would tell him before breakfast. I would dress at once and go to his room and surprise him; for it was the first day I had been up early. I was sure Joe would be astonished to see me.

But when I came to the letter was a receipt for the debt and costs on which I had been arrested. Down to that moment I had vainly supposed that my protector had withdrawn or suspended proceedings until I should be quite recovered. I had never dreamed of Joe's having paid the money; but Joe had paid it, and the receipt was in his name.

What remained for me now but to follow him to the forge with my arrears of confession and disclosure to him, and my penitent remonstrance with him, there to relieve my mind and heart before breakfast-time? Biddy would account for a vague something lingering in my thoughts, and had formed into a settled purpose?

I finished dressing, and went down to Biddy, that I would show her how humbled and repentant I came back, that I would tell her how I felt sure she knew it, and that I would remind her of our old confidences in my first unhappy time. Then I would say to her, "Biddy, I think your sister has a warm place in my heart, even while it strayed away from you, was quieter and better with you than it ever has been since. If you can like me only half as well once more, if you can take me with all my faults and disappointments on my head, if you can receive me like a forgiven child (and indeed I am as sorry, Biddy, and have as much need of a hushing voice and a soothing hand), I hope I am a little worthier of you than I was —not much, but a little. And, Biddy, it shall rest with you to say whether I shall work at the forge with Joe, or whether I shall try for any different occupation down in this country, or whether we shall go away to a distant place where an opportunity awaits me, which I set aside, when it was offered, until I knew your answer. And now, dear Biddy, if you can tell me that you will go through the world with me, you will surely make it a better world for me, and me a better man for it, and I will try hard to make it a better world for you."

Such was my purpose. After three days more of recovery I went down to the old place to put it in execution; and how I sped in it, is all I have left to tell.

THE FOURTH IN WASHINGTON.

On page 477 we publish an engraving from a sketch by our special artist, of the GRAND REVIEW OF NEW YORK TROOPS at Washington on 4th July. A correspondent thus describes it:

The parade of twenty-thousand New York troops, under command of General Sandford, previously announced, came off in the morning according to programme. A stand was erected on the sidewalk of Pennsylvania Avenue, in front of the White House, which was occupied by the President, several members of the Cabinet, General Scott, and various Major and Brigadier Generals.

The military fled by in the following order:

FIRST BRIGADE.

Eighth Regiment N Y. Militia	Col. Bleeker.
Seventeenth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Wilcox.
Fourteenth Brooklyn Regiment N. Y. Militia	Col. Duryea.
Thirteenth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Lefferts.
Sixteenth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Davies.
Seventh Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Marshall.

SECOND BRIGADE.

Eighteenth Regiment N. Volunteers	Col. Jackson.
Nineteenth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Clark.
Twenty-third Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Rogers.
Twenty-second Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Phelps.
Twenty-fourth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Van Steinwehr.
Twenty-sixth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Van Schaick.

THIRD BRIGADE.

Twenty-fifth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Donnelly.
Twenty-seventh Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Lyon.
Thirty-first Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. C. D. Pratt.
Thirty-second Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Mathewson.
Thirty-seventh Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. M'Cunn.
Thirty-eighth Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. Ward.
Garibaldi Guard Regiment N. Y. Volunteers	Col. D'Utassi.

FOURTH BRIGADE.

Fifth Regiment N. Y. State Militia	Col. Schwarzwalder.
Twelfth Regiment N. Y. State Militia	Col. Butterfield.
Thirty-ninth Regiment N. Y. State Militia	Col. Max Weber.
Seventy-first Regiment N. Y. State Militia	Col. Martin.

The troops having passed in review, the crowd immediately surrounded the platform, when loud calls being made for General Scott,

President Lincoln came forward and said:

Fellow citizens—I see we will have to wait for each other a long while. It is a sort of rule that constrains me to do so. I know that a sight of your noble old faces and revered heads would be more gratifying to you than a speech from me. I take pleasure in acknowledging your distinguished generalship.

General Scott then came forward, when he was cheered with the most deafening applause. The old General, the bulwark of the nation in the fearful contest time of demolition, bowed his acknowledgments to the enthusiastic people before him, and then the tall, spare figure of the vast creed and marked the fervor of their feelings in eyes that glistened, and hands that clapped and shouts that proclaimed a people's thanks for peace preserved and a nation's life saved. The old hero felt rewarded for the great services he has and is still rendering to the country. Cheer after cheer followed, and it was only when the aged chieftain bowed and retired among his friends, leaving the front of the platform clear, that a partial calm was restored.

THE WAR ON THE POTOMAC.

We publish on page 475 an engraving from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, entitled, "GENERAL MCCLELLAN'S COMPLIMENTS TO THE SECESSIONERS." We need hardly explain that it represents the experimental firing of a field-piece across the river, and that some of the fellows who have lately been amusing themselves by shooting our sentinels and pickets. Lieutenant Hall is, we believe, the officer in that name who formed part of the Sumter garrison under Major Anderson.

THE MISSES SCOTT.

SOME time since two young ladies of the name of Scott, residents of Fairfax County, Virginia, were the means of capturing the Captain of a volunteer regiment from Connecticut. They have now been taken themselves, and we illustrate, on this page, their appearance as they drove into our lines at Fall's Church. The account of their capture is thus given by a Connecticut boy, one of the scouting party which took them:

After getting out of the woods we came to a corn-field, through which we crawled on our hands and knees, and we got completely "turned," but managed to get through the greatest danger and come to a house, where we went to see what we could make out. We found there an old man, when we asked if any of our troops were there. He wanted to know if we were on the Southern side. Lieut. Upton told him "Yes," when he told us we were about a mile from their tents, but to look out or we would be captured. We of course appeared frightened, and posted a man outside to look out. Lieutenant Upton told him he was an officer of a South Carolina regiment. The old man told him all about the United States camp, the names of all the secession neighbors, and finally said he had in his house the two Miss Scotts who took the Yankee Captain, so the old man took us into the room and introduced us to the Miss Scotts. That moment was a proud one for us, for right in our hands were those whom the whole brigade had been hunting for. But we continued to play our part, complimenting the ladies highly for their feat, and pumping the old man for further information. When, after learning the most direct road to our camp, Lieutenant Upton told them we must go, but he would like to see the whole family together to bid them good-by. Accordingly they all came out in the front porch—the old man, his wife, three sons, and daughter, and the two Miss Scotts. We just formed a circle about them, when Lieutenant Upton, drawing his sword, demanded their surrender to the United States. You ought to have seen their faces! The two Miss Scotts and the young men were all we took with us. The excitement was very great when we went into camp, and we found they had given us up for lost, and sent a company after us. With the two Miss Scotts we marched to the General's quarters, and left the ladies there, and the men we took to the guard-house. The General sent for us in the evening, and complimented us highly for our conduct on this occasion.

The ladies of Virginia and Maryland have been, as a rule, fiercer in their secessionism than the men. Multitudes more our troops are insulted daily by ladies.

THE TWO FURROWS.

BY C. H. WEBB.

THE spring-time came, but not with mirth—
The banner of our trust,
And with it the best hopes of earth
Were trailing in the dust.

The Farmer saw the shame from far,
And stopped his plow afield;
Not the blade of peace but the brand of war
This arm of mine must wield.

When traitor hands that flag would stain,
Their homes let women keep;
Until its stars burn bright again,
Let others sow and reap.

The Farmer sighed—a lifetime long
The plow has been my trust;
In truth it was an errant wrong
To leave it now to rust.

With ready strength the Farmer tore
The iron from the wood,
And to the village smith he bore
That plow-share stout and good.

The blacksmith's arms were bare and brown,
And loud the bellows roared:
The Farmer flung his plow-share down—
"Now forge me out a sword!"

And then a merry, merry chime
The sounding anvil rang;
Good sooth, it was a nobler rhyme
Than ever poet sung.

The blacksmith wrought with skill that day,
The blade was keen and bright,
And now where thickest is the fray
The Farmer leads the fight.

Not as of old that blade he sways
To break the meadow's sleep,
But through the rebel ranks he lays
A furrow broad and deep.

The Farmer's face is burned and brown,
But light is on his brow,
Right well he wots what blessings crown
The furrow of the Plow.

But better is to-day's success—
Thus ran the Farmer's word—
For nations yet unborn shall bless
This furrow of the Sword.

OUR INSTITUTIONS ON THEIR TRIAL.

THE most convenient government for a nation at war is a despotic monarchy; the most inconvenient—according to general opinion—a democratic republic. A despotic monarch, having no advisers to defer to, no responsibility to fear, and no laws to obey, can act with a promptitude, an energy, and a secrecy which are nearly compatible with the checks and trammels of limited governments. He can meet desperate emergencies with desperate remedies; and, while popular governments are studying how to conciliate existing interests, unforeseen crises, can despise or trample all thing and every thing which may stand in the way of his purpose. Him no Congressional debates delay, no cavilling Committees annoy; no newspapers baffle by premature betrayals of his plans; no rules compel to disregard genius in the choice of his officers; no law hamper in the selection of the most efficient method to attain his ends. If he has the money, the men, and the will, to prosecute the war is to him no task at all.

It is a very different matter in a democratic republic such as ours. In the first place, the Constitution—a document not framed in view of such wars as the present one, for instance, and full of checks on the authority of the Executive—ties the hands of the President, and forbids his doing many things which war may render it absolutely necessary for him to do. The laws of the United States—framed for the general good in time of peace—lay further restrictions upon him; deny him no power to stop unlawful trade, for instance, and none to interfere with constructive treason. Under the law he can neither enlist men to fight, nor pay them for fighting, without the previous decree of Congress. When he has got the men and the money, Congress still retains the power of directing how the money and the men shall be employed, and of appointing Committees to see that their directions are carried out. Even the Executive Authority of the President is constitutionally shared with a body of advisers who are entitled to a knowledge of his secrets. Over and above all, the Supreme Court enjoys and exercises the right of pronouncing the President's acts invalid, null, and void. Then come the people and the press. Though the people can not constitutionally act upon the Government except through the ballot-box, yet still "popular pressure" is a power known to and feared by all governments; where it can not be repressed by the arm of authority, it is almost irresistible. This pressure is mostly exercised through the press. The power of a free and an able press is such that wise men have doubted whether it were possible to carry on a long war in its presence. Wars—even the most popular—make so many malcontents among those whose livelihood is taken away by the war, and discontent at home is so fatal to the administration of a Government engaged in a great war, that even English statesmen in our day have doubted whether the freedom of the press should be absolute in war as in peace—whether newspapers, working for private ends or in the interest of unpatriotic malcontents, should be suffered to weaken the hands of Government, during war-time, by malevolent opposition.

We are now testing these various inconveniences of the form of government under which we live. Our institutions are on their trial. We know that they work well in peace; we know that they do not prevent our carrying on a foreign war; it remains to be seen whether they are compatible with a great civil war.

Thus far, the nation has good ground for self-gratulation. We have a President who, like Jackson, has not feared to take the responsibility of acting as the emergency required. We have a Congress patriotic enough to ratify his acts, to give him men and money in abundance, to increase his power wherever increase was needed. And the people have thus far been absolutely true to themselves. No one has heard a single faint-hearted cry; no one thinks of compromises; no one objects to the full and speedy use of any work that is to be done. The hundred days which have elapsed since the bombardment of Sumter have not in the least wearied or enfeebled the national sentiment aroused by that outrage.

Let us hope that it will be so to the end. Montesquieu tells us that the only difficulty with republican governments is that they require so much virtue in their citizens. That is just the point. Can our people have enough virtue—that is to say, courage, perseverance, loyalty to themselves, to truth, to God, fidelity to their principles, and unity of purpose—they can carry on this war as well as any despot could. If they do not, the war will end, some day, in the sacrifice of honor and nationality, and the United States will sink lower than Mexico.

We can not too often repeat that the first duty of the citizen at this juncture is to give to the President a generous, confiding, and cordial support. No man can doubt that Mr. Lincoln and General Scott are fully and honestly striving to put down this rebellion. This task entitles them to the undivided support of every patriot, and ought to insure them against petty cavils and mean suspicions. Such journals as the New York Tribune, which selects this critical moment as the fit time to sneer unworthily at the military genius of Scott and the loyalty of Seward, ought to be banished from every honest man's house, as the most efficient, if not the hired instruments of the rebels.

THE "TRIBUNE" ON MR. RUSSELL.

OUR genial contemporary, the Tribune, has made two attempts to explain the Russell-Daniel controversy to the public. In the first it stated that we had "charged Mr. Russell with treachery to our cause," which of course was a sheer invention; in the second it says that we "accused Mr. Russell of a tacit refusal to sustain our artist in the pretext by which he sought to evade the retribution of Southern foes to Northern literature." Now, as a matter of fact we have done nothing of the kind. We have accused Mr. Russell of nothing whatever. We stated that we were informed and believed that he knew Mr. Davis was our artist when they left Washington together—nothing more. Indeed for some time past we have seen nothing in any paper that was not complimentary to Mr. Russell, with the single exception of the following disgraceful paragraph from the editorial columns of the New York Tribune of July 21:

"* * * The social habits of the Times correspondent * * * have been matters of general discussion. Grant that drinking and smoking a journalist does is stimulus to intellectual exercise," etc., etc.

But the Tribune is nothing if not scurrilous.

☞ MR. SAMUEL WARD states, in a communication to the Times, that the letter signed by him, which was published in Harper's Weekly of July 20, was "an extract from a private note addressed by him," etc. This is not true. The letter was published as a letter, and not as private, but a business communication, addressed by name to the Editor of Harper's Weekly, on the business of that journal. Neither Mr. SAMUEL WARD himself nor the other statements contained in his letter seem to require any notice at our hands.

☞ "GREAT EXPECTATIONS" is published by PETERSON & CO., uniformly with all the other various editions of DICKENS'S works published by them. Price 50 cents in paper cover; or in one volume 12mo, or one volume octavo, with all the original illustrations by MCLENAN, for $1 50.

THE LOUNGER.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION

IN an article of the Lounger's, called "Who are against us?" published in this column in the paper for July 20, "it was evident enough to all who were in the habit of reading the New York Tribune that the writer had that paper in mind."

Yet such an article could not be justly called an innuendo. If a man says frankly that the leader of our armies in this emergency is a traitor, he says as plainly as words can, to all who know General Scott to be the leader, that Scott is a traitor. So when the Lounger says that if a paper takes a certain course it helps the enemy, he says to every one who knows that the Tribune takes that course, that in his opinion the Tribune helps the enemy. It is perfectly plain speaking, which yet does not prejudice those who do not read the paper.

But while the Lounger intended to say in the most emphatic manner that a particular course was fatal to the country, he did not say nor imply that those who took it wished ill to the country; for nothing is more evident than that the friends of a cause are often enough its most serious practical opponents. To defeat unwisely may be as disastrous as to attack. "It would be a most unpardonable misapprehension of human virtue," says Schiller, "to count a doubt upon the sincerity of Cato's intentions; and this sincerity is not impeached by the assertion which has often been made, and I trust will be made, that Cato, with his philosophy did incalculable injury to the Commonwealth."

The Lounger certainly did not intend to asperse motives. Let us some expressions he used, taken with the strong tone of the article, may perhaps fairly suggest that to doubt the honest patriotism of the conductors of the Tribune, he says here, in justice to himself, that he should as soon doubt his own. He believes that they wish to see the Government maintained upon the least compromise; but he believes just as firmly that the course they have pursued leads straight to compromise, and consequently to the ruin of the Government; and that, therefore, it is a course which every citizen who can speak to the public mind should, however faithfully and loyally, withstand. For the hope of crushing this rebellion lies more in the unity of public opinion than in the army in the field. When that unity is destroyed, the army is defeated. And whoever pursues a course which tends to destroy that harmony does all he can, however unwittingly, to defeat the national cause.

Whether a particular course does or does not tend to destroy that harmony is, of course, the question.

The Lounger can not leave the subject without adding that this article is written solely upon his own impulse, and with the sole expressed or implied desire of any body. For he fully believes that there may be the most radical difference of opinion, and the most earnest expression of that difference, without the imputation of bad motives; and that it is perfectly possible for the Tribune itself to disbelieve the charge that daily it helps the enemy altogether, without speaking, as it does in its number for Sunday, July 14, of "the malice" of its projectors "or of their supporters," and the "gross and malicious unfairness" upon the part of its projectors, as it does in its editorial columns on Sunday, the 21st July.

SCHOOLING BY WINFIELD SCOTT.

IT is a curious fact, but it is a fact, that the reckless assertions and hysterical misrepresentation of the rebel newspapers in regard to the free and loyal citizens of this country are seriously believed by many. Their assertions, pure and simple, are by those whose frequent residence and many friendships at the North should have saved from such delusion. But such is the power of a systematic lie. It destroys conscience, reason, and common sense.

Such persons really suppose that Mr. Lincoln is a drunken sot, that Seward is a consummate debauch, and that he is sunk in imbecility. At the same time they believe him to be a black-hearted monster—wicked enough for any nefarious plot, and daring to wade through blood to a throne. He is representated as keeping gloomy state in his palace; fawned upon by profligate slaves, and otherwise sensibly people look upon the ridiculous chimera and believe it exists.

On the 5th of June General Beauregard issued a proclamation to the people of the northern counties of Virginia. He began:

"A ruthless and unprincipled tyrant has invaded your soil. Abraham Lincoln, regardless of all moral, legal, and constitutional restraints, has thrown his abolition hosts among you, who are murdering and imprisoning your citizens, confiscating and destroying your property, and committing rape and other horrid outrages shocking and revolting to humanity to be enumerated. All rules of civilized warfare are abandoned, and they proclaim by their acts, on the line of invasion, that their war-cry is 'Beauty and booty.' All that is dear to man—your honor and that of your wives and daughters—your fortunes and your lives, are involved in this momentous contest."

Of course General Beauregard himself does not believe this; but many people, otherwise quite as intelligent as he, do. They can be taught their error but in one way. Freedom, education, the church, and the school-house, they think, only make men sneaking cowards and tuppenny peddlers, who, in John's place, would have sold their Master for twenty-nine pieces of silver rather than not close the bargain.

Doctor Scott has opened a school to teach them that they are mistaken. Ashers Lyon and Siegel in the West, Usher M'Clellan beyond the Alleghanies, Dibern M'Dowell, Patterson, Banks, Butler, and Mansfield around Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac, are rapidly imparting instruction in this branch. Their pupils are going to learn that an intelligent freeman, taught by his conscience and admonished by the laws that every man is of equal rights among men, and that constitutional liberty is the only guarantee of peaceable and progressive civilization, is a man as terrible in a battle as a bargain. They are to learn that because men prefer peace to war, and the sentiment of universal liberty to the inevitable barbarism of slavery, they are neither fools, cowards, idiots, drunken apes, nor mud-sills.

This is the lesson of the day. Dr. Scott is ringing his bell. Let all the children come to school. The Doctor is of the old school; and those who do not learn the lesson will be thrashed until they do.

WHAT CATO THE YOUNGER SAYS TO BRECKINRIDGE THE YOUNGER AND COMPANY.

WHEN Catiline's confederate conspirators were to be sentenced by the Roman Senate, the Senators declared for the severest punishment until CESAR spoke—Julius CESAR, the great Roman leader who overthrow of the Republic. He suggested milder measures. Cato replied, and his reply is the only oration of his preserved to us.

Does MR. BRECKINRIDGE, who lately aspired to be President of the United States, remember the account Plutarch gives of Cato's speech to CESAR? It is this:

"He attacked Cesar, and charged him with a secret design of subverting the government under the plausible appearance of solitatory speeches and humane conduct; and of intimidating likewise the Senate, even in a case where he had it for his friend, and in a time in which he might deem it an instance of great good fortune, if he himself could be exempted from the imputation and suspicion of guilt—when the city and country was daringly attempted to rescue from justice by the enemies of the state, and about that, for from having any suspicion of the conspiracy, he was the bride of destruction, he could even pity and plead for the unnatural wretches who had meditated its ruin, and grieve that their punishment should exceed their design."

Do MESSRS. Breckinridge, Vallandigham, Burnett, Bayard, Powell, Ben Wood, and Company think, as they read these words, that treason has changed much since the days of Catiline?

But when they hear Jerry Black declare: "It is time that in their majesty the people of the United States should make known to the world that this Government, in the exercise of its power, is something more than a moot court; and that the citizen who makes war upon it is a traitor not only in theory but in fact, and should have meted out to him a traitor's doom"—when those gentlemen hear these words do they not know, as every generous heart in the land acknowledges with delight, that heroic patriotism, also, has not changed much since the days of Cato?

TWO KENTUCKIANS.

TWO Kentuckians lately spoke, and the whole country fondly listened. BRECKINRIDGE spoke in the Senate of the United States, MR. HOLT in Louisville. MR. HOLT, quite unknown to the country until within two years by his masterly and impassioned oration takes his place among the most illustrious Americans; for the true patriots are those who are faithful to their principles when fidelity is dangerous. MR. Breckinridge, a man well known by name and position to the country, but conspicuous by the absence of himself by proved ability, in his quibbling plea against the President's course betrays all the desire without the heroism to reason.

MR. Breckinridge, when only prompt and firm action can save his country from ruin, calls the President who takes the steps to their end and save the country, and who at the same time summons the people in Congress to judge him, a usurper, who should be wrested.

MR. Holt paints in vivid colors the portraits of the conspirators who are striking at the heart of the country, and exclaims, as to Virginia, to which that heart cries anew, "The President of the United States is heroically and patriotically struggling for the constitutional rights of every wicked men. I have unbounded gratification in knowing that he has the courage to look traitors in the face; and that, without fear and without favor he will receive the support of all who justly appreciate the boundless blessings of our free institutions?"

MR. Breckinridge, with puerile folly, asserts that it was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that the Government could be maintained by force, and that in the last war in their senses could ever form any government of which the power of self-preservation should not be the cardinal condition! Is education so little known among the people who favor this rebellion that their leaders may make the most absurdly untrue historical statements without contradiction? But while the Senator from Kentucky openly declares that it is unconstitutional to save the Constitution except in a prescribed way—utterly unconscious of what Senator Browning of Illinois so justly calls the right of self-defense inherent in States as in persons—he is careful to suggest, doubting to Kentucky, with the ringing eloquence of truth, "There is not and there can not be any neutral ground for a loyal people between their own Government and those who, at the head of armies, are menacing its destruction."

Who can not hear the laurels of the fathers rustle as these words are uttered? This Kentuckian loves Kentucky well, but he loves the nation more by which Kentucky lives. He knows that a blow struck at the nation wounds every State; for the parts live only in the life of the whole. He who shows this to his State does a service which no service can surpass. He who blinds her to it stabs her mortally.

Two Kentuckians have spoken. One defends the treason that, ruining the nation, would make Kentucky contemptible. The other defends the nation, whose permanence is the life-blood of the State.

ANOTHER DISTINGUISHED VICTIM.

THE war is so urgent that it is putting even the language to flight. The English tongue proves inadequate to the occasion. But is our race really so unused to fighting that it must borrow from France the word which describes armies? The papers speak of the grande armée. Why not the great army; or, as simplicity is strength, the army? Then what has happened to the good technical, expressive words division or column, that are suddenly unequal to the emergency, and must be superseded by corps d'armée. Why should a division or column of the army be called corps d'armée, any more than the nation should be called la République? War is not a peculiarly French science that its technical terms must be expressed in French.

Let us have an end of this priggish nonsense. General Scott is the chief of an army, not of a grande armée: and General M'Dowell and General M'Clellan's proper names be honored!—command divisions, not corps.

WHEN TO CELEBRATE A VICTORY.

THE proper time to celebrate a victory is when the army returns victorious, not when it marches out to battle. Nobody, probably, who could be said to have a choice, supposed that this rebellion, which had so long and strong a start of the Government, could be suppressed in a month, or without the loss of a great deal of treasure. There must be many battles, victories, and defeats. Now one side will triumph, now the other. The essential point is that every body shall keep his head and heart as cool as possible; and above all, not suppose that a single battle can conclude the war.

We must apply sober common sense to it. At the moment of writing, for instance, the advance of our army is checked at Manassas. Now let us suppose that the army is in a position to force on it, we know that they have the choice of position; that they are strongly and skillfully fortified; that they have as many cannon, and that they are as well-served; that in their ranks are many men who, under the melancholy delusion cast upon them by their chiefs, seriously believe that they are opposing the irruption of a savage horde whose motto is "Beauty and booty:" that the Rebel Congress has appointed a Richmond mint, and that defeat now would be so to dishearten that body and demoralize the insurrection, that every nerve will be strained to the utmost to secure success.

Bearing these facts in mind, and remembering the chances of war, it would be by no means surprising if the rebels held their position. But what then? Did you suppose that our army was to march straight from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico? Did you suppose that all the murder of so many of the best arms of the country to the rebel part of the country by that worthy patriot, John B. Floyd, was to have no result? Above all, did you suppose that the leaders of this cruel rebellion would dare to retreat altogether? They must stand and defend: they must fight: for it is better for them to run the risk of a battle with loyal citizens than meet the fatal rage of those whom they have deceived and betrayed.

But while a great defeat at this period of the war would be the ruin of the rebellion, a defeat would be nearly due to the Government. It would deepen and intensify the struggle. It would be a victory as fatal to the rebels as that of Bunker Hill was to the British. It would open a new view of this great effort of Constitutional liberty to maintain itself; and the calmest and most reasonable of them would repeat the words of Senator Dixon of Connecticut, and Senator Browning of Illinois, calmest and most reasonable of Senators: "The nation must be preserved pure and inviolate, and whatever stands in the way, whether political or vested right, must go down."

It is for this that the meeting at Richmond to determine at what cost to themselves they will compel the Government of the United States to celebrate its victory.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

DAUGHTERS TO SELL.

SONG BY A LADY OF FASHION.

DAUGHTERS to sell! Daughters to sell!
They cost more money than I can tell;
Their education has been frightful,
What wealthy young nobleman wants a mate?
They sing like nightingales, play on the veil:
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!

Here's my fine daughters, my daughters, all!
German, Italian, French they know,
Dance like Sylphides for grace and ease;
Dresses out every fashion, whatever you please.
Here's a nice wife for a rich young swell:
Daughters to sell. Daughters to sell!

Beautiful daughters, dark and fair!
Each a treasure to suit a nobleman,
Or fit to pair with any duke's heir,
St. George's Society by Hanover Square,
Buy! you that in lordly mansions dwell,
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!

Buy my pretty daughters! What can a bride,
That can give her a carriage, and horses to ride,
Stand on pedestal for his fancy's queen,
And no end of acres of crinoline.
Ever new furniture, jewels, and plate,
All sorts of servants upon her to wait;
Visits to Paris, Vienna, and Rome,
In short all that she's been brought up to at home.
Here are girls for your money—if out you can shell.
My daughters to sell! My daughters to sell!

A letter from Naples says: "Standing on Cattle Etiou, I drank in the whole sweep of the bay." What a swallow the writer must have!

THE WAY TO WIN HIM.

A fast girl falls to catch a lord and master,
Because none other girls are rather faster.
And e'en a fast man fears to take a wife,
If fast, she'll be found fast to him for life.

AT ST AGNES, you Sent—The Wicomet is ever apt at an absurdity. A friend of his the other day was talking of Aeschylus, and saying that to set the Furies off free without injuring their cothurn would be almost an act of magic. "Magic!" observed Wicomet, "why, Lord, I don't see that exactly. But it might certainly be called an act of negromancy!"

COCKNEY CONUNDRUM.

What's the difference between the late Sultan, Abdul Medjid, and his successor?

Abdul Medjid is Abdul as was, but the present Sultan is Abdul Aziz.

WE are told that "as a man makes his bed so he must lie in it." By the same rule, it is said, a fish, when his balance-sheet is not drawn up all straight, there is great cry and wail [rye in it.

IMPALLIBLE RECIPE FOR HOT WEATHER.—What is the best way to prevent meat turning? Eat it straight off.

"ALL ALIVE, OH!"—Friendship, it must be confessed, is of a far more practical character than Love. Men are merely bitten by their enemies, but they are eaten up by their friends.

Louis XIV. being extremely harassed by the repeated solicitations of a veteran officer for promotion, said one day, loud enough to be heard by the petitioner, "I am the most troublesome officer I have in my service. "That is precisely the character I have of your majesty," which your monarch's enemies bring against me."

An adjutant of a volunteer corps, being doubtful whether he had distributed muskets to all the men, cried out, "All you that have muskets, hold up your hands!"

A Bladensburg correspondent tells us of an officer in one of the volunteer regiments stationed there: Finding that there was going on a great deal of swearing, and his example no numerous, he established a court-martial for the trial and judgment of offenders, and issued the following order: "If the court-martial exonerates an offender, then the oar bearer of the day will furnish him a cigar cheaper as he may think proper—handselling or tying to a fence."

A great toper, who had drunk nothing stronger than brandy all his life, called for a glass of water on his deathbed, saying, "When a man is dying he ought to have a fly with his manner."

"The following letter was sent by a father to his son at college:

"MY DEAR SON,—I write to send you some new tools; with these you may soon learn the trade—break down some of mine. Your mother sends you ten pounds, without my knowledge, and I send you this letter without her's. I have kept back half, and only send you five. Your mother and I are well, thank God, and hope you get the measles, which we think would spread among the other boys if [You have not had them. Your mother is the only one left. I hope you will do honor to my teachings; if you do not, you will disappoint me and your mother and may sell ear your officiations parents."

"I'm getting fat," as the thief said when he was stabbed in the belly.

"We know an old man who believed that 'what was to be, would be.' He lived in a region infested by very savage Indians. He was warned of his danger, but this time he found some of his family had taken it. As he would not go armed, they armed themselves, and on seeing that there was no danger of the Indians; that he would not die till his time came anyhow. 'Yes,' says the old fellow, 'suppose I had been killed, indeed, and no time had come, it wouldn't do not to have my gun.'"

People generally freeze in doubting the Cape; but a lady generally doubles hers to keep her warm.

A gentleman made his wife a present of a silver drinking-cup, with an angel at the bottom, and when he filled it full, he could see the angel. The other day he asked her why she drank every drop. "Because, ducky," she said, "I like to see the angel disappear." The fact is when he had the angel taken out, and had a devil engraved at the bottom, "tempus fugit" was the result, and he again asked her the reason. "Why," replied the wife, "because I want to see the devil disappear."

THE EMPEROR NOT READY TO ACKNOWLEDGE THE REBEL GOVERNMENT.

The Paris Opinion Nationale of June 26, in commenting on the affair in the United States, takes occasion to speak of the article in the Patrie which received a semi-official character from the Government organ, the Constitutionnel, remarks. "It is a proposal opinion, nothing more." But it is certain that the regretted that the Moniteur should have reproduced that article and given it an almost official sanction. It is impossible to throw the responsibility of the publication by the Moniteur of the Patrie article on the government.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL GARNETT.

On page 481 we publish an illustration of the battle in which the late General Garnett, of the Rebel army, lost his life. He had evacuated his camp at Laurel Hill during the night of the 11th. General Morris's column commenced the pursuit the next afternoon. After a terrible forced march through rain and mud, over Laurel Mountain, our advance came upon the enemy at Carrick's Ford, eight miles south of St. George, Tucker County. The rebels drew up in line of battle, and poured in a raking volley on the right of our column—the Ohio Fourteenth—which returned a hot fire, lasting twenty minutes, when Colonel Dumont's Indiana Seventh made a charge upon their battery. They broke and ran, crossing the Ford toward St. George. General Robert S. Garnett, while attempting to rally his flying men, was struck by a ball which passed through his spine and out at the right breast. He fell dead on the sand. Colonel Dumont continued the chase two miles and bivouacked. The rest bivouacked on the battle-ground.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NAVAL BATTERY AT VERA CRUZ.

PHILADELPHIA, July 25, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of the 20th I see you state that the men of General Patterson's command manned the Naval Battery that did so much execution at Vera Cruz. The writer of the above has been misinformed, as the guns were manned by the sailors of the ships from which the guns were taken. There were five guns, the whole under the command of Lieutenant Harry Ingersoll, U.S.N. By noticing the above you will but do justice to the sailors who worked the guns, and oblige one who served at the Raritan's gun as a blue jacket.

Respectfully, WILLIAM H. STELL.

Our information with regard to the working of the guns of the Naval Battery at Vera Cruz came from a very high source; but we will let our correspondent tell his story in his own way. General Patterson's recent performance has not justified the expectations of his friends, and but few will regret his retirement to private life. Had he followed Johnson up, the affair at Bull's Run might have terminated very differently.—ED. Harper's Weekly.

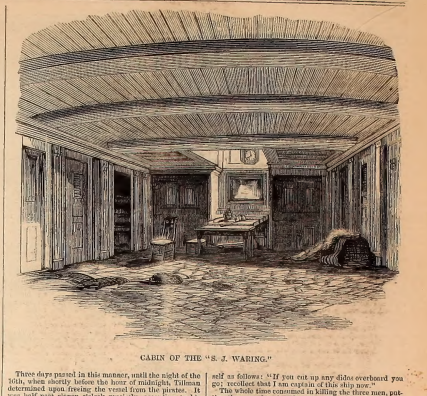
THE SCHOONER "S. J. WARING," RECAPTURED FROM THE PIRATES BY THE NEGRO WM. TILLMAN.



CABIN OF THE "S. J. WARING."

THE SCHOONER "S. J. WARING."

We publish on this page an engraving of the schooner S. J. Waring, of Brook Haven, Smith, master, hence for Montevideo, July 4, with an armored cargo. We also give views of her deck and the cabin, where the tragedy described below occurred. She returned to port on 21st, and reported as follows:

On the third day out from port, the 7th inst., when 150 miles from Sandy Hook, in lat. 38°, long. 69°, was brought to by the privateer brig Jeff Davis, which sent a boat full of men alongside, and ordered the captain of the schooner to haul down the United States flag, and declared her a prize to the C. S. A. They ransacked the vessel, and took from her what they wanted—such as charts, spyglasses, provisions, crockery, etc., and after returning to the schooner a second time, they put a prize-crew of five men on board without arms, and took away Captain Francis Smith, the two mates and two seamen, leaving the steward, two seamen, and Mr. Bryce Mackimore, a passenger, on board. The prize-crew were Montague O'Neil, a Charleston pilot, in command: one named Stevens, as mate, and Malcolm Liddy, as second mate, and two men.

At 3 P.M. the schooner was headed South—probably for Charleston or near by. The remaining crew and the passenger were in hopes of a recapture by some United States vessel, and made themselves agreeable and sociable to the privateersmen, and in consequence they suspected nothing until the night of the 15th of July, when fifty miles to the southward of Charleston.

Seeing no prospect of their hopes being realized, and the prize captain and first mate being asleep in their berths, and the second mate at the wheel, the others dozing or asleep, the preconcerted plan was carried into effect by the steward, William Tillman (colored), killing the three with a hatchet, and throwing the bodies overboard. It was all finished in five minutes. One of the remaining men was tied up that night, and both were released in the morning on promise to help work the vessel, and were treated accordingly.

After retaking the vessel the charge of her devolved on the steward. Neither he nor the rest understood navigation, but having once got hold of the lead he brought her safely up to pilot ground, when Mr. Charles Warner, of the pilot-boat Jane, took charge of her.

Another account gives the following details:

As soon as the vessel was fairly in the hands of the secessionists, the Stars and Stripes which floated from the mast was taken down and cut up into pieces, in order to make a rebel flag out of it. This it was, Tillman avers, which first inspired him with a hatred and an incentive of revenge, as he saw the flag of the Union trampled upon so shamefully by these cowardly traitors to the cause of freedom. Things went on smoothly enough until the seventh day after the capture, the 14th of July—Tillman meanwhile planning in his mind the best method to adopt in order to retake the vessel. The crew of the S. J. Waring were working the vessel at the time, and consequently not kept in irons. One of the men composing the crew, named Donald M'Leod, it appears, refused taking the vessel, and notwithstanding this, the brave Tillman did not hesitate in carrying out the heroic work which he had been planning out in his mind for several days previous.

Three days passed in this manner, until the night of the 10th, when shortly before the hour of midnight, Tillman determined upon freeing the vessel from the pirates. It was half past eleven o'clock precisely, according to his own statement. The captain, Montague Amiel, was asleep in his cabin, together with Stevens, the mate, in the berth next to him. The second mate, Malcom Siding, was also asleep on the poop-deck, and the other two seamen composing the pirate prize-crew, were lounging leisurely at the forehead part of the ship.

Tillman stole up from between decks, with hatchet in hand, and first went down into the captain's cabin, who was sound asleep in bed. He then raised his axe and gave him a vigorous blow on his skull, from which he seemed to be launched into eternity, for he moved not an inch. The negro next proceeded to deal with the mate, who was also reclining near his captain fast asleep, and dealt with him in the same summary and terrible manner. After leaving both these men dead below, Tillman came on the poop-deck and struck the second mate a fearful blow over the temple. The unfortunate man was just rising from his reclining position, with little expectation that he was about being launched into eternity. He then went below once more, took hold of the captain's body and flung him overboard, doing the same with that of the mate and second mate. The coast being now clear, he called out to the two remaining of the crew aft, telling them that they must obey him as captain of the vessel, or he would throw them overboard also. The men pitched up without a murmur, when he had them at once ironed, but subsequently released them on their consenting to assist in bringing the vessel to a Northern port. The names of these men are James Meldenna and James Mowat, one nineteen years old and the other twenty-two.

The coast was now clear of danger, and the hero Tillman proceeded to on the best means in his power for the safe navigation of the vessel into a Northern port. It was at the time, finding that the S. J. Waring was too heavy for a short crew, that he offered Dorset and Meldenna their liberty if they would assist him in the working of the ship. On this occasion he (Tillman) graphically expressed himself as follows: "If you cut up any didos overboard you go; recollect that I am captain of this ship now."

The whole time consumed in killing the three men, putting them overboard, and getting the vessel under his own command, Tillman relates as being exactly seven and a half minutes.

With regard to the scene of the tragedy the Herald reporter says:

The state-room occupied by the rebel captain of the schooner presents exactly the same appearance as it did when the death-dealing strokes of Tillman hurried them into that land "from whose bourne no traveler returns." The sheets of the bed and the floor were covered with blood, and the entire scene was one at which human nature might well shudder. The berth-room of the mate did not present so revolting an appearance as that of the captain, as it appeared that he did not bleed as much as the captain. No struggle whatever appeared to have taken place in either case, but that stake of disorder which resulted from the dragging of the bodies on board.

The place where the second mate expired was stained with but a few spots of blood, as he lay upon the rebel flag which had been cut out from the Stars and Stripes, that bearing several marks of the crimson fluid. The flag remains at the head-quarters of the Harbor Police, together with the axe with which the dead was committed and the coat which the rebel captain was in the habit of wearing. The tonnage of the schooner is rated about 300, and she is said to be a fast-sailing and quite a staunch little craft, and belongs to Jones, Smith, & Co., of this city. There is no ordnance on the vessel. She was built in Port Jefferson, Long Island, in 1855.

The negro Tillman has been confined in the House of Detention as a witness, but will doubtless shortly be liberated. He has been before the Chamber of Commerce, and it is in contemplation to present him with a substantial reward.

THE ATTACK ON THE SECOND MATE.

THE BATTLE OF CARTHAGE, MISSOURI.—From a Sketch made on the Spot.—[See next Page.]

THE BATTLE OF CARTHAGE.

ON page 486 we illustrate THE BATTLE OF CARTHAGE, where Colonel Siegel, of the United States Volunteers of Missouri, kept all busy and severely punished a very disproportionate force of rebels, under Generals Parsons and Rains. The St. Louis Republican gives the following account of the affair:

On Friday morning last, at five o'clock, a scouting party sent out by Colonel Siegel encountered, about two miles distant from Carthage, a picket guard of the State troops, who were attacked, and three taken prisoners. With all dispatch Colonel Siegel prepared to go forward, expecting to meet the State troops some distance west of Carthage. About half past nine o'clock the meeting took place in the open prairie seven miles beyond Carthage. Lieutenant Tesk estimates the number of the opposing army at five thousand, chiefly cavalry, but supplied with a battery of five cannon—four six-pounders and one twelve-pounder—while Colonel Siegel's command consisted of his own regiment of two battalions, and Colonel Salomon's detached regiment, with several pieces of artillery, under command of Major Backof. Colonel Siegel's regiment had six hundred men, and Colonel Salomon's five hundred. The State troops were commanded by Generals Parsons and Rains. Major Backof, under the direction of Colonel Siegel, opened the fire, which continued briskly for nearly two hours. In less than an hour the twelve-pounder of the State troops was dismounted, and soon after the whole battery was silenced. The superior arms of the Unionists enabled them to maintain a situation of comparatively little danger. The State troops—who, for convenience, we shall call Jackson's men—twice broke their ranks, but were rallied and held their position very well, considering the destructive discharges against them, until their guns gave out, when their column was again broken.

At this juncture about fifteen hundred of the cavalry started back with the intention of cutting off Siegel's transportation train, seeing which movement a retreat was ordered, and word sent immediately for the wagons to advance as rapidly as possible. By keeping up the fire with the infantry, and bringing the artillery in range whenever practicable, Colonel Siegel managed to retard the progress of Jackson's cavalry, and eventually to fall back almost undetracted to the baggage train, which was some three and a half miles from the scene of the first engagement.

By a skillful movement the wagons were placed in the centre of the column in such a manner that there were artillery and infantry forces both in front and rear. Jackson's troops then retreated and endeavored to surround the entire column by taking a position upon some high bluffs or hills overlooking a creek.

Major Backof ordered two of the artillery pieces in front to dislodge to the left and two to the right, and as the same time a hasty movement was made from Colonel Siegel's battalions. This was a manœuvre to induce Jackson's men to believe that Siegel was seeking to pass out on the extremes of their lines, and to outflank the cavalry. It was followed by a closing up to the right and to the left by the forces on the bluffs, when, on reaching a point three hundred and fifty yards from the cavalry, the four pieces were ordered to a transverse oblique, and immediately a heavy cross-fire was opened with canister. At the same time the infantry charged at double-quick, and in ten minutes the State troops were scattered in every direction. Ten rounds of canister were fired from each of the cannon, together with several rounds by the infantry.

This was at about five o'clock in the evening, and the engagement, with the manœuvring, had occupied in the neighborhood of two hours. Jackson's cavalry were poorly mounted, being armed chiefly with shot guns and common rifles. They had no cannon on the bluffs or hills, and were consequently able to make little or no resistance to the attacks of Colonel Siegel. Forty-five men and eighty horses were taken belonging to Jackson's troops, and there were also captured sixty double-barrelled shot guns and some revolvers and bowie-knives. Our informant states that one of the prisoners, on being asked how many had been killed on his side, estimated the loss at from two hundred and fifty to three hundred.

GRAVES OF THE OHIO VOLUNTEERS, NEAR ROACH'S MILLS, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY AN OHIO VOLUNTEER.]

GRAVES OF THE OHIO VOLUNTEERS.

NINE members of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteers were killed in the affair at Vienna on the 17th of June, 1861. They were buried in the rear of their encampment near Roach's Mills, Virginia, on the 18th, and the same day the encampment was removed to a point five miles beyond, on the road to Vienna. On the evening of the 18th the Third Regiment New Jersey Militia occupied the ground vacated by the Ohio troops. Finding the graves unprotected, by direction of Lieutenant-Colonel Stephen Moore the Jersey troops built a neat fence of cedar branches around the graves. Under the mound are the bodies of eight men, and in the grave in front lies the body of the sergeant, who died after the others were buried. A few days after the burial the place was visited by some of the officers of the Ohio Regiment, and after their departure two Masonic emblems (a small gilt slipper and a triangle containing the letter "G") were found hanging on the cedar planted in the centre of the mound.

GENERAL HILL'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

ROWLESBURG, the head-quarters of General Hill in Western Virginia, is situated in a deep gorge in the Alleghanies, at a point where the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad crosses Cheat River. The scenery around it is bold, grand, and picturesque, shut in by towering mountain-walls, the dark stream flows silently on, overshadowed with dense forests of hemlock and laurel. This region of country is wild and thinly populated, and deer and bear roam unmolested along the thickly-wooded slopes. The little village has sprung up since the opening of the railroad, and has become quite a thriving place. General Hill is at present concentrating all his troops at Rowlesburg, by order of General M'Clellan, for the purpose of cutting off the retreat of the Confederates lately under Garnett, at St. George. The illustration will be found on page 490

GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

WE publish on page 484 a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL M'CLELLAN, U.S.A., whose brilliant victories in Western Virginia we have already illustrated. We subjoin an authentic account of General M'Clellan's career:

He was born in Philadelphia on December 3, 1826. At the age of sixteen he entered the Military Academy at West Point, graduating with the class of 1846, with the rank of Brevet Second-Lieutenant of Engineers. Until the Mexican war, however, he had no opportunity of distinguishing himself, and then, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco," as the orders expressed it, he was brevetted First Lieutenant. "For gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Molino del Rey," on September 8, 1847, he was offered a Brevet Captaincy, which he declined. He was attached to this rank, however, subsequently, "for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Chapultepec," and received the command of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoneers in May, 1848. At the close of the Mexican war he returned to West Point, where he remained on duty with the sappers and miners until 1851. During this time he introduced the bayonet exercise into the army, and translated and adopted a manual which has since become a text-book for the service. During the summer and fall of 1851 he superintended the construction of Fort Delaware, and in the succeeding spring was assigned to duty, under Major R. B. Marcy, the Red Rivers. Thence he was ordered to Texas, as assistant engineer, on the staff of General Persifer F. Smith, and engaged in some months in surveying the rivers and harbors of that State. In 1853 he was ordered to the Pacific coast, in command of the Western division of the survey of the North Pacific Railroad route. He returned to the East in 1854, to duty connected with the Pacific survey, and was engaged also in secret service to the West Indies. The next year he received a commission in the First Regiment of Cavalry, and was appointed a member of the commission which went to the seat of war in the Crimea and in Northern Russia. Colonel Richard Delafield, one of his colleagues, is now an officer in the rebel army, and Major Alfred Mordecai, the third member of the Commission, a short time ago resigned the Superintendency of the Free Arsenal. Major M'Clellan's report on the "Organization of European Armies and the Operations of the War," a quarto volume, embodying the result of his observations in the Crimea, greatly enhanced his reputation as a scientific soldier. In January, 1857, weary of location, he resigned his position in the army to become Vice-President and Engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad, which post he held for three years, when he was offered and accepted the Presidency of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, of which he was also General Superintendent. When our domestic troubles assumed formidable dimensions, Major M'Clellan's services were at once called into requisition. Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, tried to secure the benefit of his experience in organizing the volunteers from that State; but the tender of the Major-Generalship of the Ohio forces reached him first, and he at once accepted it. On May 14 he received a commission as Major-General in the United States Army, and now has command of the Department of Ohio, which comprises all of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and that part of Virginia lying north of the Great Kenawha River and west of the Green Briar River and the Maryland line, with so much of Pennsylvania as lies west of a line drawn from the Maryland line to the northeast corner of M'Kean County.

PRESENTATION OF A FLAG TO THE WEBSTER REGIMENT.

ON page 484 we illustrate the presentation of a flag by Edward Everett, on behalf of the ladies of Boston, to the Webster Regiment, at Boston, on July 18, 1861. In presenting the flag to Colonel Fletcher Webster, Mr. Everett said, among other things:

You are entering, Sir, with your patriotic associates, upon an untried field of duty, but you are descended from a stock which, in more than one generation, teaches lessons of loyal devotion. Your grandfather, Captain Ebenezer Webster, a grave and thoughtful man, was one of those brave frontier rangers who bore the brunt of the seven years' war in the wilderness which separated our then feeble settlements from Canada, and he stood with Stark at Bennington. Your noble father, in defence of the menaced Constitution of the country, led those mighty conflicts of the Senate, not less arduous, not less decisive, than the conflicts of the field. Your only brother, following the impulse of a generous ambition, left his young life on the sickly plains of Mexico. On the family record that bears these proud memories, nothing less worthy than duty faithfully performed, danger bravely met, and the country honorably served, will ever, I am confident, be inscribed in connection with your name.

THE REBELS IN VIRGINIA.

We continue our series of illustrations of THE REBEL ARMY IN VIRGINIA, from sketches by our faithful correspondent. With regard to the illustrations on pages 487 and 491, he writes us: "I send you a sketch of the camp of General Bee's BRIGADE OF THE CONFEDERATE ARMY, at the Fair Grounds near Winchester. It consists of some five regiments of Alabamians and Mississippians, in all about five thousand men. They are camped there at present, awaiting the advance of General Patterson, when I suppose General Johnston will order another retreat. The other sketch is one of a little incident which took place at Harper's Ferry yesterday. Two of the Ninth, Isaac Blakemore and George M'Mullan, went over and climbed the pole in the armory yard and took down the State flag of Virginia, which had been flying there since the place was first occupied by the Confederates. It was brought over to Sandy Hook and divided among their comrades, each one of whom secured a piece to send home as a trophy."

FALL'S CHURCH.

On this page we illustrate FALL'S CHURCH, FAIRFAX COUNTY, VIRGINIA, from a sketch by our special artist with General M'Dowell's corps d'armée. This is the most advanced post of our army in Fairfax County, and has been the scene of several picket skirmishes. Fall's Church was built in 1769, and rebuilt, as an inscription on the wall informs us, by the late "Lord" Fairfax, whose son, the present "Lord" Fairfax, is supposed to be serving in the rebel army. The title of Lord, we may observe, is still given to the representative of the family. The inscription on the old church reads as follows:

"Henry Fairfax, an accomplished gentleman, an upright magistrate, a sincere Christian, died in command of the Fairfax Volunteers at Saltillo, Mexico, 1847. But for his munificence this church might still have been a ruin."

Service was held in the old church two Sundays since—Rev. Dr. Mines, Chaplain of Second Maine Regiment, officiating, and most of the troops in the neighborhood being present.

LOCOMOTIVES DISMANTLED BY THE REBELS AT MARTINSBURG, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

DESTRUCTION OF LOCOMOTIVES AT MARTINSBURG, VA.

On this page we illustrate one of the effects of the Southern Rebellion—the destruction of valuable property by the rebels. Our special artist writes us from Martinsburg: "The destruction of locomotives, cars, etc., by the Confederates is one of the most disgraceful sights I ever witnessed. Forty-two as fine engines as could be built have been mutilated, some by burning, others by mere destruction with hammers and crow-bars. The stationary engine has met with no better treatment, and the buildings themselves were only saved from destruction by the precipitate flight of the Confederate troops."

SKIRMISH ON THE POTOMAC.

SKIRMISHING along the Potomac has become an everyday amusement with the troops stationed on the upper part of that river. Scarcely a day passes without an exchange of shots at some point between Edwards Ferry and Sandy Hook. Both parties generally keep themselves sheltered behind the trees and rocks that line the shores. So far two of the Federal troops have been killed and three wounded. It is not known how many have lost their lives on the other side. Several have been seen to fall. This sketch represents a little brush which took place at Sandy Hook a few days ago. After some pretty sharp firing, in which nobody was hurt, the Virginians retreated into the mountains, and hostilities were suspended.

THE BATTLE AT BULL'S RUN.

We devote a considerable portion of our space this week to the illustration of the BATTLE OF BULL'S RUN. A large view of COLONEL HUNTER'S ATTACK, from sketches by our special artist, who was present, will be found on pages 488 and 489; the COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIGHT is illustrated on page 492; and on the same page will be found an illustration of the cautious EXPLORING OF THE GROUND by our artillery. On page 484 will be found a MAP of the battle. We give the following account from a letter addressed by Mr. Henry J. Raymond to the Times:

On Saturday the troops were all brought closely up to Centreville, and all needful preparations were made for the attack which was intended for the next day. On Sunday morning, therefore, the army marched—by two roads—Colonel Richardson with his command taking the Southern, which leads to Bull's Run, and General Tyler the Northern, running parallel to it at a distance of about a mile and a half. The movement commenced at about 3 o'clock. I got up at a little before 4, and found the long line of troops extended far out on either road. I took the road by which Colonel Hunter with his command, and General M'Dowell and staff had gone, and pushed on directly for the front. After going out about two miles Colonel Hunter turned to the right—marching obliquely toward the Run, which he was to cross some four miles higher up, and then come down upon the intrenched positions of the enemy on the other side. Colonel Miles was left at Centreville and on the road, with reserves which he was to bring up whenever they might be needed. General Tyler went directly forward, to engage the enemy in front, and send reinforcements to Colonel Hunter whenever it should be seen that he was engaged.

I went out, as I have already stated, upon what is marked as the northern road. It is hilly, like all the surface of this section. After going out about three miles you come to a point down which the road, leading through a forest, descends; then it proceeds by a succession of rising and falling knolls for a quarter of a mile, when it crosses a stone bridge and then ascends by a steady slope to the heights beyond. At the top of that slope the rebels had planted a few batteries, and the woods below were filled with their troops and with concealed cannon. We proceeded down the road to the first of the small knolls mentioned, when the whole column halted. The 30-pounder Parrott gun, which has a longer range than any other in the army, was planted directly in the road. Captain Ayres's battery was stationed in the woods a little to the right. The First Ohio and Second New York Regiments were thrown into the woods in advance on the left. The Sixty-ninth, New York, the First, Second, and Third Connecticut regiments, were ranged behind them, and the Second Wisconsin was thrown into the woods on the right. At about half past six o'clock the 30-pounder threw two shells directly into the battery at the summit of the slope, on the opposite height, one of which, as I learned afterward, struck and exploded directly in the midst of the battery, and occasioned the utmost havoc and confusion. After about half an hour Captain Ayres threw ten or fifteen shot and shell from his battery into the same place. But both failed to elicit any reply. Men could be seen moving about the opposite slope, but the batteries were silent. An hour or so afterward we heard three or four heavy guns from Colonel Richardson's column at Bull's Run, and these were continued at intervals for two or three hours, but they were not answered, even by a single gun.

At half past 11 we heard Hunter's guns on the opposite height, over a mile to the right. He was answered by batteries there, and then followed the sharp, rattling volleys of musketry, as their infantry became engaged. The firing was now incessant. Hunter had come upon them suddenly, and formed his line of battle in an open field, at the right of the road. The enemy drew up to oppose him, but he speedily drove them to retreat and followed them up with the greatest vigor and rapidity. Meantime, for some three hours previous, we had seen long lines of dense dust rising from the roads leading from Manassas, and, with the glass, we could very clearly perceive that they were raised by the constant and steady stream of reinforcements, which continued to pour in nearly the whole day.

The Sixty-ninth, Seventy-ninth, Second, and Eighth New York—the First, Second, and Third Connecticut, and the Second Wisconsin were brought forward in advance of the wood and marched across the field to the right to go to Colonel Hunter's support. They crossed the intervening stream and drew up in a small open field, separated from Colonel Hunter's column by a dense wood, which was filled with batteries and infantry. Our guns continued to play upon the woods which then concealed the enemy, and aided materially in clearing them for the advance. Going down to the extreme front of the column, I could watch the progress of Colonel Hunter, marked by the constant roar of artillery and the roll of musketry as he pushed the rebels back from point to point. At 4 o'clock he had driven them out of the woods and across the road, which was the prolongation of that on which we stood. Here, by the side of their batteries, the rebels made a stand. They planted their fire directly in the road, and twice charged across it upon our men, but without moving them an inch. They were met by a destructive fire, and were compelled to fall still further back. Gradually the point of fire passed further away until the dense clouds of smoke which marked the progress of the conflict were at least half a mile to the left of what had been the centre position of the rebels.

It was now 2½ o'clock. I was at the advanced point of the front of our column, some hundred rods beyond the woods, in which the few troops then there were drawn up, when I decided to drive back to the town for the purpose of sending you my despatch. As I passed up the road the balls and shell from the enemy began to fall with more than usual rapidity. I did not see the point from which they came; but meeting Captain Ayres, he said he was about to bring up his battery, supported by the Ohio brigade, under General Schenck: to repel a rumored attempt of cavalry to outflank this column. As I went forward he passed down. General Schenck's Brigade was at once drawn up across the road, and Captain Ayres's guns were planted in a knoll at the left, when a powerful body of rebels, with a heavy battery, came down from the direction of Bull's Run and engaged this force with tremendous effect. I went to Centreville, sent off my despatch, and started with all speed to return—intending to go with our troops upon what had been the hotly contested field, never doubting for a moment that it would remain in their hands. I had gone but a quarter of a mile when we met a great number of fugitives, and our carriage soon became entangled in a mass of baggage-wagons, the officer in charge of which told me it was useless to go in that direction, as our troops were retreating. Not crediting the story, which was utterly inconsistent with what I had seen but a little while before, I continued to push on. I soon met Quarter-master Stetson, of the Fire Zouaves, who told me, bursting into tears, that his Regiment had been utterly cut to pieces, that the Colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel were both killed, and that our troops had actually been repulsed. I still tried to proceed, but the advancing columns rendered it impossible, and I turned about. Leaving my carriage, I went to a high point of ground and saw, by the dense cloud of dust which rose over each of the three roads by which the three columns of the army had advanced, that they were all on the retreat. Sharp discharges of cannon in their rear indicated that they were being pursued. I waited half an hour or so to observe the troops and batteries as they arrived, and then started for Washington, to send my dispatch and write this letter. As I came past the hill on which the Secessionists had their intrenchments less than a week ago, I saw our forces taking up positions for a defense if they should be assailed.

Such is a very rapid and general history of Sunday's engagement.

SECOND MISSISSIPPI REGIMENT (WILDCATS) PASSING ALONG MAIN STREET, WINCHESTER, ON THEIR WAY TO BUNKER HILL, VIRGINIA.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

CHAPTER LVII.

THE tidings of my high fortunes having had a heavy fall had got down to my native place and its neighborhood before I got there. I found the Blue Boar in possession of the intelligence, and I found that it made a great change in the Boar's demeanor. Whereas the Boar had cultivated my good opinion with warm assiduity when I was coming into prospects, the Boar was exceedingly cool on the subject now that I was going out of property.

It was evening when I arrived, much fatigued by the journey I had so often made so easily. The Boar could not put me into my usual bedroom, which was engaged (probably by some one who had expectations), and could only assign me a very indifferent chamber among the pigeons and post-chaises up the yard. But I had as sound a sleep in that lodging as in the most superior accommodation the Boar could have given me, and the quality of my dreams was about the same as in the best bedroom.

Early in the morning, while my breakfast was getting ready, I strolled round by Satis House. There were printed bills on the gate, and on bits of carpet hanging out of the windows, announcing a sale by auction of the Household Furniture and Effects next week. The house itself was to be sold as old building materials and pulled down. Lot 1 was marked in white chalk on knock-knee letters on the brew-house; Lot 2 on that part of the main building which had been so long shut up. Other lots were marked off on other parts of the structure, and the ivy had been torn down to make room for the inscriptions, and much of it trailed low in the dust and was withered already. Stepping in for a moment at the open gate, and looking around me with the uncomfortable air of a stranger who had no business there, I saw the auctioneer's clerk walking on the casks and telling them off for the information of a catalogue-compiler, pen in hand, who made a remark on each of the wheeled clans I had so often pushed along to the tune of Old Clem.

When I got back to my breakfast in the Boar's coffee-room I found Mr. Pumblechook conversing with the landlord. Mr. Pumblechook (not improved in appearance by his late nocturnal adventure) was waiting for me, and addressed me in the following terms:

"Sir, Sir, I am sorry to see you brought low. But what else could be expected! What else could be expected!"

As he avoided his hand with a magnificently forgiving air, and as I was broken by illness and unfit to quarrel, I took it.

"William," said Mr. Pumblechook to the waiter, "put a muffin on table. And has it come to this! Has it come to this!"

I frowningly sat down to my breakfast. Mr. Pumblechook stood over me and poured out my tea—before I could touch the tea-pot—with the air of a benefactor who was resolved to be true to the last.

"William," said Mr. Pumblechook, mournfully, "put the salt on. In happier times," addressing me, "I think you took sugar? And did you take milk? You did. Sugar and milk, William, brought to water-cress."

"Thank you," said I, shortly, "but I don't eat water-cresses."

"You don't eat 'em," returned Mr. Pumblechook, sighing and nodding his head several times, as if he might have expected that, and as if abstinence from water-cresses were consistent with my downfall. "True. The simple fruits of the earth. No. You needn't bring any, William."

I went on with my breakfast, and Mr. Pumblechook continued to stand over me, stirring fishily and admiring noisily, as he informed my dull,

"Little more than skin and bone!" mused Mr. Pumblechook, aloud. "And yet when he went away from here (I may say with my blessing), and I spread afore him my humble store, like the Boe, he was as plump as a Peach!"

This reminded me of the wonderful difference between the servile manner in which he had offered his hand in my new prosperity, saying, "May I?" and the ostentatious clemency with which he had just now exhibited the same fat five fingers.

"Hah!" he went on, handing me the bread-and-butter. "Did you a going to Joseph?"

"In Heaven's Name," said I, firing in spite of myself, "what does it matter to you whom I am going? Leave that tea-pot alone."

It was the worst course I could have taken, because it gave Pumblechook the opportunity he wanted.

"Yes, young man," said he, releasing the handle of the article in question, retiring a step or two from my table, and speaking for the benefit of the landlord and waiter at the door, "I will leave that tea-pot alone. You are right, young man. For once you are right. I forgit myself when I take such an interest in your breakfast as to wish your frame, exhausted by the debilitating effects of prodigerality, to be stimulated by the wholesome nourishment of your forefathers. And yet," said Pumblechook, turning to the landlord and waiter, and pointing me out at arm's length, "this is him as I ever spotted with in his days of happy infancy. Tell me not it can not be; I tell you this is him!"

A low murmur from the two replied. The waiter appeared to be particularly affected.

"This is him," said Pumblechook, "as I have rode in my shay-cart. This is him as I have seen brought up by hand. This is him unto the sister of which I was uncle by marriage, as her name was Georgiana M'ria from her own mother, let him deny it if he can!"

The waiter seemed convinced that I could not deny it, and that it gave the case a black look.

"Young man," said Pumblechook, screwing his head at me in the old fashion, "you are a going to Joseph. What does it matter to me you ask me, where you are a going? I say to you, Sir, you air a going to Joseph."

The waiter coughed, as if he modestly invited me to get over that.

"Now," said Pumblechook, and all this with a most exasperating air of saving in the cause of virtue what was perfectly convincing and conclusive, "I will tell you what to say to Joseph. Here is Squires of the Boar present, known and respected in this town, and here is William, which his father's name was Potkins if I do not deceive myself."

"You do not, Sir," said William.

"In their presence," pursued Pumblechook, "I will tell you, young man, what to say to Joseph. Says you, 'Joseph, I have this day seen my earliest benefactor and the founder of my fortun's.' I will name no names, Joseph, but so they are pleased to call him up town, and I have seen that man."

"I swear I don't see him here," said I.

"Say that likewise," retorted Pumblechook. "Say you said that, and even Joseph will probably betray surprise."

"There you quite mistake him," said I. "I know better."

"Says you," Pumblechook went on, "Joseph, I have seen that man, and that man bears you no malice and bears me no malice. He knows your character, Joseph, and is well acquainted with your pig-headedness and ignorance; and he knows my character, Joseph, and he knows my want of gratitcode. Yes, Joseph,' says you"—here Pumblechook shook his head and hand at me—"'he knows my total deficiency of common human gratitcode. He knows it, Joseph, as none can. You do not know it, Joseph, having no call to know it, but that man do.'"

Windy donkey as he was, it really amazed me that he could have the face to talk thus to mine.

"Says you, 'Joseph, he gave me a little message, which I will now repeat. It was, that in my being brought low, he saw the finger of Providence. He knowed that finger when he saw it, Joseph, and he saw it plain. It pinted out this writing, Joseph. Reward of ingratitcode to his earliest benefactor, and founder of fortun's. But that man said that he did not repent of what he had done, Joseph. Not at all. It was right to do it, it was kind to do it, it was benevolent to do it, and he would do it again.'"

"It's a pity," said I, scornfully, as I finished my interrupted breakfast, "that the man did not say what he had done and would do again."

"Squires of the Boar!" Pumblechook was now addressing the landlord, "and William! I have no objections to your mentioning, either up town or down town, if such should be your wishes, that it was right to do it, kind to do it, benevolent to do it, and that I would do it again."

With those words the Impostor shook them both by the hand, with an air, and left the house; leaving me much more astonished than delighted by the virtues of that same indefinite "it." I was not long after him in leaving the house too, and when I went down the High Street I saw him holding forth (no doubt to the same effect) at his shop door, to a select group, who honored me with very unfavorable glances as I passed on the opposite side of the way.

But it was only the pleasanter to turn to Biddy and to Joe, whose great forbearance shone more brightly than before, if that could be, contrasted with this brazen pretender. I went toward them slowly, for my limbs were weak, but with a sense of increasing relief as I drew nearer to them, and a sense of leaving arrogance and untruthfulness further and further behind.

The June weather was delicious. The sky was blue, the larks were soaring high over the green corn, I thought all that country-side more beautiful and peaceful by far than I had ever known it to be yet. Many pleasant pictures of the life that I would lead there, and of the change for the better that would come over my character when I had a guiding spirit at my side whose simple faith and clear home-wisdom I had proved, beguiled my way. They awakened a tender emotion in me, for my heart was softened by my return, and such a change had come to pass, that I felt like one who was toiling home barefoot from distant travel and whose wanderings had lasted many years.

The school-house where Biddy was mistress I had never seen, but the little roundabout lane by which I entered the village for quietness' sake took me past it. I was disappointed to find that the day was a holiday; no children were there, and Biddy's house was closed. Some hopeful notion of seeing her busily engaged in her daily duties, before she saw me, had been in my mind and was defeated.

But the forge was a very short distance off, and I went toward it under the sweet green limes, listening for the clink of Joe's hammer. Long after I ought to have heard it, and long after I had fancied I heard it and found it but a fancy, all was still. The limes were there, and the white thorns were there, and the chestnut-trees were there, and their leaves rustled harmoniously when I stopped to listen; but the clink of Joe's hammer was not in the mid-summer wind.

Almost fearing, without knowing why, to come in view of the forge, I saw it at last, and saw that it was closed. No glare of fire, no glittering shower of sparks, no roar of bellows; all shut up and still.

But the house was not deserted, and the best parlor seemed to be in use, for there were white curtains fluttering in its window, and the window was open and gay with flowers. I went softly toward it, meaning to peep over the flowers, when Joe and Biddy stood before me, arm in arm.

At first Biddy gave a cry, as if she thought it was my apparition, but in another moment she was in my embrace. I wept to see her, and she wept to see me; I, because she looked so fresh and pleasant; she, because I looked so worn and white.

"But dear Biddy, how smart you are!"

"Yes, dear Pip."

"And, how smart you are!"

"Yes, dear old Pip, old chap."

I looked at both of them, from one to the other, and then I said,

"Its my wedding-day," cried Biddy, in a burst of happiness, "and I am married to Joe!"

* * * * *

They had taken me into the kitchen, and I had lain my head down on the old deal table. Biddy held one of my hands to her lips, and Joe's rotoring touch was on my shoulder.

"Whichbe warn't strong enough, my dear, fur to be surprised," said Joe. "And Biddy said, 'I ought to have thought of it, dear Joe, but I was too happy.'" They were both so overjoyed to see me, so proud to see me, so touched by my coming to them, so delighted that I should have come by accident to make their day complete!

My first thought was one of great thankfulness that Heud never breathed this last baffled hope to Joe. How often, while he was with me in my illness, had it risen to my lips. How irrevocable would have been his knowledge of it, if he had remained with me but another hour!

"Dear Biddy," said I, "you have the best husband in the whole world, and if you could have seen him by my bed you would have—But no, you couldn't love him better than you do."

"No, I couldn't, indeed," said Biddy.

"And, dear Joe, you have the best wife in the whole world, and she will make you as happy as even you deserve to be, you dear, good, dear Joe!"

Joe looked at me with a quivering lip, and fairly put his sleeve before his eyes.

"And dear Biddy both, as you have been to church to-day, and are in charity and love with all mankind, receive my humble thanks for all you have done for me, and all I have so ill repaid! And when I say that I am going away within the hour, for I am soon going abroad, and that I shall never return, and that I have worked for the money with which you have kept me out of prison, and have sent it to you, don't think, dear Joe and Biddy both, that if I could repay it a thousand times over I suppose I could cancel a farthing of the debt I owe you, or that I would do so if I could!"

They were both melted by these words, and both entreated me to say no more.

"But I must say more. Dear Joe, I hope you will have children to love, and that some little fellow will sit in this chimney corner of a winter's night, who may remind you another little fellow gone out of it forever. Don't tell him, Joe, that I was thankless; don't tell him, Biddy, that I was ungenerous and unjust; only tell him that I honored you both, because you were both so good and true, and that, as your child, I said it would be natural to him to grow up a much better man than I did."

"I ain't a going," said Joe, from behind his sleeve, "to tell nothing nor nobody, no more, Pip. Nor Biddy ain't. Nor yet no one ain't."

"And now, though I know you have already done it in your unexpressed hearts, you will me, both, that you forgive me! Pray let me hear you say the words, that I may carry the sound of them away with me, and then I shall be able to believe that you can trust me, and think better of me, in the time to come!"

"Oh dear old Pip, old chap," said Joe. "God knows as I forgive you, if I have anything to forgive!"

"Amen! And God knows I do!" echoed Biddy.

"Now let me go up and look at my old little room, and rest there a few minutes by myself, and then when I have eaten and drunk with you, go with me as far as the finger-post, dear Joe and Biddy, before we say good-by!"

I sold all I had, and I put aside as much as I could, for a composition with my creditors—who gave me ample time to pay them in full—and I went out and joined Herbert. Within a month I had quitted England, and within two months I was clerk to Clarriker and Co., and within four months I assumed my first undivided responsibility. For the business across the parlor-ceiling at Mill Pond Bank had then ceased to tremble; the old Bill Barley's growls, and was at peace, and Herbert had gone away to marry Clara, and I was left in sole charge of the Eastern Branch until he brought her back.

Many a year went rounds before I was partner in the House; but I lived happily with Herbert and his wife, and lived frugally, and paid my debts, and maintained a constant correspondence with Biddy and Joe. I was not until I became third in the Firm that Clarriker betrayed me to Herbert; but he then declared that the secret of Herbert's partnership had been long enough upon his conscience, and he must tell it. So he told it, and Herbert was as much moved as amazed, and he and I were not the worse friends for the long concealment. I must say here it to be supposed that we were ever a great House, or that we made mints of money. We were not in a grand way of business, but we had a good name, and worked out our profits, and did very well. I owed so much to Herbert's ever-cheerful industry and readiness that I often wondered how I had conceived that old idea of his inventive faculties, until I was one day enlightened by the reflection that, perhaps, the inaptitude had never been in him at all, but had been in me.

CHAPTER LVIII.

FOR eleven years I had not seen Joe nor Biddy with my own eyes, though every day had both been often before my fancy in the East—when, upon an evening in December, an hour or two after dark, I laid my hand softly on the latch of the old kitchen door. I touched it so softly that I was not heard, and looked in unseen. There, sate the same old place by the same old kitchen fire-light—as hale and as strong as ever, though a little gray—sat Joe; and there, fenced into the corner with Joe's leg, and sharing my own little stool, looking at the fire, was—I again!

"We giv' him the name of Pip for your sake, dear old chap," said Joe, delighted with having another stool by the child's side (but I did not rumple his hair), "and we hoped he might grow a little like you, and we think he do."

I thought so too, and I took him out for a walk next morning, and we talked immensely, understanding one another to perfection. And I took him down to the church-yard, and set him on a certain tombstone there, and he showed me from that elevation which stone was sacred to the memory of Philip Pirrip, late of this Parish, and also Georgiana, Wife of the Above.

"Biddy," said I, when I talked with her after dinner, as her little girl lay sleeping in her lap, "you must give Pip to me, one of these days; or lend him, at all events."

"I SAW THE SHADOW [OF NO PARTING FROM HER."]

"No, no," said Biddy, gently. "You must marry."

"So Herbert and Clara say, but I don't think I shall, Biddy. I have so settled down in their home, that it's not at all likely. I am already quite an old bachelor."

Biddy looked down at her child, and put its little hand to her lips, and then put the good matronly hand with which she had touched it into mine. There was something in the action and in the light pressure of Biddy's wedding-ring that had a very pretty eloquence in it.

"Dear Pip," said Biddy, "you are sure you won't cry for her ?"

"Oh no—I think not, Biddy."

"Tell me, as an old, old friend. Have you quite forgotten her ?"

"My dear Biddy, I have forgotten nothing in my life that ever had a foremost place there, and little that ever had any place there. But that poor dream, as I once used to call it, has all gone by, Biddy, all gone by!"

Nevertheless, I knew while I said those words that I secretly intended to revisit the site of the old house that evening alone for her sake. Yes, even so. For Estella's sake.

I had been of late leading a most unhappy life, and as being separated from her husband, who had used her with great cruelty, and who had become quite unendurable as a compound of pride, avarice, brutality, and meanness. And I had heard of the death of her husband, from an accident consequent on his ill-treatment of a horse. This release had befallen her some two years before; for any thing I knew she was married again.

The early dinner-hour at Joe's left me abundance of time, without hurrying my talk with Biddy, to walk over the scene of my past before dark. But what with loitering on the way, to look at old objects and to think of old times, the day had quite declined when I came to the place.

There was no house now, no brewery, no building whatever left, but the wall of the old garden. The cleared space had been inclosed with a rough fence, and, looking over it, I saw that some of the old ivy had struck root anew, and was growth upon the low, quiet mounds of ruin. A gate in the fence standing ajar, I pushed it open and went in.

A cold, damp mist had veiled the afternoon, and the moon was not yet up to scatter it; but the stars were shining beyond the mist, and the moon was coming, and every thing was not dark. I could trace out where every part of the old house had been, and where the brewery had been, and where the gates, and where the casks. I had done so, and was looking along the desolate garden-walk, when I beheld a solitary figure in it.

The figure showed itself aware of me as I advanced. It had been moving toward me, but it stood still. As I drew near, I saw it to be the figure of a woman. As I drew nearer yet, it was about to turn away, when it stopped, and let me come up with it. Then it faltered, as if much surprised, and uttered my name, and I cried out,

"Estella !"

"I am greatly changed. I wonder you know me !"

The freshness of her beauty was indeed gone, but its indescribable majesty and its indescribable charm remained. Those attractions in it I had seen before; what I had never seen before was the saddened, softened light of the once proud eyes; what I had never felt before was the friendly touch of the once insensible hand.

We sat down on a bench that was near, and I said, "After so many years, it is strange that we should thus meet again, Estella, here where our first meeting was! Do you often come back?"

"I have never been here since."

"Nor I."

The moon began to rise, and I thought of the placid look at the white ceiling, which had passed away. The moon began to rise, and I thought of the pressure on my hand when I had spoken the last words he had heard on earth.

Estella was the next to break the silence that ensued between us.

"I have very often hoped and intended to come back, and have been prevented by many circumstances. Poor, poor old place !"

The tone in which she was touched with the first rays of the moonlight, and the same rays touched the tears that dropped from her eyes. Now knowing that I saw them, and setting herself to get the better of them, she said, quietly,

"We are wonderfully, as you wished adong, how it came to be left in this condition ?"

"Yes, Estella."

"The property belongs to me. It is the only possession I have not relinquished. Every thing else has gone from me, little by little, but I have kept this. It was the subject of the only dream I had resistance I made in all the wretched years."

"Is it to be built on ?"

"At last, it is. I came here to take leave of it before its change. And you," she said, in a voice of touching interest to a wanderer, "you live abroad still ?"

"Still."

"And do well, I am sure ?"

"I work pretty hard for a sufficient living, and therefore—Yes, I do well."

"I have often thought of you," said Estella.

"Have you ?"

"Of late, very often. There was a long hard time when I kept far from me the remembrance of what I had thrown away when I was quite ignorant of its worth. But since my duty has not been incompatible with the admission of that remembrance, I have given it a place in my heart."

"You have always held your place in my heart," I answered. And we were silent again, until she spoke.

"I little thought," said Estella, "that I should take leave of you in taking leave of this spot. I am very glad to do so."

"Glad to part again, Estella? To me, parting is a painful thing. To me, the remembrance of our last parting has been ever mournful and painful."

"But you said to me," returned Estella, very earnestly, "'God bless you, God forgive you!' And if you could say that to me then, you will not hesitate to say it to me now—now, when suffering has been stronger than all other teaching, and has taught me to understand what your heart used to be. I have been bent and broken, but—I hope—into a better shape. Be assiderate and good to me as you were, and tell me we are friends."

"We are friends," said I, rising and bending over her, as she rose from the bench.

"And will continue friends apart," said Estella.

I took her hand in mine, and we went out of the ruined place; and as the moonraying mists had risen long ago when I first left the forge, so the evening mists were rising now, and in all the broad expanse of tranquil light they shed over it to me, I saw the shadow of no parting from her.

THE END.

CONCERNING FIRE-ARMS.

THE existence of the present warlike condition of affairs in this country will naturally turn the attention of all classes of people to the instruments with which the question at issue is to be solved. A peaceful nation like the American is better acquainted with the manufacture and uses of the plow, the spade, and the pruning-hook than with those deadly weapons of war which we have now to weld and to wield. Very few know any thing about guns, and a few words will be all that will appear to converse about these, if not to bear them, some description of those which may probably be brought into service during the present war will not be inappropriate or unineresting.

REVOLVING PISTOLS.

Colt's revolving pistols have become so universally known of late years that a description of their mechanism is superfluous; who are pistols are used they will be the regulation arm. At present it is almost impossible to purchase them at any price, the single pistols, the army pattern selling for $27. Another very good revolving pistol is North's patent, made by the Savage Revolving Fire-Arm Co., of Middletown, Connecticut, they are sold for $20, army size. A new modification of the pistol, called the "Young America," consists of an arrangement by which, with a single hand, you are enabled to obtain two discharges, the barrel having two separate loads, each charge being controlled by a separate lever and cock. The pistol is very small, and an extremely effective little weapon.

OLD STYLE OF MUSKETS.

Until the year 1855 the regulation arm for United States Infantry was the smooth-bored musket, probably as inefficient a weapon as could be devised. The smooth barrel, highly polished, being absolutely impossible to sight over with any degree of accuracy, while its carrying power was by no means great. Since 1855 these arms have been rifled, and patent sights attached, making them at present very effective; they carry the Minié bullet. Now there are two points with regard to which people have very various ideas, and one of these is concerning rifles. And in order to instruct a great mass of individuals who would be ashamed to confess their ignorance, and equally unwilling to have how many shared it, we will give a simple an idea of the process of rifling as possible.

RIFLING GUN-BARRELS.

To rifle a gun-barrel from four to six grooves are cut upon the interior of the barrel, extending longitudinally through from end to end. These grooves are in depth about equal to the thickness of the paper-wall. Commencing parallel to each other, they presently take what is termed the gaining twist, and run spirally, till holding their relative position, to the muzzle. Thus a succession of threads like a screw are formed, around which the ball is forced, and by reason of its spiral motion is of course propelled both with greater accuracy and greater force, and these last are the advantages of rifling a gun-barrel.

THE MINIÉ BALL.

Next to describe the Minié ball—so called, though we have reason to believe the principle on which it is made was first discovered by N. Greener, gun-maker, of Birmingham, England, and afterward appropriated by M. Minié. The Minié bullet is a cone, hollowed at the base to the depth of about one-third of the length of the bullet; the cartridge is fastened to the base of the bullet, the whole inclosed in a paper cover, and is then placed in the barrel and rammed home. When the powder explodes it fills up the cavity in the bullet, expands the lead, and drives it into the grooves of the rifle, filling them completely airtight. The bullet being pressed, it slips along the grooves without sticking, otherwise the gun becomes loaded. This principle overcomes the windage, and avoids the necessity for forcing a large bullet into a small bore, which frequently resulted in bursting guns.

SHARPE'S RIFLES.

Another weapon, which has obtained considerable notoriety and reputation since the Kansas troubles, and will probably be brought into service during the present war, is the Sharpe's rifle. The peculiarity of this arm is that it is breech-loaded by means of appropriate mechanism, the end of the barrel in the stock slides down, leaving a barrel entirely open. The prepared cartridge is built un inserted, the slide returned, and the loading is completed. Of course the operation is very much simplified and facilitated; but some objectionable features present themselves in the fact that the separation of the barrel permits the escape of gas when the explosion takes place; that the mechanism is liable to derangement, the barrel requiring frequently to be cleaned; and finally, that the gun is more expensive than others which are more reliable. This gun costs about $45 with sabre-bayonet, which will be described elsewhere.

ARMY MUSKETS.

Of the army musket (rifled) of 1855, with clasp bayonet, there can be manufactured at Springfield from 1800 to 2000 per month; about 35,000 have already been turned out from that place, half of which are in the possession of the Confederate States. The 11th, 13th, and 71st Regiments N. Y. S. M. are furnished with this arm, which can be supplied by the quantity at about $22 50 each. The Minié rifle, with sabre bayonet, costs $30.

ENFIELD RIFLES.

The Enfield rifle is so called from the place where these arms are manufactured. It differs from the Minié rifle in the reduction of the bore and in weight—the former weighing 10½ pounds, the former 9 pounds. With these exceptions they are similarly constructed. The Enfield manufactory turns out about 1100 rifles of arms, employing 1300 men. The Enfield rifle costs $30.

We have mentioned all the guns likely to be brought into use in this war, and will devote a few lines to some description of the bowie-knife and sabre bayonet.

BOWIE-KNIVES.

The bowie-knife is usually from ten to fifteen inches in length, with a black shoot two inches wide. It is said to owe its invention to an accident which occurred to Colonel Bowie during a battle with the Mexicans; he broke his sword some fifteen inches from the hilt, and afterward used the weapon thus formed as a kind of hand-to-hand fights. This is a most formidable weapon, and is commonly in use in the West and Southwest.

SABRE BAYONETS.

The sabre bayonet was originally used by the French during the Revolution of 1798, but was afterward discarded; it has since been adopted by Prussia, Russia, and is used also by the German Jagers and the Zouaves; with us it is usually attached to the Minié and Sharpe's rifle, in lieu of the ordinary bayonet. In size it is similar to the artillery sword, being about eighteen inches long, with a cross hilt; it is, however, curted at the point like a cimeter, being slightly of a second curve, a few inches below, gives it a resemblance to a Malay creese. By an opening in the hilt it is fixed on the muzzle of the rifle, and by means of a spring attaches itself firmly to the barrel. When not in use it is carried in a sheath by the side. In Algiers and in Mexico it was used for cutting away brush and underwood, to facilitate the passage of artillery, or for other purposes.

We have thus described to the principal small-arms in common use which possess a history, or with whose construction the public may be supposed not to be familiar, we will therefore proceed to note the results of the investigations we have made into the subject of Ordnance.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF ORDNANCE.

Artillery—or, as it is usually termed, Ordnance—is divided into two classes, which into two classes. 1st, Siege Artillery, employed for attack and defense of fortified places, ships of war, etc.; and, 2d, Field Artillery, used in battle, or in the field operations of armies.

SIEGE ARTILLERY.

Siege Artillery is composed of mortars, large howitzers, Paixhan guns, or Columbiads, and all cannon of a large caliber. In our service this class of ordnance includes 12, 18, 24, 32, and 42-pounder guns; 8, 10, and 13-inch mortars; 24-pound Carronades; and 8, 10, and 13-inch howitzers. All these, except the smaller mortars, are made of cast iron.

MORTARS.

Mortars are usually stationary, and are used for throwing iron shells filled with powder, and ignited by a fuse; in this they produce great destruction. They are effective at distances of from one to three miles.

HOWITZERS.

The howitzer is a short, wide-mouthed piece of ordnance, calculated for throwing shells or balls, as may be desired, and discharged by means of a fuse. The caliber is much greater than that of cannon, though not so great as mortars; it is very effective in siege and in resisting cavalry, as it can be charged to throw canister or other projectiles, and is easily transported; only the larger size come under the head of siege-guns. The howitzer, or coehorn-mortar, was first introduced into the French service in 1824.

PAIXHAN GUNS.

Paixhan guns were invented by Colonel Bomford, of the United States Army; but being introduced into the French service by General Paixhan, they received his name, although he had nothing to do with their inventing; however, he afterward improved upon them. They were first used in the war of 1812, and attracted universal notice. These guns are of enormous caliber, having a calibre of 8, 10, and 12 inches. They are made with great thickness at the breech, to enable them to withstand a large charge of powder and heavy ball. The largest of these guns, the 13-inch, loads with twelve pounds of powder, and carries a hollow shot weighing 112 pounds; its extreme range is 1350 yards. The 8-inch gun carries a solid shot of 68 pounds, at an elevation of 15 degrees, 2750 yards. The Paixhan guns are used with traversing beds; they are thus driven up an inclined railway, with from 3 to 4 degrees elevation, after each discharge. The effects of these heavy guns is in fracturing and splintering, dismounting guns, etc.; their range is usually not great. Captain Dahlgren, in his improvements of heavy ordnance, has carried still farther the principle involved in the Paixhan gun—that of strengthening the breech. His guns are now universally used on our ships of war, and his theories have been recognized in Europe as a great improvement in artillery manufacture.

COLUMBIADS.

Perhaps the gun most commonly named at the present time is the Columbiad, and yet the public is extremely ignorant as to its peculiarities. The Columbiad is of the class called Sea-coast Cannon, and combines in itself the qualities of the gun, howitzer, and mortar; in other words, it is a long-chambered piece of ordnance, having the capacity to project shot or shell, with heavy charges of powder, at high angles of elevation. It is, in fact, the Paixhan gun invented by Colonel Bomford, and which we have already mentioned. In 1844 the model of the Columbiad was changed, by lengthening the bore and increasing the weight of metal, to enable it to endure an increased charge of powder, or to smash the weight of the solid shot. Thus altered, they were found defective in strength, and in 1858 were degraded to the rank of shell guns, with diminished charges of powder. Their place has been supplied by a new model, having no base-ring nor swell of the muzzle. The 8-inch carries a 10-pound ball; the 10-inch carries a 16-pound ball.

CARRONADES.

Carronades derive their name from the Carron Foundery, in Scotland, where they were first cast in 1779; they are short, light, iron guns, differing from cannon and howitzers in having no trunnions, being fastened to their carriages by a loop underneath. They are chiefly used for arming ships, and enable vessels to throw heavy shot at close quarters without overloading their decks with heavy guns. On shore, Carronades are used in the same manner and for the same purposes as howitzers. [Field Artillery will be given in a future Number.]

Harper's Weekly is, moreover, in daily receipt of valuable sketches from Volunteer correspondents in the Army and Navy in all parts of the country. The Publishers will be glad to receive such sketches from members of our forces in every section, and will pay liberally for such as they may use.

The Publishers will send Harper's Weekly free to any Regiment or Ship of War which may supply them with the name and address of the officer to whom it should be forwarded.

The circulation of Harper's Weekly is over One Hundred Thousand Copies.

They have already published, since the Election, over three hundred portraits of the Southern Rebellion, and they feel confident that the pages of Harper's Weekly will present a complete and authentic ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE WAR. No person who wishes to be informed with regard to the momentous events which are transpiring can afford to dispense with it.

Notwithstanding the great amount of space devoted to illustrations of the War, Harper's Weekly continues to publish Mr. DICKENS'S New Story, "Great Expectations," which is pronounced the most successful of his admirable works. It will be concluded early in August by a New SERIAL TALE, by Sir EDWARD LYTTON BULWER, entitled which will be continued from week to week till completed.

Lloyd's Military Map
of the
Southern States
Of North America, and Gazetteer of Southern Country.
(For the Use of the War Department.)

SHOWING THE ENTIRE SOUTH, FROM MASON & DIXON'S LINE TO THE HEART OF MEXICO.

Drawn from actual Surveys, showing every Sea of the Southern Country from Delaware to the banks of the Rio del Norte, Mexico. Every County and County Seat, Town, Village, Fort, Navy-Yard, River, and Towns and Landings on the Rivers, Lake, Swamp, and Mountain, is marked down. Every Railroad completed up to 6th day of July, 1861, and all those projected, are exhibited on this Map; every Station, and the distance from Station to Station is marked distinctly. More than 3000 towns on the Mississippi, Red, Arkansas, and Ohio Rivers, are laid down on this Map. All the information in the Departments at Washington City, in regard to the last Coast Surveys, were used in perfecting this Map; every inlet and creek is shown. The Forts and Arsenals are all laid down on Lloyd's Map correctly, from official documents in the War Department.

The Gazetteer of the Southern States, Cities, Villages, Mountains, and Rivers, giving a correct sketch of each village, where and how situated, its population, military strength, all from the last census, is alone worth ten times the price of the Map, and is printed on the back of the large sheet Map without extra cost. This matter which we give to the public on the back of this Map, is equal to an octavo book of 300 pages, information that would alone cost $10. All for 50 cents. Map included; three copies for One Dollar; or by the hundred copies at one half of the retail price.

Lloyd's Military Map

is acknowledged by Civil Engineers to be the best drawn and most accurate of any Map ever offered to the public before. The surveys for this Map were made by Civil Engineers of the Southern States; and the information of the Railroads, Stations, and Distances were furnished by Southern Railroad men themselves, and can be relied on as correct. In fact, this is the only correct Map of the Southern Country ever drawn. The people of the Northern States can see correctly, at a glance, the preponderance of the Southern Country over the Northern and Western States, and will more fully comprehend the reason of the Southern States uniting, by glancing with eye at the rich plains of Mexico, which are exhibited on this Map.

Lloyd's Military Map is the only Map in America that shows Vienna, Newport News, Pig's Point, Matthias Point, Bull's Run, Hark Mountain, Beverly, Newport News, Munson's Junction, Fortress Monroe, and every other place of interest in the Fifteen Southern States.

☞ The public will please understand that this Map was not rushed out for the purpose of supplying the people with an imperfect Map during the present excitement, but has been under way for more than one year, and is now ready for the public, after a large outlay in money for surveying, drawing, and engraving, and is believed to be the only reliable and full Map of the whole Southern country ever issued.

Can be sent by mail any where in America. Agents can sell 50 copies per day. Send Money for Sample Map and Private Circular. No Postage-stamps taken. The Postage on the Sheet Edition is only One Cent per Copy to any part of the country. Can be rolled and folded without injury.

The Mounted Edition will have to be sent by Express. Agents supplied at the following rates:—Three Copies for $1; or, per Dozen, Sheet Edition, $3 60. Cloth Pocket Edition, at $7 20. Mounted Edition, at $18. Terms—CASH.

Single Copies are sold at retail price. Registered letters only are at our risk.

☞ Nearly ever body in America has bought Lloyd's Railroad Map, and this is the strongest cold-me-that I could offer that my Southern Military Map is the best Map ever drawn and engraved in America.

Edw'd B. Bulwer Lytton

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON.

On the occasion of the commencement of Sir E. B. LYTTON's new tale "A STRANGE STORY," we publish herewith a portrait of the famous novelist. He was born about 1806, in Herefordshire, England; his father was General Bulwer, a distinguished officer, who left a fortune to his son. Young Bulwer's first published work was a volume of verse, which fell dead. In 1827 he published his first novel, "Falkland," which had but slender success. But next year "Pelham" appeared, and at once established the rank of its author. The "Disowned," "Devereux," "Paul Clifford," "Eugene Aram," followed in rapid succession, and were all popular. We can not enumerate the long list of novels which this fertile author gave to the world between 1830 and 1845; all are still read, though they are far from comparing with the master-pieces which succeeded them. In 1845 Bulwer struck a new vein in the "CAXTONS." This admirable work was open to none of the criticisms which had assailed its predecessors; it went home to the heart of every man, woman, and child, and endeared its author to the Christian world. It was followed in the same vein by "My Novel" and "What will he do with it?" the latter of which was introduced to the American public in the pages of this journal.

Sir E. Bulwer Lytton is not only a novelist of the first rank; he has achieved remarkable success as a dramatist and as a politician. He held office under Lord Derby, and is one of the most distinguished orators in Parliament. His career shows that even wealth and high birth do not always stifle genius.

We subjoin the following extracts:

> Who is there uniting in one person the imagination, the genius, the humor, the energy, the knowledge of the heart, the artist-like eye, the originality, the fancy, and the learning of Edward Lytton Bulwer? In a word, who is profundity and a Gothic massiveness of thought—in style?—in a calm certainty and definiteness of purpose—in industry—and, above all, in the power of controlling and regulating by volition his illimitable faculties of mind, he is unequaled—he is unapproached.—EDGAR A. POE.

> To Bulwer, the author of "Pelham," "The Caxtons," and "My Novel," we assign the highest place among western writers of fiction. There is always power in the creations of his fancy; he is always polished, witty, learned. Since the days of Scott were ended, there is, in our appreciation, no pinnacle so high as that on which we hang our wreath to Bulwer: like the Roman emperor, a prince among his equals, the first of his rank.—Blackwood's Mag.

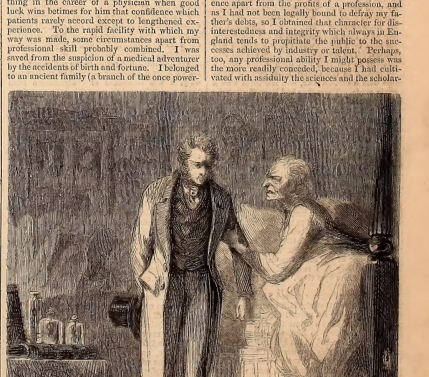
CHAPTER I.

In the year 18— I settled as a physician at one of the wealthiest of our great English towns, which I will designate by the initial L——. I was yet young, but I had acquired some reputation by a professional work which is, I believe, still among the received authorities on the subject of which it treats. I had studied at Edinburgh and at Paris, and had borne away from both those illustrious schools of medicine whatever guarantees for future distinction the praise of professors may concede to the ambition of students. On becoming a member of the College of Physicians, I made a tour of the principal cities of Europe, taking letters of introduction to eminent medical men; and, gathering from many theories and modes of treatment hints to enlarge the foundations of unprejudiced and comprehensive practice, I had resolved to fix my ultimate residence in London. But before this preparatory tour was completed my resolve was changed by one of those unexpected events which determine the fate man in vain would work out for himself. In passing through the Tyrol, on my way into the north of Italy, I found in a small inn, remote from medical attendance, an English traveler—seized with acute inflammation of the lungs, and in a state of imminent danger. I devoted myself to him night and day, and, perhaps more through careful nursing than active remedies, I had the happiness to effect his complete recovery. The traveler proved to be Julius Faber, a physician of great distinction—contented to remain, where he was born, in the provincial city of L——, but whose reputation as a profound and original pathologist was widely spread, and whose writings had formed no unimportant part of my special studies. It was during a short holiday excursion, from which he was about to return with renovated vigor, that he had been thus stricken down. The patient so accidentally met with became the founder of my professional fortunes. He conceived a warm attachment for me; perhaps the more affectionate because he was a childless bachelor, and not one of the nephews who would succeed to his wealth evinced any desire to succeed to the toils by which the wealth had been acquired. Thus, having heirs for the one, he had long looked about for an heir to the other, and now resolved on finding that heir in me. So when we parted Dr. Faber made me promise to correspond with him regularly, and it was not long before he disclosed by letter the plans he had formed in my favor. He said that he was growing old; his practice was beyond his strength; he needed a partner; he was not disposed to put up to sale the health of patients whom he had learned to regard as his children. Money was no object to him; but it was an object close at his heart that the humanity he had served and the reputation he had gained should suffer no loss in his choice of a successor. In fine, he proposed that I should at once come to L—— as his partner, with the view of succeeding to his entire practice at the end of two years, when it was his intention to retire.

The opening into fortune thus afforded to me was one that rarely presents itself to a young man entering upon an overcrowded profession. And to an aspirant less allured by the desire of fortune than the hope of distinction, the fame of the physician who thus generously offered to me the inestimable benefits of his long experience, and his cordial introduction, was in itself an assurance that a metropolitan practice is no sine qud non to the sure if slow building up of a national renown.

I went, then, to L——, and before the two years of my partnership had expired, my success justified my kind friend's selection, and far more than realized my own expectations. I was fortunate in effecting some notable cures in the earliest cases submitted to me, and it is every thing in the career of a physician when good luck wins betimes for him that confidence which patients rarely accord except to lengthened experience. To the rapid facility with which my way was made, some circumstances apart from professional skill probably combined. I was saved from the suspicion of a medical adventurer by the accidents of birth and fortune. I belonged to an ancient family (a branch of the once powerful border clan of the Fenwicks), that had for many generations held a fair estate in the neighborhood of Windermere. As an only son I had succeeded to that estate on attaining my majority, and had sold it to pay off the debts which had been made by my father, who had the costly tastes of an antiquarian and collector. The residue on the sale insured me a modest independence apart from the profits of a profession, and as I had not been legally bound to defray my father's debts, so I obtained that character for disinterestedness and integrity which always in England tends to propitiate the public to the successes achieved by industry or talent. Perhaps, too, any professional ability I might possess was the more readily conceded, because I had cultivated with assiduity the sciences and the scholarship which are collaterally connected with the study of medicine. Thus, in a word, I established a social position which came in aid of my professional repute, and silenced much of that envy which usually imbitters and sometimes impedes success.

"CLOSE WHERE I STOOD FAWNED THE OPEN JAWS OF THE FELL ANACONDA," ETC.



"SUDDENLY I FELT MY ARM GRASPED," ETC.

Dr. Faber retired at the end of the two years agreed upon. He went abroad, and being, though advanced in years, of a frame still robust, and habits of mind still inquiring and eager, he commenced a lengthened course of design travel, during which our correspondence, at first frequent, gradually languished, and finally died away.

I succeeded at once to the larger part of the practice which the labors of half a century had secured to my predecessor. My chief rival was Dr. Lloyd, a benevolent, fervid man, not without genius—if genius be present where judgment is absent; not without science, if that may be science which falls in precipices. One of those clever desultory men who, in adopting a profession, do not give up to it the whole heart and head of their hands. Men of that kind habitually accept a mechanical routine, because in the exercise of their ostensible calling their imaginative faculties are drawn away to pursuits more alluring. Therefore, in their proper vocation they are seldom bold or inventive—out of it they are sometimes bold to excess. And when they do take up a novelty in their profession they cherish it with an obstinate tenacity, and an extravagant passion, unknown to those philosophers who take up novelties every day, examine them with the sobriety of practiced eyes, try to form altogether, neither for or accept in whole, according as indgctive experiment supports or destroys conjecture.

Dr. Lloyd had been esteemed a learned naturalist long before he was admitted to be a tolerable physician. Amidst the privations of his youth he contrived to form, and when a struggling succeeding year he had perseveringly increased, a zoological collection of creatures, not alive, but, happily for the beholder, stuffed and embalmed. From what I have said it will be truly inferred that Dr. Lloyd's earlier career as a physician had not been brilliant; but for many years he had gradually rather aged than worked himself into that professional authority and station which now confers on a thoroughly reputable man, whom no one is disposed to envy and all are disposed to like.

Now in Lwere there were two distinct social circles: that of the wealthy merchants and traders, and that of a few privileged families inhabiting a part of the town aloof from the hum of commerce, and called the Abbey Hill. These superb Areopagites exercised over the wives and daughters of the inferior citizens a power which for believe me in error? Still you knew that my object was research into truth. You employed against your brother in art venomous drugs and a poisoned probe. Look at me! Are you satisfied with your work?"

I sought to draw back and pluck my arm from the dying man's grasp. I could not do so without using a force that would have been inhuman. His lips drew nearer still to my ear.

"Vain pretender, do not boast that you brought a genius for epigram to the service of science. Science is lenient to all who offer experiment as the test of conjecture. You are of the stuff of which inquisitors are made. You cry that truth is profaned when your dogmas are questioned. In your shallow presumption you have meted the dominions of nature, and where your eye halts its vision, you say, 'There, nature must close;' in the bigotry which adds crime to presumption, you would punish the children even in annexing new realms to her chart, unsettles your arbitrary landmarks. Verily, retribution shall avenge. In the future time which your sight has disdained to explore you shall yourself be a lost and bewildered straggler. Hist! I see them advancing! The gibbering phantoms are gathering round you!

The man's voice stopped abruptly; his eye fixed in a glassy stare; his head relaxed its hold; he fell back on his pillow. I stole from the room, on the landing-place I met the nurse and the old woman servant. In the study the children were not there. But I heard the wail of the female child from some room not far distant.

I whispered briefly to the nurse, "All is over!"—passed again under the jaws of the vast anaconda—and on through the blind lane between the high walls—on through the ghastly streets, under the ghastly moon—went back to my solitary home.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1861.

THE LESSON OF DEFEAT.

IF we are true to ourselves, the disaster of 21st July will prove a benefit rather than an injury. The Great Bethel blunder taught us the folly of going to battle under civilian leadership; the Bull Run tragedy is fraught with many valuable lessons.

It will teach us, in the first place, and not only us, but those also who have in charge the national interests at this crisis, that this war must be prosecuted on scientific principles, and that popular clamor must not be suffered to override the dictates of experience and the rules of strategy. It will teach, as actual evidence to prove that the march to Bull Run, and the fight there, were both undertaken against the judgment of LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SCOTT, and only in deference to the popular craving for action which owed its origin and main virulence to the New York Tribune. The wretched result must serve as a warning for the future. Hereafter our generals must not be hurried into premature demonstrations. If any portion of the press should attempt hereafter to goad them into acting in opposition to their judgment, public sentiment must rebuke the mischievous endeavor, and our officers and the Government must withstand it resolutely. No doubt, in the course of the next few weeks or months, it will often appear that our armies are sluggish, and their action dilatory. We must remember, when this occurs, that there may be reasons for delay which the public can not discern. We must, in such cases, remind each other of the fatal tragedy of July, and thank God that we can trust implicitly in ABRAHAM LINCOLN and WINFIELD SCOTT.

Again. The detailed accounts of the retreat from Bull Run prove that a very large proportion of our militia officers failed in their duty on that occasion. Some displayed cowardice, others incapacity. This is no matter of surprise. In selecting officers for our field offices, our militiamen often attach more weight to wealth and political or social influence than to bravery or military aptitude. Very many commissions are won by intrigue. Under these circumstances it was natural that, in the hour of danger, the officers who owed their epaulets to wealth, party, or social influence, or to intrigue, should have failed to develop the coolness, courage, and command over their men which soldiers look for in their leaders. It was to be expected that they would neither lead, nor check a panic. This radical flaw in our military system must now be corrected. Great Bethel emancipated us from the militia-man, from the mischief of civilian brigadiers. Bull Run must rid us of cowardly or imbecile colonels, majors, and captains. The Government hereafter the War Department will exercise the right of reviewing the elections of field officers in each regiment. We trust that no scruple of delicacy or timidity will interfere with the vigorous execution of this rule. It should be extended to captains of companies also. Better offend a thousand ambitious gandidates for military rank than have another flight led by colonels, majors, and captains. And there will be great need of the pruning-knife. By means best known to themselves most militia men are even now obtaining commissions in regiments fitted out here. Intrigue, money, family connections, and all kinds of improper influences are officering our new regiments. By the memory of Bull Run we adjure the War Department and the commanding general to subject all these officers to a thorough test, and to reject the unsuitable without hesitation. We have plenty of bravery and plenty of military talent in the country; for Heaven's sake let some one see that it is used in the right place.

Let no man be disheartened by the Bull Run disaster. We were beaten, it is true. But we were beaten by an enemy twice as strong as we were. They fought in intrenchments admirably constructed—we pressed our way up to the muzzles of their guns, in total ignorance of the topography of the battle-field. Wherever our soldiers met theirs in fair fight, they beat them. They had been drilling and preparing for the fight for half a year at least: our men were raw levies. And if the battle has proved that with these disadvantages we could not contend against them, it has also proved that our troops possess more personal bravery than theirs, and that our people—whom the defeat has only served to fresh exertions—have the right stuff in them.

"With our light, success is a duty!" Let this be our watch-word. We have every thing in our favor at this time but the experience, complete command of the sea, all the industrial capacity of the country, unrestricted communication with the foreign world, all the money we need, and, best of all, a just cause.

CABINET CHANGES.

SEVERAL journals, in the heat of indignation at the Bull Run defeat, have called for changes in the Cabinet. We think a mistake will be made. That certain Secretaries have displayed a want of energy, while others have devoted more time and thought than was decent to selecting contracts for political friends, is probably true enough. But it is no time to punish them when the Gaul is at the gates. We must first repel the enemy—and we shall have ample time to settle with unfaithful servants at home. Any change in the Cabinet just now would have the same moral effect. The soldiers and at home, as a defeat, and lead to the abstraction for which the rebels taunt them for fighting is nothing less than the system which secures each one of those citizens his life.

Granting the rebels, then, an equal faith with ourselves in the justice of their cause, which side is likely to prevail? Which will stand upon slavery and cotton, the first of which war makes a deadly danger, and the second is useless if it can not be sold; or we, who, fighting for a land upon slavery, who are a people of every pursuit, with a soil producing every crop, who have the tradition and possession of the government, the course of civilization, and the sympathy of mankind?

THE WAY TO PEACE.

A BALTIMORE gentleman, who believes in Mr. Jefferson Davis and disbelieves in the Government of the United States, is said to have asked whether, after another victory or two we might not hope for peace. He meant, whether the country at large would not then assent to Mr. Davis's Constitution as the law of the land.

But how should we have peace from that assent? Suppose his Constitution accepted by a majority of the States even, how enforced upon the others? And then? How do you hope for peace from it? The Davis Constitution is a revival of the old Confederation. It is a league among States, not a government of the people, and each State is to decide for itself when it will leave the league. That is the fundamental principle of this rebellion. A revolution proceeds upon causes which are cited to justify it to God and men. But the principle of "the Confederacy" is, as Mr. Davis plainly said at Indianapolis last February, the free-love principle. When a State is tired it goes off. Its whim is the constitutional and legal right.

Does any Baltimore gentleman think that this is the road to peace?

Probably not. But he may say that he supposes that, after a battle or two more lost by us, we shall be willing to seek peace by assenting to the separation of the States.

Mr. Everett answers this question on the Fourth of July as it had been often enough answered before. Of course not. "It is in its very nature a perpetual cause of hostility..... If, for the frivolous reasons assigned, the seceding States were thrown back into the gulf, while all the peaceful temperaments and constitutional remedies of the Union were within their reach, and offers of further compromise and constitutional guarantees readily tendered them, what hope, what possibility of peace can there be when the Union is broken up; when, in addition to all other sources of deadly quarrel, a general exodus of the slave population begins (as, beyond all question, it will), and nothing but war remains for the settlement of controversies? The Vice-President of the new Confederacy states that it rests on slavery; but from its very nature it must rest equally on war—eternal war, first between North and South, and then between some of the sundered fragments into which some of the disintegrated parts may crumble."

Is this the way to peace? Any Baltimore gentleman can see as plainly as any patriot in the country, that even if peace were made upon such terms, the army which we have now in the field could not be reduced by a single soldier.

There is but one way to peace in this emergency, and that is to establish the national supremacy a hundredfold stronger than ever before. Understand that such news affect you disagreeably; but you must remember that war is a new thing to you, especially to some of your officers in command: and this, also, that it always must take the lives of a good many men to acquire experience in warfare. There is a rather cruel proverb in French which is in great favor with military men: it is: Pour lire un omelette, il faut d'abord casser des œufs.

BOTH SIDES.

THE men at the South who are trying to destroy the government, and the men at the North who are trying to save it, can not contemplate the day at Bull Run without deep reflection. The time for passion and rhetoric and surprise has passed. The issue is made up before the world. War arms is no mole country. The combatants are ourselves. The struggle is for free constitutional government. Shall it be lost, or maintained?

Now the particular lesson that the friends of a free government in this country have learned is this: that its enemies are resolutely prepared to dispute the point in the way most favorable to themselves. They are under the military command of an engineer whom the Government educated and who bore off the honors of his class. The system of defense he adopts is the one most suitable to the country in which he is placed, and to the habits and character of the people he commands. These people are as profoundly ignorant of their fellow-citizens on the side of the Potomac as they are of the Chinese. They believe that they are defending all that is dearest and most sacred from the violating hands of barbarian hordes. And this ignorance is deepened by the artful falsehoods of JEFFERSON DAVIS, Benjamin, and the other rebel chiefs. For the war they have commenced they have plenty of artillery and ammunition. They mean to fight desperately behind their works, but not outside of them, and they will try to prolong the war long enough for foreign powers to have an excuse to interfere.

This is what we have learned; and what have we taught them?

We have taught them that the great mass of the people of this country, free, intelligent, and comfortable, do not mean to have the government which secures them every blessing ruined without shedding the last drop of blood in its defense. The people whom the conspirators thought to be cowards have proved themselves to be cool and terrible soldiers. The appalling result threatens the rebellion even from the field at Bull Run that the loyal people of this country are just as fearfully in earnest as the rebels; and that "the abstraction" for

We have taught them that the great mass of the people of this country, free, intelligent, and comfortable, do not mean to have the government which secures them every blessing ruined without shedding the last drop of blood in its defense. The people whom the conspirators thought to be cowards have proved themselves to be cool and terrible soldiers. The appalling result threatens the rebellion even from the field at Bull Run that the loyal people of this country are just as fearfully in earnest as the rebels; and that "the abstraction" for which the rebels taunt them for fighting is nothing less than the system which secures each one of those citizens his life.

Granting the rebels, then, an equal faith with ourselves in the justice of their cause, which side is likely to prevail? Which will stand upon slavery and cotton, the first of which war makes a deadly danger, and the second is useless if it can not be sold; or we, who, fighting for a land upon slavery, who are a people of every pursuit, with a soil producing every crop, who have the tradition and possession of the government, the course of civilization, and the sympathy of mankind?

THE WAY TO PEACE.

A BALTIMORE gentleman, who believes in Mr. Jefferson Davis and disbelieves in the Government of the United States, is said to have asked whether, after another victory or two we might not hope for peace. He meant, whether the country at large would not then assent to Mr. Davis's Constitution as the law of the land.

But how should we have peace from that assent? Suppose his Constitution accepted by a majority of the States even, how enforced upon the others? And then? How do you hope for peace from it? The Davis Constitution is a revival of the old Confederation. It is a league among States, not a government of the people, and each State is to decide for itself when it will leave the league. That is the fundamental principle of this rebellion. A revolution proceeds upon causes which are cited to justify it to God and men. But the principle of "the Confederacy" is, as Mr. Davis plainly said at Indianapolis last February, the free-love principle. When a State is tired it goes off. Its whim is the constitutional and legal right.

Does any Baltimore gentleman think that this is the road to peace?

Probably not. But he may say that he supposes that, after a battle or two more lost by us, we shall be willing to seek peace by assenting to the separation of the States.

Mr. Everett answers this question on the Fourth of July as it had been often enough answered before. Of course not. "It is in its very nature a perpetual cause of hostility..... If, for the frivolous reasons assigned, the seceding States were thrown back into the gulf, while all the peaceful temperaments and constitutional remedies of the Union were within their reach, and offers of further compromise and constitutional guarantees readily tendered them, what hope, what possibility of peace can there be when the Union is broken up; when, in addition to all other sources of deadly quarrel, a general exodus of the slave population begins (as, beyond all question, it will), and nothing but war remains for the settlement of controversies? The Vice-President of the new Confederacy states that it rests on slavery; but from its very nature it must rest equally on war—eternal war, first between North and South, and then between some of the sundered fragments into which some of the disintegrated parts may crumble."

Is this the way to peace? Any Baltimore gentleman can see as plainly as any patriot in the country, that even if peace were made upon such terms, the army which we have now in the field could not be reduced by a single soldier.

There is but one way to peace in this emergency, and that is to establish the national supremacy a hundredfold stronger than ever before. Understand that such news affect you disagreeably; but you must remember that war is a new thing to

THE LOUNGER.

BULL RUN.

IT is not in the SAXON heart to despond or despair. On the Monday night after the action at Bull Run, though it was the darkest night that ever fell upon the country, the country was never so strong. Great as we have all felt the contest to be, we knew, that night, that it was greater than our thoughts. The urgent duty was another to regret nor recriminate, but to "close up," and press more strongly, more unitedly, forward.

It is impossible to tell in a sudden order to retire dismayed the triumphant line. The soldiers, who from exhaustion or whatever cause had been sent to the rear, and the farmers and civilians who hovered along the base of our active line, were struck with terror by a sudden rush of cavalry from the flank. Panic-stricken, in a promiscuous crowd: while the soldiers who were really engaged fell back quietly and in good order, it is not impossible that regulars, volunteers, and civilians in the rear who rushed, a panting rabble, to Washington, and who told the disheartening story, had not dashed over the country at noon on Monday. But our army, our soldiers who were fighting the battle, fought as heroes fight, and only retired when the orders came, as the bravest and most reluctant soldiers must.

The defeat at Bull Run, therefore, was of no evil auspice to the cause, as it would have been if the truth had proved to be what we all at first feared. It was, so far as the actual conflict went, only a orderly retirement of an inferior force before superior numbers strongly intrenched. Why they were so exposed, and whether, exposed or not, they would not have remained upon the field victorious except for the panic in the rear, are questions which can not be easily decided.

An experienced soldier, an officer in a foreign army, who has seen much service, writes to the LOUNGER, "I am glad to see that you do not understand that such news affect you disagreeably; but you must remember that war is a new thing to you, especially to some of your officers in command: and this, also, that it always must take the lives of a good many men to acquire experience in warfare. "GREAT EXPECTATIONS," AND THE NEW NOVELS.

THE novel of Dickens, which is just completed in this paper, is among the best novels in our literature. The Athenæum in London says of it—and we quote it because it is so parsimonious of praise: "Whether the library of English fiction contains a romance comparable with 'Great Expectations' as a matter which admits of doubt.....Trying Mr. Dickens by himself, we find in this his last tale as much as we have in the most forcible portion of 'Oliver Twist,' as much delicacy as in the most delicate passages of 'David Copperfield,' as much quaint humor as in 'Pickwick.' In short, that this is the creation of a great artist in his prime we have felt from the very first moment of its appearance....."

The Athenæum is seldom so much excited by any work as it declares itself to be by this story of Dickens.

The story deserves much if not all that is said of it. It has all the power, variety, humor, tenderness, grace, wonderful pathos, and masterly management which are found in the other tales, but not often so forcibly combined as in this. Its most striking character is Joe Gargery, the son of a child in the body of a giant: a man in whom the essential manhood triumphs over every obstacle, and shines out in such lovely light that our common nature takes fresh hold of our affection and admiration.

There is no sermon preached in the story. Nobody proses or moralizes or "improves." The plot moves steadily forward from the first word, with its inscrutable cloud of causes, counter-causes, influences, and fatalities. The many-hued characters, whether hinted, drawn, or elaborated, play their parts without the least superfluity. The landscape and the aspects of outward nature adapt themselves to the tale; and when you close the book, scrawl or no scrawl, you are a wiser and a sadder man.

That deep, searching skepticism of the course of human affairs, which, while it does not question its general necessity, alleviates by sympathy particular injustice, and so appeals to a correction of the wrong in all things with eternal truth as the great secret pity of mankind for sinners, is nowhere more satisfactorily put than in "Great Expectations." And if this great author had no other claim to remembrance, what a sweet and signal service to humanity it is that he has always shown to the man in the criminal, and softened with tears the voice of condemnation!

As Dickens retires from the scene Bulwer appears. His new novel begins in this number of the Weekly. Meanwhile, in the Monthly, Thackeray tells the tale of "Philip," and Anthony Trollope that of "Framley Parsonage." Lots of ale and "harpers hoar" to sing to them at table. We are all lords now, and, sitting at our ease, genius tells stories more delightful than ever the barons heard.

REPRISALS.

In his message to the Richmond Congress, Jefferson Davis says that he sent a flag to President Lincoln informing him "of my resolute purpose to check all barbarities on prisoners of war by such severity of retaliation upon prisoners held by us as should secure the abandonment of the practice." Mr. Davis makes the fate of certain United States citizens in the hands of pirates the fate of the pirates of the Savannah.

He assumes to be the head of a nation. But no other nation in the world acknowledges him. Consequently his commission to a sea-captain to stop and plunder the ships of a great recognized nation of the earth can have no other weight than a similar commission from any body else.

The ordinary law, as at Bull Run, the combatants, whatever the justice of their cause, having appealed to arms, are equally exposed to danger. But a privateer is an armed vessel sailing under false pretenses, and falling upon unarmed merchantmen. The difference of the cases is that of a thief and a highway robber: one goes about to fight a duel may treat his opponent politely. But it is not expected that any body shall be polite to a footpad. Therefore the law of nations condemns privateering as piracy.

With some show of reason Mr. Davis might say that if we hang all the prisoners we took in battle he would hang all that he took. But then he can have no pretense for including pirates in the same category. Because, although the Savannah and the soldiers march equally by his commission, the difference between them lies in the difference of their conduct and object.

Argument, however, is of no avail in the case except for the future record of these events. The point is not to argue. Shall we consent to the lives of fierces now in the hands of the enemy by sparing the lives of the pirates whom they send out to capture, burn, and murder the ships of their foe? Do we by so doing make it a war of extermination? And if so, who suffers most?

The answer to these questions involves very important considerations, which are obvious enough.

UP WITH THE FLAG!

Now, by Saint Paul, the work goes bravely on,
The Stars and Stripes are up for Liberty!
Fling out the Nation—Talisman of the Free!
Cancel be the hand that dares to pluck thee down.
Tricksters may wrangle—Rebel States disown,
The clouds of war encompass land and sea:
The stars may fall from heaven, but not from thee!
Thy rainbow stripes shall stand while "nods the sun.
Up! freemen, up! No more concession!
Act! act!—The hour for words is more than past.
Up, sinews—free and strong—before limbs, fit-sigh and bony
From every land rings out this bugle blast—
"Tis the last bond of God that shall be blow;
Strike! 'Tis the hour that frees the world at last.

On page 508 we illustrate one of the GALLANT CHARGES OF THE SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENT, NEW YORK STATE MILITIA, AT THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN. This gallant regiment performed prodigies of valor that day. An officer of the Second thus speaks of their performance:

The Sixty-ninth Regiment, New York State Militia, performed prodigies of valor. They stripped themselves, and dashed into the enemy with the utmost fury. The difficulty was to keep them quiet. While the Second was engaging a regiment of rebels they retreated into a thick hay-field to draw the Northerners into a trap. The Second continued firing into them, while the Sixty-ninth, by a flank movement, took them in the rear, and pouring a deadly fire into their ranks, afterward charged them with the bayonet. The slaughter was terrible and the defeat complete, for not a man stirred of the whole five or six hundred. In this attack there were very few of the Sixty-ninth wounded.

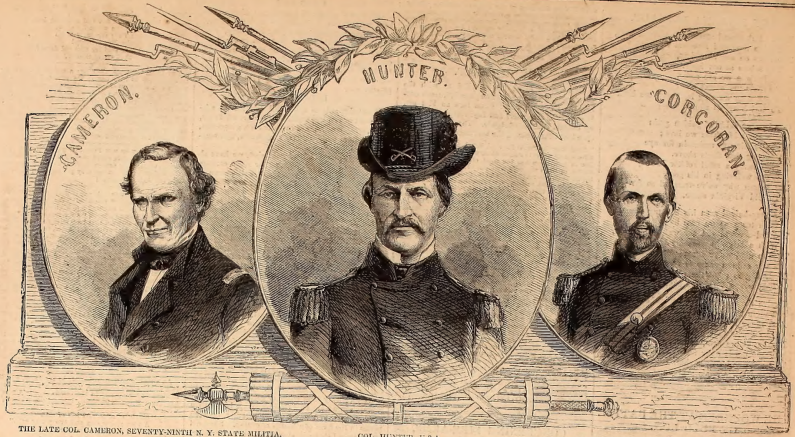
GALLANT CHARGE OF THE SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENT, N. Y. STATE MILITIA, UPON A REBEL BATTERY AT THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN.—[See Page 503.]



THE LATE COL. CAMERON, SEVENTY-NINTH N. Y. STATE MILITIA. COL. HUNTER, U.S.A. COL. CORCORAN, SIXTY-NINTH NEW YORK STATE MILITIA.

THE LATE COLONEL CAMERON.

On this page we give a portrait of the late Colonel Cameron, who was killed at the battle of Bull Run. The Times gives the following sketch of his career:

The country mourns the loss of the gallant Cameronian chieftain—the Colonel of the New York Seventy-ninth Highlanders—who fell at the head of his regiment in the bloody battle of Bull Run. Colonel Cameron was a man of dauntless valor, of a sterling and generous spirit, high personal honor, and fine intellectual parts—at once a gentleman, a Christian, and a hero. He had also the most commanding physical proportions, a dignified presence, and a noble countenance. Like his brother, the Secretary of War, he had been a printer, a journalist, and a lawyer, and had also taken an active part in forwarding the agricultural and railroad interests of Pennsylvania, his native State. In military affairs he had always taken great interest, having for years commanded a regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers. Latterly, however, he had retired from active life to his beautiful estate on the banks of the Susquehanna, intending to pass the remainder of his days in peaceful quiet. Only about a month ago was he induced to accept the command of a thousand patriotic and gallant Highland riflemen from this city, natives of the land of his sires, which he loved so warmly and well. The chief fear of his friends was that on the battle-field he would be too heedless of his own life, and those forebodings have been sadly realized. In his very first charge he fell—fell like a hero, with his face to the foe. At the head of his valiant Highlandmen he dashed into the thickest of the fray, and shouting the inspiriting war-cry, "Scots! follow me!" he passed from the gay battle-field to Paradise.

COLONEL CORCORAN.

On this page we publish a portrait of Colonel Corcoran, of the Sixty-ninth N. Y. S. M., who is supposed to be wounded and a prisoner at Manassas Junction. Colonel Michael Corcoran was born in Ireland some forty years ago. His father was a British officer who left no means to his son. At a very early age young Corcoran came to this country, obtained employment from the proprietor of Hibernian Hall in this city, and subsequently succeeded him in the establishment. Latterly, we believe, he occupied a desk in the Post-office. Colonel Corcoran joined the Sixty-ninth as a private, and served successively as orderly, lieutenant, and captain, finally rising to the rank of colonel. Let us hope that his captivity will not be of long duration, and that he will have an opportunity of pursuing the career he has so gloriously commenced.

The Sixty-ninth returned to the city under the command of Captain Kelly, of Company A, the Colonel being, as we said, wounded, and a prisoner.

THE INDIANA BRIGADE.

TWELVE thousand stanch, undaunted men,
Twelve thousand Hoosiers we—
The rifles on our shoulders,
The sabres at our knee.
From Indiana we are come,
From rolling mountains o'er;
And the song we sing is, Carry me back
To Old Virginia shore!

Our harvest fields of golden grain
Are left with those we love;
We're fighting in mountains for aye
The flag that floats above.
There's many a rebel soldier knows,
When we'd bring in his gore,
The reason we've trampled so far
To Old Virginia shore.

The gray-haired man his blessing pours,
With tears, as we pass by;
The red-cheeked girl her welcome speaks,
With a brightly-sparkling eye.
They're glad we've come; for rebels fly,
Their cannon cease to roar,
Their flag to scent the mountain air
That wraps Virginia's shore.

Twelve thousand stanch, undaunted men—
Twelve thousand more to come;
And many eyes shall never see
The smiles that welcome home.
But hands are firm, and hearts will dare
Brave deeds we've heard before—
The stars and stripes shall float again
O'er all Virginia's shore.

NEW ALBANY, July 29.

THE WOUNDED AT THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

ON page 502 we illustrate CARRYING IN THE WOUNDED AFTER THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN, from a sketch by our special artist. The fate of many of the wounded was terrible; they were boyonetted to where they lay from the ranks of the rebels. The following, from the New York Tribune, is one of many pieces of evidence which have been laid before the public:

Surgeon Barnes, of the New York Twenty-eighth Volunteers, was in the fight all through, and came out of it in his shirt sleeves, having lost coat, sash, watch, and all his surgeon's instruments, having been charged on by the Black Horse Cavalry and compelled to leave the field, being driven from under a tree where he had established his temporary quarters, and where he was attending to the wounds of seven officers, his injured men, part of whom were unconscious.

Surgeon Barnes went up to the battle-field in the rear of the attacking column, and, as soon as our men began to fall, he took his station with his assistants under a tree, in a little ravine. The wounded men were brought to him, and he took off his coat, sash, and hung it on the tree to signify that the place was under the charge of a surgeon. The injured men were brought in rapidly, and a fire was kindled under he had under his charge nearly thirty. As fast as possible he attended to their hurts, and of a short time had been compelled to perform a number of capital operations. He amputated four legs, three arms, a hand, and a foot, and attended to a number of minor injuries. By this time the enemy had discovered the place, and the nature of the men in charge, and began to pour in musket-balls, and projectiles from rifled cannon. The place became unsafe for the wounded men, and it was seen to be necessary to remove them. The Surgeon's Assistants and servants had become separated from him, and he had no one to send for ambulances, and was obliged to leave the wounded men and go himself. It was no easy matter to procure ambulances except at a cost of probably thirty minutes before the Surgeon returned with the necessary assistance. When he returned he found that every one of those wounded men had been dispatched or astred, and was dead. They were literally cut to pieces.

THE FIRE ZOUAVES AND THE BLACK HORSE CAVALRY.

WE publish on page 501 an illustration of the terrible conflict which took place at the battle of Bull Run between the Fire Zouaves and the Black Horse Cavalry. One of the lieutenants of the Zouaves thus tells the tale:

The Zouaves rushed out of the woods only to find themselves the target for another body of infantry beyond, while the Black Horse Cavalry were seen charging full upon them. Things looked badly, when, fortunately, the infantry were engaged by another regiment, that gave the Zouaves time to prepare for the charge from the horsemen. They formed hastily in line, kneeling, semi-kneeling, and standing, that, lifewatch fashion, they might receive their enemies with successive volleys. On came the Horse—a full regiment of brave men, splendidly mounted, and as ready for medal as those on which they hoped to be fed. To an early discharge from the cavalry the Zouaves made no response, although several of the men were skewered, but waited patiently until the enemy was almost upon them, when, in quick succession, the three ranks fired, each man doing his best for the good cause. The shock to the rebels was great; but they rallied, behaved gallantly, and attempted a renewal of the charge, for which, however, the excited Firemen were prepared, and for which the Black Horse Cavalry paid most dearly. They were completely shattered, broken up, and swept away. Not more than a hundred of them rode off, and as they went their rebellious ears were assisted with "One, two, three, four, six, seven, thgh, Zouave!" and such a "Steer regent" as one can only appreciate when he hears it.

The following account is from a private letter:

The New York Zouaves received the first charge of the famous Black Horse Guard, about which Governor Seymour has so often spoken. It was a splendid corps of cavalry, all the horses of which were coal black. They came upon the Zouave regiment at a gallop, and were received by the brave firemen upon their poised bayonets, followed instantly by a volley, from which they broke and fled, leaving several of the Zouaves were cut down in the assault. They quickly rallied, however, with their forces doubled—perhaps by seven hundred—and again they dashed with fearful fury upon the wearied Zouaves. This time they broke the American flag, and a part of the Zouaves supposed for an instant that they were friends, whom they had originally taken for. The flag was quickly thrown down, however, the horse dashed upon the regiment, the rear was discovered, and the slaughter commenced. No quarter, no halting, no flinching now, marked the rapid and deadly dealing down of our men as they closed in upon the foe, in their madness and desperation. Our brave fellows felt the rebels filled up, the sabres, bowie-knives, and bayonets glittered in the sunlight, horse after horse went down, platoon after platoon disappeared—the ranks of mockery, the screams of the rebels, the shout of "Remember Ellsworth!" from the lungs of the Zouaves, and the yells of the wounded and crushed half-suffocated by the fire, and a terrible carnage succeeded. The gallant Zouaves fought like demons, and were really cut up; but of those hundred of Black Horse Guards not many left that bloody rencounter.

THE RETREAT.

ON special artist has supplied us with the sketch which we reproduce on page 501, representing the RETREAT FROM BULL RUN on 21st ult. It shows the straggglers and fugitives well covered by Colonel Blenker's brigade. The Tribune correspondent thus depicted the movement:

Stretching far across the road, long before the hoped-for relief at Centreville was reached, was a firm, unerring line of men, to whom the sight of the thousands who dashed by them was only a wonder and a surprise. This was the German rifle regiment; and to see the manly bearing of their General, and feel the inspiration which his presence gave at that moment, was like relief to those who were given at that moment, was like relief to those who were given at that moment, was like relief to those who perish in a desert. At a glance the darkness of the night, we knew that, for many hours that night as it should, there was one man who would build and keep the fires of the nation unmalled to the end.

I need not speak much in praise of the action of Blenker and the officers who served him so well. The events spoke for them. Steady and watchful, and in his place throughout the evening, advancing his skirmishers at every token of attack, and spreading a sure protection over the multitudes who fled disorderly through his columns. With three regiments he stood to fight against an outnumbering enemy already flushed with victory, and eager to complete its triumph. As the darkness increased his position became more perilous and untenable. At 11 o'clock the attack came upon the advance company of Colonel Schaefe's Rifles, not in force, but from a body of cavalry whose successful passage would have been followed by a full force, and the complete destruction of our broken host. The rebel cavalry was driven back, and never returned, and at two in the morning the last body of these troops having passed and found their road to safety, the command was given to march in order, and the brigade fell slowly and regularly back, with the same precision as if on parade, and as thoroughly in hand of their leader as if no danger had ever come near them. Over and over again Blenker begged permission to open his guns, or even to advance. "Retreat!" said he to M'Dowell's messenger, "is the worst word to go to me." At last the command was peremptory, and he was left to alternative.

CONCERNING FIRE-ARMS.

FIELD ARTILLERY.

SMOOTH guns are never made of wrought iron or brass; they are of cast iron, inaccuracy and lack of durability. Field Artillery comprises the smaller guns and howitzers, including 6 and 12-pound guns and 24-pound howitzers. Some of these guns are made of bronze, the superior tenacity of which renders it the best material for light artillery. The effective range of field artillery is as follows:

12-pounder	1000 yards.
6-pounder	880 yards.
24-pounder howitzer	1300 yards.
12-pounder (howitzer)	1050 yards.
Do. do., shell	1500 yards.

THE ARMSTRONG GUN.

Two guns of modern invention are worthy of particular description from the notice they have attracted from the first European nations, as well as from the American people. These are entitled these are the Armstrong and Whitworth guns. Mr. W. G. Armstrong, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (now Sir William), was the first to produce a gun which constructed a rifle-piece upon plans which he had long studied, and which he considered destined to change the whole principle of warfare. The gun of Mr. Armstrong gun is formed with a steel tube, rifled with thirty or forty grooves, and bound round on the outside with layers of wrought iron coils, which by of course materially strengthening the gun. The projectile is a pointed cylinder, similar in shape to a Minié ball, made of cast iron, and coated with lead. The gun is breech-loading, in order to admit of a larger ball, to insure its filling the grooves. The ball can be used either as a shell or solid shot, latter by filling it with powder and attaching a detonating fuse at the point. The gun is mounted on a carriage with a recoiling wood-slide, and screw for elevating and depressing, and for horizontal movements. The ball acts as a shot before bursting as a shell, penetrating the object and bursting immediately after. This gun has an enormous range, twice or three times that of other field guns of the same calibre, and with remarkable accuracy. It is stated, however, that, owing to various reasons, it has been considered by the Crimea Council that the Armstrong gun has an immense manufactory, and for the past five years has had the name of having produced the most effective field gun ever known. Serious objections have been urged against it; the fact of its being breech-loading and complicated, and the use of lead on the projectiles, which was liable to stripping, being the most important.

THE WHITWORTH GUN.

The Whitworth gun contains details its remarkable power and accuracy by the adoption of a polygonal spiral bore of uniform pitch, more rapid than could be obtained by rifling. The gun is hexagonal in one of which a was a few days since exhibited in this city—with a bore of 3.2 inches, has one turn in sixty inches, it is eight feet long, and breech-loading. The projectile is oblong, made of cast iron, and formed to fit the grooves of the barrel. The breech of the gun is closed with a cap which screws on, and on being removed swings to one side upon a hinge; the projectile is then inserted into the gun breech, and followed by a tin cartridge-case containing the powder, and capped by a cake of wax or other lubricating composition; the cap is then again swung round and screwed on by its handles, a fuse inserted into the vent, and the gun is discharged. The lubricating matter being carried out with the ball effectually cleanses the gun, and the deposit is afterward withdrawn with the cartridge-case. As there is no exhalation of gases from the breech-cap, one of the worst features of breech-loading guns is avoided. The range of this gun is said to be greater than the Armstrong gun, and its accuracy more positive. Guns of the size herein described cost £900 in England.

OTHER GUNS.

Other new guns and implements of war have been named, as "Ketchkiss's Rifled Cannon," "Winans Steam-gun," the "Centrifugal gun," etc., but these have been fully described in the daily papers as they have made their appearance. Of course the inventive talent of the country will now be chiefly directed toward producing these articles which will become necessary in prosecuting the present war.

PROJECTILES.

It remains only to name and describe the missiles used in artillery warfare: these are solid shot, shells, strap-shot, case or canister shot, grape-shot, light and fire balls, carcasses, grenades, and rockets.

Of the various kinds of solid shot, we have already described those prepared for rifled cannon, and the rest are too common and well known to need any careful description. They are made of cast iron, in sand or iron moulds. Hot shot is used for firing ships or forts, and other combustible matter; they are heated in furnaces to a red or white heat. Shells, bombs, grenades, and hollow shot are made of cast iron, and usually spherical. They are filled with combustible matter, and fired by means of a fuse, regulated to explode the projectile at the desired moment. Grenades are frequently fired from howitzers on the field of battle to dislodge cavalry or infantry from some important post.

Strap-shot is composed from the fact that the ball is attached or strapped by bands of tin to the cartridge. Canister is prepared by filling a tin canister with grape-shot or musket-balls and attaching it to a cartridge. Light-balls and fire-balls are composed of combustible material, which lights up very brilliantly, and are fired at night for the purpose of exposing an enemy's actions or illuminating a camp. Carcasses, smoke-balls, and suffocating-balls are shells with several fuse holes, from which horrible fumes, vapors, or flames rush forth, blinding and suffocating all around. They are used to drive an enemy from mines or galleries, or to clear a breach in a fortress. Grape-shot are larger than musket-balls, and are fastened together between plates in the form of bunch of grapes. Shrapnel are spherical shells filled with bullets and powder, and fired by a common fuse.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

EXTRAVAGANCE IN CUPID'S GARDEN.

As down in Cupid's Garden
For posting I did go,
Considering Hannah Bowen
Which in that garden grow;

I see a fine young lady,
And unto her did say,
"Rose thee engaged to e'er a young Swell?
Come tell me now, I pray;

"I hen't engaged to ne'er a young Swell,
I'm sorry to deceive,
For I cost so much in Crinoline,
And the other things I wear;"

And the other things I wear."

ADVICE TO OPERA-GOERS.—Never volunteer to take any lady to a performance which you are particularly desirous of hearing, for then she should be taken if soon after it has begun, and want to go home. The observance of this rule will by no means be necessarily more selfishness. If you wish to be kind to her, and treat her to an opera, do so, only wait till you are asked. Then you will find that she will not fill it at the theatre, or if she does, so much the better, as far as your entertainment is concerned; for you will have taken her to hear music which you don't care about, and from which you will be glad to get away.

MR. MERRYMAN LATHROP says when he went on the steamer to California, they kept the chickens in the hatchways, the beef in the buffaloes, near the steerage, and when they ran out of eggs the ship lay too.

AN UNWELCOME RETURN.

THREE MONTHS' VOLUNTEER. "What! don't you know me—your own husband?"
DAUGHTER OF COLUMBIA. "Get away! No husband of mine would be here while the country needs his help."

OLD FOGY'S GLEE.

Oh, the girls that we have seen
Are all in their time so fair!
Now some are fat, and some are lean,
So much the worse for wear.
To think I see my early flame
In yonder Mrs. Grundy!
Once I was mad for that old dame!
Ah! tempus fugit eternal!

THE DRAIN CREATURES.—When a certain Oriental potentate wants to rain one of his principal subjects he makes him a present of a white elephant, which the poor man is obliged to keep, and by which, therefore, he is soon financially eaten up. In the country the fashionable mamma, who contrives to inveigle a soft young man into marriage with her unprepossessing daughter, makes him with an incumbrance corresponding exactly to the white elephant, in very specific respects, but less in rule, and, as it were, eating him out of house and home.

A SECRET OUT OF THE PARSON-HOUSE.—Women, when they get together, talk about housekeeping, and their children, their servants, their dresses, their rivals, their conquests, their grievances, and, when they get together, talk of nothing but their dear wives!

CENSUS CONJECTURES.—As one of the enumerators for the burgh of Dundee was transcribing the census papers he had distributed and collected into his book, he came upon one which seemed himself to be a book reserve," meaning by this, we suppose, that he "trumped ten troubles." An Irishman, in Maxwelltown, Dumfriesshire, one column in which was headed "Age," entered opposite his own name, "Not dead—I wish I was;" while opposite his spouse he had inserted, "Not dead—I wish she were." Under the heading, "Rank, profession, or occupation," for his wife he wrote, "Glad she's not dead, for she cut a terrible fool." In one of the numerous streets that branch off from the Hawkhill, Dundee, resides an old woman of the name of Campbell. Both folks, like Dennis Doane, "but indifferent pea-weavers," they certainly; but a neighboring young man to fill up their census paper. He got on quite satisfactorily until the column "Age" came to be filled up, when, with the elderly woman, there seemed to be a shortness of memory. The young man, after waiting a short time, asked what he should put down. "Oh," said she, "ye may put down sixty." That daughter's line was then commenced to be filled up, but the age again seemed to puzzle the mother. The young man said he would put down that she could put down, and the mother, after a moment's consideration, said, "Ye may put her fifty."

An eccentric genius, we believe in Inverness, who lives in a house which he calls a "castle," gave the following answer to the question in the census paper: "Its clear heading "Domestic servants, lodgers, and visitors," he wrote—

"Plenty of mice, and lots of rats,
A nice young dog, and five young cats."

Under the head "Age" was written—

"I will not swear that I am fifty,
Though growing wise, and also thrifty."

His "castle" he describes as consisting of one room, one window, no chimney, and no door. Happy man!—also he evidently a philosopher as well as a wit.

Sheridan's neglect of letters was a standing joke against him. He never took the trouble to open any that he did not expect, and often left sealed many that he was most anxious to read. He once appeared with his epaulets face at the bank, humbly asking an advances of twenty pounds. "Certainly, Sir," said the bank; you like any one-fifty or a hundred?" said the smiling clerk. Sherry was crapped evol. He could like a hundred. "Are you drunk?" asked the cashier. Sherry thought he was joking, but was ready for two, or even three. He was always ready for a drink. But he could not conceit his surprise. "Have you not received our letter?" the clerk asked, perceiving him. Certainly he had received the epistle, which informed him that his name as proprietor of the Drury-Lane Theatre had been paid in, but he had never opened it.

"If you marry," said a Roman consul to his son, "it is for to a woman." "Very good advice," said Mrs. Partington, interrupting the, who was reading; "but I don't know how he could have given any other under the circumstances, since he had professed to marry what it should be so, previously beforehand, though in one sense all the girls that marry are not married, for some of them they tell not, neither do they spin, and know no more about housekeeping than the fifth wheel of a coach." "But," said Ike, putting in, "you didn't hear it all. If you marry," said a Roman consul to his son, "let it be a woman who has judgment and industry enough to get a meal of victuals, cotton enough to dress neat, principle to wash before breakfast, and sense enough to keep her tongue." "I never," said the old lady and she shook her head as though the idea were adjusting itself to a satisfactory place in her mind.

Those who take no account of their own sins in life may expect to be brought one day to a "deal reckoning."

"When Hopper the painter, was residing in a cottage a few miles from London, Fuvou, one afternoon, unexpectedly arrived there. Hopper said that he could not offer him dinner, as Mrs. Hopper had gone to town, and had carried with her key of the closet which contained the wine. Furou, however, declared that he would be contented with a mutton-chop and beer from the next ale-house; and accordingly said to dine. During the evening Furou said: "I am quite certain that Mrs. Hopper keeps some nice bottle, for her private drinking; in her own bedroom; say pray, try if you can lay your hand on it." His host seemed loth that Mrs. Hopper had no such secret store; but Furou insisting that a search should be made, a bottle was at last discovered in the lady's apartment, to the surprise of Hopper, and the joy of his guest, who declared it to be excellent, pronouncing it to be the best gin he had tasted for a long time. Next day Furou met, somewhat out of temper, informed his wife that Furou had drunk every drop of her concealed dram. 'Drunk every drop of it!' she cried. "Good Heavens, it was spirits of wine for the lamp!"

"Do you believe in fore-runners?" asked a nervous lady of old Deacon Low.

"Yes, ma'am," replied the Deacon: "I've seen them."

"How so?" enquired the lady, with a start.

"Yes," continued the Deacon, fixing his eye with a solemn stare as a dark corner of the room; "I've seen none."

"Mercy! mercy on me!" shrieked the lady, "where?"

"There! there!" said the Deacon, pointing to where his eyes were directed. "That cat, ma'am, may be called a fore-runner, for she runs on all fours!"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On the Tuesday, 23d July, in the Senate, the bill to provide for the organization of arms and munitions of war to the loyal citizens of the United States, and for military operations in such citizens, was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and passed. In appropriates ten millions of dollars for the purpose specified. The bill to refund duties on house tax for collection was passed. A bill to punish frauds in making contracts with the Government was reported from the Judiciary Committee, and laid over under the rule. The Senate went into Executive session, and soon afterwards adjourned without doing any further public business. In the House, Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky, made two effective but attempts to introduce a resolution inquiring of the Secretary of War whether there are armed forces in the public service of the Government. A bill was passed which changes the judicial districts in Kentucky and Missouri. Mr. Stevens reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to amend the several acts imposing duties. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and the House soon afterwards adjourned.

On Wednesday, 24th, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of administering the oath of allegiance to each military and civil officer in the service. The House bill to define and punish conspiracy was reported from the Judiciary Committee, with a recommendation that it pass. The bill regulating the pay of the revenue service was passed. Senator Wilson's bill to promote the efficiency of the volunteer force was taken up and discussed at considerable length. It provides that commissions of officers may be suspended by the President. The bill to provide for the payment of the Government House in Baltimore was passed, after some opposition. Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, offered a resolution similar to that passed the House a day or two ago, offered by Mr. Crittenden, declaring that the war has been forced upon the Government by Southern disunionists, but that it ought to cease when the authority of the Government is re-established. It was laid over.—In the House, a bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce, and passed, authorizing the appointment of Consuls at ports where it may be deemed necessary for the protection of trade. The Senate bill providing for a Board to report on the matter of iron or steel-clad steamships and batteries was passed: also the bill providing for an Assistant-Secretary of the Navy; also the bill providing for an increase of the Naval Medical Corps; also the bill authorizing the President to accept the services of 500,000 volunteers. A resolution was reported from the Judiciary Committee, and passed, inquiring of the President the reasons which induced the imprisonment of the Baltimore Police Commissioners. A bill, similar to that of the Senate, providing for the payment of the Governor and Police of Baltimore, provoked considerable debate, but finally passed. The House then adopted the bill to provide for raising revenue by direct taxation, and it was finally committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to provide a method for the assessment of the tax.

On Thursday, 25th, in the Senate, a Select Committee was ordered to inquire into the circumstances of the surrender of the Norfolk Navy-yard, and of the Navy, and the Armory at Harper's Ferry. A joint resolution, pledging support to the Government to carry the present war to a successful termination, was introduced by Senator Clarke, and laid over under the rule. The Senate then proceeded by resolution to inform the Senate what instructions have been given to foreign ministers in reference to the rebellion. The bill to indemnify States for the expenses incurred in defending the Government was reported from the Finance Committee and passed. The bill to increase the revenue was discussed, but not definitely disposed upon. The resolution introduced by Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, declaring, similar to that of Mr. Crittenden in the House, setting forth the objects of the war, and declaring responsibility for it with the Southern Disunionists, was then taken up and debated at considerable length. Messrs. Johnson, Polk, Trumbull, Collamer, Fessenden, Hale, Kennedy, Breckinridge, Sherman, Doolittle, and others. It was passed, 30 to 5, only Messrs. Bright, Richardson, of Illinois, made a general explanation, and apologized for the part he took in the vote on 24th, in reference to Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky. The Senate then went into Executive session. A bill and amendment authorizing the issue of Treasury notes of a denomination not less than fifty dollars, was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and passed. The Direct Tax and Internal Revenue Bill was then considered in Committee of the Whole until the adjournment. Its provisions were debated to considerable spirit, and an amendment was adopted providing that slaves shall be taxed. The bill was then reported to the House.

On Friday, 26th, in the Senate, several bills were passed; among them one providing for the building of a railroad bridge over the Potomac at Washington, one ordering a Board of Officers to examine the contracts for clothing of all the officers of the Government, one providing a fund for the suppression of the present rebellion and conspiracy, and one to provide for the support of the rebellious States. A resolution declaring that the supremacy and integrity of the Union must be maintained, was subsequently presented in opposition to the Mayor and citizens of Baltimore complained from the eminent loyalty displayed by the police force there. The resolution for the maintenance of the supremacy of the Union was passed by only one dissenting voice—that of Senator Breckinridge. The bill to provide vote—that of discussed, but was not disposed of when the Senate went into Executive session.—In the House, after a discussion of some length in reference to the day of final adjournment, a resolution, of definite conclusion, to that day was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Various amendments were proposed and discussed. The Committee finally rose without voting, and the House soon afterward adjourned.

On Saturday, 27th, the Senate was occupied by a speech from Hon. Andrew Johnson, Senator from Tennessee. In the course of his speech he reminded the Government that the Union men of East Tennessee were without arms, and that it was necessary they should be armed for protection.—In the House, the Senate bill appropriating five millions to pay for the transportation of arms to the Union men in the rebel States, and for the military organization of such men, was passed. The Direct Tax bill was then taken up in Committee of the Whole, and after debate the enacting clause was stricken out, the principal point of objection being that it proposed to tax the people unequally. When the Committee rose, the matter, on motion of Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report forthwith a tax bill on the basis of twenty millions by direct taxation, and that such other sums as may be necessary be raised on the personal income and wealth of the country. This tax, it will be recollected, is for the payment of the interest on the public debt to be incurred in the war. No other business was done.

On Monday, 29th, in the Senate, the set supplementary to the confiscation act was reported from the Committee on Finance and passed, with an amendment suspending the act in Tennessee during the continuation of five dollars. Senator Wilson introduced a bill, which was referred, to provide for the Commissioners, assisting ten millions for the purchase of arms. It was subsequently reported from the Committee and passed. Senator Hale announced an agreement of the Conference Committee on the bill for the reorganization of the Navy, and also on the bill increasing the Navy Medical Corps. A bill for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia was passed. It prohibits the sale of liquors to soldiers, and provides for a military police for such offense. The Tariff bill was then taken up and debated until its adjournment.—In the House, Mr. Horton, in accordance with instructions, reported the Conference Committee's report on the modified Direct Tax bill. It is on the basis of twenty millions, to be apportioned among the States according to numbers. The report was refused to order an immediate vote on the passage of the bill, and its provisions were debated at considerable length. It finally passed as it came from the Committee, 77 to 69. A bill was reported from the Ways and Means Committee which appropriates ten millions for the purchase of arms. The Senate bill for gathering and publishing the evidence of duties on imports, was passed.—Mr. Cox, of Ohio, sought to introduce a bill of indictment against Mr. Buchanan's cabinet of a Conspiracy to assist a similar Commissioner from the States, to subsidize the press, and to acquisition of National difficulties. The House refused to suspend the rules to receive it, by a vote of 97 to 64.

CONDITION OF WASHINGTON.

Troops continue to pour into Washington, and under the energetic measures adopted by General Scott to defend the city will, doubtless without delay, be placed in a situation to defy any attack which may be made upon it. In the flush of recent victory, may be disposed to make upon it, the Virginia side, in the short time during which he has had command of the forces there, as large a force as could necessary to make them impregnable.

The Virginia shore, from Alexandria down around Washington, well armed and equipped, and rapidly coming under the thorough system of discipline than they have yet had experience of.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

A complete reorganization of the army is to take place immediately, and such steps will be adopted as will insure us, as far as it is possible, against the evils of incompetency among the officers. To this end general orders were issued last week from the War Department, that all officers of the regular army will be subject to examination by a board of officers, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, and the examination will be of a most searching nature, in order that their fitness for the positions assigned them may be thoroughly tested. Seventy officers of the regular army are to be filled by officers who shall have passed an examination satisfactorily to the War Department in the most remarkably heavy. Tenders of troops are made in surprising numbers. Nearly three hundred companies have been accepted, and are now being mustered into the service. Many companies from Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Oregon, and Indiana ten new regiments, some of which are already on the way.

MORE MEN WANTED.

Governor Morgan has, under the requisition of the President, issued a proclamation calling for forty thousand additional volunteers, to serve for three years or during the war. A part of the regiments forming the original organization, will be issued immediately. The rendezvous will be at New York, Albany, and Elmira, with the Military Agents at Albany.

OUR KILLED, WOUNDED, AND MISSING.

A full list of the killed, wounded, and missing, at the battle of Bull Run, up to the latest advices, gives the following figures:

Killed	380
Wounded	779
Missing	417
Total	1,576

OUR WOUNDED AT MANASSAS.

From intelligence received in Washington on 29th from a lady Miss Dickinson, who has been visiting Manassas Junction, it appears that General Beauregard and General Johnston were both there on Thursday, that a very large force was still encamped there, and that the railroad communications for a renewed attack on the Union army—probably on Washington—were being pushed with vigor. Many more recent prisoners taken at Bull Run, and states that the rebel force at that fight was 40,000 to 45,000. Our loss, is reported to be 1500 killed and 1500 wounded. Colonel Hunter is severely wounded in the thigh. Colonel Corcoran is not a survivor in the hospitals at Manassas. She has visited all the hospitals there, and says that Corcoran was on a pass from one of General Beauregard's aids. The above statement is confirmed by other reports on 30th.

THE REBEL FORCE AT BULL RUN.

It is established that the Secessionists had 91,000 men within twelve miles of Bull Run on the day of the battle last, and that Jeff Davis in person brought up 17,000 more on Saturday night and Sunday morning. They had therefore fully three times as many as General McDowell, and four times as many as were brought into action on our side.

HOW THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN CAME TO BE FOUGHT.

In Congress, on Wednesday 24, Mr. Richardson, of Illinois, said: "I am informed that General Scott was forced to fight this battle. I will tell him what occurred yesterday morning. I was in the President's room conversing with myself were present with the President, Secretary of War, and Secretary of the Navy. The latter remarked that General Scott remarked, 'I am the biggest coward in the world. I am afraid to fight battle.' The President replied, 'I will prove it. I have fought the battle against my judgment, and I think the General ought to overcome his timidity and fight.' 'I, God is my judge,' he added, 'for an interval of silence,' 'I did all in my power to prevent it.' Secretary Welles said, 'I remember because I did not stand up when I could, and did not.' I stated here to-day what I heard. I do not say that the battle was forced upon Missouri for the compliment he paid me. I desire to say for myself that I did not. I did not say anything of the sort and grandfather having fallen beneath the flag of the Union, I would not. I would have fought it out myself and stood, and, God willing, there I will stand to the end of my life, defending it against all foes."

Mr. WASHBURNE. "As my colleague has referred to what Scott's opinion was, I will state what the late President said."

Mr. RICHARDSON. "I will do so. 'Your conversation implies,' said the President to General Scott, 'that I forced you to battle.' 'No, sir,' replied General Scott, 'I never served under a President who has been kinder to me than you have been.'" The President then left and private the President from the fact of the letter having forced him to fight the battle. General Scott then paid a compliment to the President personally."

WHAT GENERAL SCOTT SAID TO MR. RAYMOND.

The Times continued the following account of a conversation between General Scott and Ex-Governor Raymond on Thursday last:

"If the matter had been left to him, he said, he would have commenced by a perfect blockade of every Southern port on the Atlantic and the Gulf. Then he would have collected a large force at the Capitol for defensive purposes, and another large one on the Mississippi for offensive operations. The summer months, during which it is madness to take troops south of St. Louis, should have been devoted to tactical instruction; and with the first frosts of autumn he would have taken a column of 80,000 well-disciplined troops down the Mississippi, and taken every important city on the river from Cairo inclusive. It could have been done, he said, with greater ease, with less loss of life, and with far less imbittered results than would attend the marching of an army to Richmond. At eight points the river would probably have been defended, and eight battles would have been necessary; but in every one of them success could have been made certain. Then, with the Mississippi and the Atlantic one ours, the Southern States would have been reduced to the natural and inevitable dependence of events, to seek, by a return to the Union, escape from famine. 'I would have starved them out,' he said of it. 'This' said he, 'was my plan. But I am only a subordinate. I am bound to give advice when it is asked, and to obey orders when they are given. I shall do it. I was born in the Union and have been much more about war than I do, and who have far greater influence than I do, are responsible for the plan of the campaign. There never was a more just and upright man than the President, and I am sure he desires most sincerely to promote the best interest of the country. But there are men among the Administration who should their own arguments for more than the dictates of wisdom and experience, and have unfortunately decided upon the plan of the campaign. I shall do, or attempt, whatever I am ordered to do. But they must not hold me responsible. If I am ordered to go to Richmond, I shall endeavor to do it. But I know perfectly well that they have no conception of the difficulties we shall encounter. I know the country—have absolutely adopted it is to defense, and how resolutely and obstinately it will be defended. I am much better qualified than to take Richmond; nor that it has been disgraced by honoring the name of my rebel Confederacy I feel resentment toward it, and should like nothing better than to master the whole country in a week. But I have lived long enough to know that human resentment is a very bad basis upon which to found action. I have, moreover, lived long enough to learn it also. I shall do what I am ordered, I shall do it to the best of my knowledge and ability. But if I am compelled to fight before I am ready, they have only themselves to blame. I know the country—have the responsibility of their acts, so I am willing to take that of mine. And they must not throw responsibility on my shoulders."

PROSPECT OF ACTIVITY AT FORTRESS MONROE.

There is a prospect of lively work in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe. On Saturday morning the rebels sent the Newport News Commander giving our troops there twenty-four hours to retire, threatening to drive them out in case they refused to obey. The guns on the side of the gunn immediately went up to Old Point; the Minnesota and Roanoke were ordered to the scene, and the Minnesota and seven gun-boats are at Old Point, in readiness to assist in fighting the Secessionists. The force stationed at Newport News consists of four effective regiments, and General Pierce has ordered his aid-de-camp to drive back twice that number of assailants. On the evening of Saturday it became evident that the rebels intended an attack on Hampton. General Butler determined to leave the town in a state that its occupance should be useless before it. Accordingly, families and goods were removed, and preparations made to burn the town, and this will, we have it fall into the hands of the enemy. All Saturday night and during the day on Sunday there was a bustle in the camps. Everybody who had the tools leading to the fortress. Nearly 1000 of them must have come within the range of the guns of the fortress in the course of Congress three times are confiscated.

REMOVAL OF GENERAL PATTERSON BY HARPER'S FERRY.

Rumor states that Major-General Banks, on taking command at Harper's Ferry, finding that place indefensible, with the removal of the bulk of the army thereabouts, immediately ordered a removal to the Maryland side, and took up a position in the rear of the Maryland Heights, with his pickets extending to a point overlooking the Ferry. There is a long, rapidly rushing river, which will have a more numerous army than General Peterson had at any time during the summer. General Johnston, it is rumored, has returned to Winchester, and is expected to commence offensive operations along the Maryland line.

SKIRMISHES IN MISSOURI.

General Sweney's command, which left Springfield, Missouri, some days ago, reached Forsythe, in the same State, on 29th, discovered a band of 150 rebels with cannon, and took possession of the town. They killed five of the rebels and severely wounded several others. Not a none killed and but four hurt. A large quantity of provisions, camp equipage, and wagons, valued at $20,000, were seized at the same time.

DETAIL OF THE MASTERS OF THE "SAVANNAH."

Thomas H. Baker, the captain, and the crew of the privateer Savannah, all whose names have heretofore been published, were brought to this week in the United States Circuit Court for trial, under the indictment charging them with piracy and robbery on the high seas, alleged Shipman on the beach. To the indictment they all severally pleaded not guilty. The counsel for the prisoners ask for the trial for the 31st of July, but their counsel objected to having their trial hurried without full time to procure witnesses and documentary proof for his clients, one of whom, he said, was a native born citizen of Massachusetts and of the United States. Judge Shipman stated that he should not hurry the case unnecessarily, but as a matter of legal case, where the penalty is death. He should the prisoners to have a speedy trial. He added that they could only have in this Court where there was a disagreement of the Grand Jury, and he had been informed that in consequence of a severe accident which had befallen him, he would not be able to hold the next term of court. He accordingly fixed the third day of the October Term for the trial, and the prisoners were then remanded into the custody of the United States Marshal.

PERSONAL.

Solomon Sturges, Esq., charges a day or two since, purchased two splendid horses, intended as a present to General McClellan.

It appears to be definitely settled that Col. Corcoran, of the 69th, is a prisoner on parole in the rebels at Richmond. This is stated on the authority of a letter from Leesburg, Va., which also announces that Congressman Ely, of that State, is a prisoner.

Mr. James E. Harvey, our Minister to Portugal, resigned on account of the late action of North America in which he declines to take the truth of the charge of treasonable opinion him on the ground that he has been engaged in the examination of telegraphic dispatches seized by order of the Government.

The Baltimore Police Commissioners and Marshal Kane have been taken to Fort Lafayette, in Fortress Monroe.

Prince Napoleon Bonaparte, first Cousin to Napoleon III., arrived in New Halifax, with his Princess, on board the steam yacht Jerome Napoleon, and no one was the wiser till Sunday. On Sunday the Princess, attended by the Duchess d'Abrantes, Comtesse de Montholon, and an officer of the Prince's suite, attended divine service at St. Stephen's Church, and the Prince and some of his suite visited Camp Scott, three miles. The Prince travels strictly incog., and nothing is definitely known of the object of his visit.

Colonel Wilcox, heretofore supposed to have been killed, is not dead, but a wounded prisoner. Wilcox and Ellsworth were handsomely treated by his old classmates of the West Point Academy.

THE WORK OF THE EXTRA SESSION.

BEFORE this paper reaches its readers Congress will have adjourned, after a brief session of rather more than a month. It has been, in many respects, the most momentous session of Congress in our history; and, we are happy to add, it has been one to which every patriotic citizen can look back with satisfaction and pride.

By a very proper resolution, adopted shortly after the organization, the business of the session was restricted to the subject which obliged the President to convene Congress in July. No time has been wasted in irrelevant discussions, and no measure have been passed but those bearing on the war.

In the first place, the unauthorized acts performed by the President with a view of preventing the spread of the rebellion and the capture of Washington by the rebels, have been duly confirmed and ratified. This, perhaps, was hardly necessary. Though cases in a Government of delegated powers, and we have a written charter limiting the authority of the President, still it would be absurd to urge that, in a case of vital and instant necessity, the President ought rather to allow the Government to go to pieces than assume powers not expressly delegated to him. The latter necessarily must yield to the spirit of the law. Every one can see that if Mr. Lincoln had not exceeded his authority, Jefferson Davis would have fulfilled his boast of ruling in Washington by the middle of May, and the nation would have gone to pieces. Is any further justification needed for Mr. Lincoln's conduct? Leading members of Congress thought not, and voted a bill of ratification—not because it was necessary, or because Congress had any power to make that legal which was in itself illegal; but simply in order to share Mr. Lincoln's honorable responsibility.

The President has been authorized, by each of two concurrent Acts, to call into the field an army of 500,000 men, and various important Acts have been passed to promote the efficiency of this army. We have not space to discuss these in detail; we may mention, however, that the President has been authorized to remove incompetent officers, and that a judicious scheme has been adopted for securing the retirement of officers who are superannuated. Five hundred thousand Northern men ought to suffice to crush out treason and rebellion in a far shorter period of time than three years, which is the term of service for most of the volunteers called into the field. In all probability the work will be done in a year, and with less than three-fifths of the authorized force. But Congress has been wisely prodigal of resources.

Appropriations have been made for building, purchasing gun-boats, twelve side-wheel steamers of light draught, and four first-class sloops of war; besides which the President has been authorized to buy or hire as many merchant vessels as may be necessary to perfect the blockade and put down piracy. Acts have been passed directing the enlistment of the proper number of seamen and marines for this naval force. Here again the wise liberality of Congress is to be commended. There is no stint to the power conferred upon the President in regard to the navy. He may have a thousand vessels in commission by November if he needs them. If a deficiency should arise either in our land or our naval force, the fault will not rest with Congress.

To provide for the expenses of the war various Acts have been passed: one authorizing a loan of $250,000,000, to be obtained by the issue of ther 7 per cent. bonds or Treasury Notes bearing 7-3 per cent. interest, and an issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury Notes bearing no interest; another authorizing the issue of $20,000,000 of 6 per cent. Treasury Notes convertible into 6 per cent. stock; another imposing a direct tax on incomes and various kinds of property, and also increasing customs duties, etc., etc. At the time we write it is impossible to state accurately what aggregate amount of money will be raised by these various Acts. But it can not fall short of $350,000,000, and it may amount to $400,000,000. So far, therefore, as money is concerned, Congress has been lavish. Opinions differ with regard to the wisdom of some provisions in the Loan Act. But there is no doubt that, under it, Mr. Lincoln will obtain ample present means for the prosecution of the war, and this being secured, matters of detail may for the present be dismissed from consideration.

Acts have been passed providing for the punishment of conspiracy against the Government; for the collection of duties on shipboard where collectors can not perform their duties ashore; for the closing of rebel ports; and for the confiscation of property—including slaves—employed by rebels in the war against the Government. This last measure is the only one which refers in any way to the original cause of the war. A resolution passed the House declaring that it was no part of the duty of United States soldiers to recapture fugitive slaves; but another resolution also passed, declaring that the war is prosecuted solely for the re-establishment of the authority of the Government—thus tacitly admitting that our troops are not designed to interfere with the institution. The subject of the future relations of the Government with slavery was by general consent deferred till the winter session. When we have added that resolutions passed the Senate expelling the senators from the seceded States, while a resolution passed the House expelling a member now in arms against the Government, we shall have enumerated all the leading measures of the extra session.

It has been eminently a fruitful and a satisfactory session. With few exceptions, members have been animated by hearty patriotism and sound common sense. No time has been wasted in idle debate. Never have we seen speech-making for buncombe. It is pleasant, too, to remember that, even at this crisis, members showed a sufficiently keen sense of the value of liberty of speech to refrain from gagging the traitors who were insolent enough to parade their treason in the halls of Congress. Mr. Benjamin Wood, for instance, whose political and commercial career reflect such honor on this city, has not favored the country with his views, except by his votes, which have always been against the country's cause. Messrs. Breckinridge, Vallandigham, Burnett, and a few others have talked treason to their heart's content without let or hindrance. It is better so. To have expelled Vallandigham or Burnett would have made martyrs of them, and might have kept them alive. Now they will go back to their people with the brand of treason on their brow, and a record which will sink them to the lowest depth of shame and contempt. In bright contrast with them stand the new members from Virginia and a majority of the delegations from Kentucky and Maryland. The day is not far distant, we trust, in which such men as Mr. Carlile and his followers in Congress will control the destiny of the States from which they come; they have shown, during this Extra Session, that they are worthy of the trust.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NECESSITY OF WAR.

In Napier's "History of the Peninsular War" there is a short sentence which shall serve us as a text for a short sermon. "Napoleon now changed the system of the war." He had been taught by circumstances as every general is, and as we have been in our present struggle.

Up to the day at Bull Run our policy was naturally indicated by the word that describes the enemy's position. It is a rebellion. The Government is supposed to be overthrown, and, therefore, it naturally dealt with the difficulty as with a riot upon a great scale. It naturally sought rather to sustain the Union army than to strike the rebels. It permitted, in that view, a certain freedom of intercourse. It accepted batile when and where the rebels chose. It was forbearing and reluctant, and even possibly hoped to restore its authority without much fighting. So many men, so much money, so much time assumed, that it may even have hoped to tire out or intimidate the rebellion.

The day at Bull Run showed that this policy was impracticable. "Napoleon now changed the system of the war."

The movement it still a rebellion, but the method of the rebels is war, and a war of desperation and vindictiveness. The Government—we mean—and no recent steps show that it will—also treat the suppression as a matter of war. The object is by military force to restore the supremacy of the Government. The rebels are in complete command of the section they possess. They are earnest, resolute, decided; and they have united against the Government than the Colonies were against England. But, for all that, they are only a faction of citizens aiming to destroy the Government of the whole.

Their section will, therefore, doubtless be treated like the country of a foe. It will be absolutely blockaded by land and sea. All communication with the loyal part of the country will be cut off. Instead of allowing the rebels to hold their great force in Virginia, where they wish to be and where they prefer to fight us, we shall desire to drive them out of Virginia by blockade and take position upon it; but by sudden descents along their coast, by threatening and destroying their cities and their railroads, compelling them in the rear, and compel a retreat, or insure the demoralization of their army in Virginia. If the men from the Gulf States and from the West there are in danger they will leave Virginia to defend herself and fly homeward.

The rebels have appealed to war against the Government of the whole people: let them abide the result of their appeal. Their rebellion is to be suppressed at every cost. If the lauding of our soldiers upon their coasts agitates their slaves—as is they who have done it, for they can not suppose that in appealing to war they were to have all of its advantages and none of its pains. They have made this war that they might extend slavery. Should their slaves rise, they would understand one of many reasons why the people would not suffer this nation to be at the mercy of such a system. If what they boast as their strength shall prove to be their weakness, it is not the fault of the people who did not raise their hands until they were compelled. If their crops are destroyed, if their trade is ruined, if their homes are laid desolate—they have only themselves to accuse and curse. We wanted no war—we asked for no war —we disbelieved in the necessity of war—and up to the day of Bull Run we sacredly supposed that still the worst of war might be avoided.

They have opened our eyes fully at last. Let no man grieve that it was done so slowly. Let no man regret that his Government refused to believe in the total, bloody, mad treachery of so many citizens. From the fearful day at Bull Run dates war. Not polite war, not incredulous war, not conciliatory war, but war which breaks hearts and blights homes; war that by bloody and terrible blows teaches ourselves rebellion that it shall suffer in misery, and ends, and that wherever it can be harmed there the blow shall fall, until, in absolute submission, it shall sue for peace.

And for the security of the time still loyal during the traitors this course will be the swiftest and surest. War can make no discrimination. The shell that lands in the city streets destroys alike the life and the property of the rebel and the true man; and every Union man in the rebellious section will see and appreciate the sharp necessity.

He will say as John Hancock said when Boston was to be bombarded—"All that I have is in that city—but I prefer it to liberty." He will say what John Jay said, all of whose property was in Westchester, "I wish our army well stationed in the Highlands, and properly provisioned." In all times demand the same spirit in patriots now as then.

For since the appeal is to war, war must decide. There is not a loyal man in the country whose indignation with the rebels would not be mingled with pity, if he could truly say "they have been grossly wronged." That no man can truly say. He can only exclaim as Landor makes Washington spirit away the Spirit of Conservatism: "Such at last is become the audacity of Power, from a century or more of holidays and riot, it now complains that a sleeping act of its prerogative is too limit the exercise of its malignity. I lament that there are those who can hear no lesson of humanity, unless we write it broadly with the point of the sword."

"RIGHTS" AND WRONGS.

THE Journal of Commerce, the Bourbon of newspapers, which thinks that the Government of the United States is a kind of self-elected Grand Turnson, which is smitten with horror if a man is arrested who is notoriously engaged in measures to overthrow the Government, and which looks severely upon the seizure of United States property and the outrage of the United States flag by armed rebels, suggests that no war should be held to serve the Union by promising Mr. Jeff Davis that, if he will only stop trying to destroy it, he shall have his own way in all that he wants in it. In other words, the Journal of Commerce thinks that the country ought to satisfy "the South" by assuring it that its rights will be assailed.

It happens that the case is precisely the other way. "The North," by which is meant the majority of the people of the country, is the party which is to be "satisfied" by any arrangement that may follow this war. "The South" knows, and the Journal knows, that the Government of this country has been always controlled by "the South" and its "rights," by which it means slavery. They all know that the Government has never assailed those "rights," and the last Congress very unnecessarily tied up its hands in the matter as much as it could. It does not assail them. They were not threatened. They knew perfectly well that there was no cause for a revolution, and therefore Mr. Davis's message very insisted that it was not a revolution at all, but merely a "peaceful secession;" not a step against the Constitution, but under it and by it. That Mr. Stephens said precisely the opposite was not surprising, for he is a shrewder man than his chief, and knew that "the Confederacy" is simply folly, revolution may always hope to gain dignity by success.

"The South" knows and always knew what respect it has for constitutional government, for national honor, and for private faith; having plunged the country into desperate revolution, it could no longer control the Government for its own interest; having smitten all prosperity, and struck a deadly blow at every material interest, and laborer in the country, now announces through its organ in New York that it will consent to forgive us upon condition of a guarantee that it shall have its old control of national affairs.

To state the thing is to settle it. But "the South" might as well understand now as later, that "the North," after conquering this rebellion, means to have guarantees for its rights. Those rights are the constitutional liberties of every American citizen; his right of going freely every where in the country, and of freely expressing every where his opinions; his right to trade with "the South" in all ways enjoyed, and as the Journal of Commerce daily proves, does still enjoy at "the North." Those rights are symbolized by the flag, and to that protection the Government is pledged by its very existence, any thing in any State law to the contrary notwithstanding.

After this war is over, "the South," and the Journal of Commerce, and Messrs. Breckinridge, Barnett, Vallandigham, Wood, & Co., will find that the rights of the people, of liberty, and of a firm government, will be considered and secured before the "rights" of the South. To break up the Government when they are defeated in an election.

OUR BANNER IN THE SKY.

CHURCH'S little picture, which Goupil & Co. have printed in colors, is a visible image of the American mind at this moment. Faith, symbolized by our flag, flames in the forehead of the morning sky. It is a lovely and pardonable conceit of the painter to hint in this way the justice of our cause. With stars and gleaming vapor he writes our story on the sky. The heavens approve. Good men applaud. We fight the good fight of our fathers and the freedom they have left us, against a monstrous despotism and causeless rebellion, which wages a bloody and inhuman war. And and amidst this might as well hope to steal those stars and stripes of light from the heavens as to pluck from our great heroic heart and hand of this nation the triumph and the peace that the stars and stripes prefigure.

THE GORILLA WAR.

DR. JOHN EDWARD GRAY writes a reply to Mr. John Murray, on the 6th of July, reaffirming the "many inaccuracies" and "extraordinary contradictions" which he thinks he has found in M. Du Chaillu's book; and the Athenæum, in which so much of the war has been waged, declares that it can not allow the contest to go on longer in its pages.

Captain Burton, meanwhile, himself an eminent African traveler and member of the Ethnological Society, in the teeth of what is considered the most daring of modern travelers, whose story of adventure is singularly simple and fascinating. In the mean time, it should be said that Mr. Chester he is ever likely to be mistaken for Lord Chesterfield, it might be answered that he will probably be as whenever Mr. Morton shall be confounded with Professor Owen.

THE CONDITIONS OF WAR.

WAR is among the oldest historical facts. The world has always been fighting more or less. It is the final appeal when ignorant men quarrel or when wrong men differ. It is not pleasant to fight your enemy, but it may be necessary to kill him. If a man sincerely thinks that he ought to cut your throat, he can not complain if you fight with equal sincerity that he ought not. And if he persist, he can not quarrel with your persistence.

The principle of war is always the same. And however science may improve the means of war, it will have its principle untouched. And however civilization and the most enlightened public sentiment, so long as it remains any where unabolished, it will there be founded upon the same principle. It is aims to compel, either by force or fear or by bodily injury. It aims to fall with irresistible force upon the foe, that he may be either mentally or physically conquered.

To the success of war, therefore, whether in the half-fabulous early era of Rome, or the latest year of the Christian era, certain conditions are manifestly essential. Two of them, and after the grand one of adequate force, the most essential are secrecy and unanimity. As can not fight so well if the enemy knows how and where you are going to strike, or if your own counsels are distracted, or if you have a band of generals instead of one leader.

These two conditions have always been forcibly secured by every nation which undertook war. War is in its nature despotic, and must therefore be directed absolutely. When the Roman Republic was in peril, it named a Dictator for the time. In French Revolution was quelled only by the will and word of one man, Napoleon Bonaparte. In the trouble of the Fronde, Cromwell defeated royalty by putting the supreme military power into the hands of Cavalagne. In our Revolution the most serious impediment in the path of Washington was not the enemy so much as the Congress which criticised, doubted, and questioned his conduct of the war.

What then? Shall we have a Dictator? Certainly not; for the danger with him would be greater than the chance of any good defeat without him. Let us pass on to another paragraph to answer the question, what then?

GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

NEITHER our system, our education, nor our common sense would allow us to desire or accept a dictator or any other irresponsible employment of public affairs. The contest we wage is for free, popular institutions, which are confessedly based upon the right of men. The most absolute freedom of discussion is one of the chief of those rights. By consequence, another of those rights is necessarily frank and free speech except for overt acts of treason. Properly speaking, our Constitution takes no cognizance of thoughts or words. It only requires allegiance and no that he considers a Republic a failure, and that he heartily desires a King. But he is still not a traitor, under the Constitution. He is defended to the last in his full right of saying so if he wishes: and he is justly defended.

But when we engage in war, or in the suppression of a sectional rebellion upon so great a scale that it is virtually war, we undertake to use a machine whose efficiency depends, as it always depended, upon the same things—adequate force, secrecy, and unanimity. The force is supplied by the glad enthusiasm of free people. It is, as becomes our system, voluntary. And so must the other two be. They must be entirely voluntary. And since we can not have, and ought not to have a law restraining the expression of opinion—it must be left to the patriotic good sense of the people. Neither to please the enemy nor embarrass ourselves by an incessant carping and quibbling at the management of our affairs. What is carping and quibbling is precisely the point to be left to the general common sense.

Our system presupposes enough discretion in the citizens not to destroy itself. It implies in its very nature that liberty does not necessarily decline into licentiousness. Its very claim is that

THE WORK OF THE EXTRA SESSION.

BEFORE this paper reaches its readers Congress will have adjourned, after a brief session of rather more than a month. It has been, in many respects, the most unconventional session of Congress in our history; and, we are happy to add, it has been one to which every patriotic citizen can look back with satisfaction and pride.

By a very proper resolution, adopted shortly after the organization, the business of the session was restricted to the subject which obliged the President to convene Congress in July. No time has been wasted in irrelevant discussions, and no measures have been passed but those bearing on the war.

In the first place, the unauthorized acts performed by the President with a view of preventing the spread of the rebellion and the overture of Washington by the rebels, have been duly confirmed and ratified. This, perhaps, was hardly necessary. Though ours is a Government of delegated powers, and we have a written charter limiting the authority of the President, still it would be absurd to urge that, in a case of vital and instant necessity, the President ought rather to allow the Government to go to pieces than assume powers not expressly delegated to him. The letter must sometimes yield to the spirit of the law. Every one can see that if Mr. Lincoln had not exceeded his authority, Jefferson Davis would have fulfilled his boast of ruling in Washington by the middle of May, and the nation would have gone to pieces. Is any further justification needed for Mr. Lincoln's conduct? Leading members of Congress ought not, and voted a bill of indemnification—not because it was necessary, or because Congress had any power to make that legal which was in itself illegal; but simply in order to share Mr. Lincoln's honorable responsibility.

The President has been authorized, by each of two successive Acts, to call into the field an army of 500,000 men, and various important Acts have been passed to promote the efficiency of this army. We have not space to discuss them individually; we may mention, however, that the President has been authorized to remove incompetent officers, and that a judicious scheme has been adopted for securing the retirement of officers who are supernumerary. Five hundred thousand Northern men ought to suffice to crush out treason and rebellion in a far shorter period of time than three years, which is the term of service for most of the volunteers called into the field. In all probability the work will be done in a year, and with less than three-fourths of the authorized force. But Congress has been wisely prodigal of resources.

Appropriations have been made for building twenty-three gun-boats, twelve steam-boat steamers of light draught, and four first-class sloops of war; besides which the President has been authorized to buy or hire as many merchant vessels as may be necessary to perfect the blockade and put down piracy. Acts have been passed directing the enlistment of the proper number of seamen and marines for this naval force. Here again the wise liberality with Congress is to be commended. There is no stint to the power conferred upon the President in regard to the navy. He may have as many vessels in commission by November if he needs them. If a deficiency should arise either in our land or our naval force, the fault will not rest with Congress.

To provide for the expenses of the war various Acts have been passed: one authorizing a loan of $250,000,000, to be obtained by issuing either 7·30 cent. bonds or Treasury Notes bearing 7·30 per cent. interest, and an issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury Notes bearing no interest; another authorizing the issue of $20,000,000 of 6 per cent. Treasury Notes convertible into 6 per cent. stock; another imposing a direct tax on incomes and various kinds of property; another increasing various duties, etc., etc. At this time we write it is impossible to state accurately what aggregate amount of money will be raised by the various Acts. But it is certain that fall short of $250,000,000, and it may amount to $400,000,000. So far, therefore, as money is concerned, Congress has been lavish. Opinions differ with regard to the wisdom of some provisions in the Loan Act. But there is no doubt that, under it, Mr. Lincoln will obtain ample present means for the prosecution of the war, and this being secured, matters of detail may for the present be dismissed from consideration.

Acts have been passed providing for the punishment of conspiracy against the Government; for the collection of duties on shipboard where collectors can not perform their duties ashore; for the closing of rebel ports; and for the confiscation of property—including slaves—employed by rebels in the war against the Government. This last measure is the only one which refers in any way to the original cause of the war. A resolution passed the House declaring that it was no part of the duty of United States soldiers to recapture fugitive slaves; but another resolution also passed, declaring that the war is prosecuted solely for the re-establishment of the authority of the Government—thus tacitly admitting that our troops are not designed to interfere with the slave institution. It has been eminently a fruitful and a satisfactory session. With few exceptions, members have been animated by hearty patriotism and sound common sense. No time has been wasted in idle debate. Never was there less speech-making for buncombe. It is pleasant, too, to remember that, even at this crisis, members showed a sufficiently keen sense of the value of liberty of speech to refrain from gagging the reporters. Never were senators brought to parade their treason in the halls of Congress; Mr. Benjamin Wood, the member whose political and commercial connections with such honor on this city, has not favored the country with his views, except by his votes, which have always been against his country; but Messrs. Breckinridge, Bright, Powell, Bennett, and a few others have talked treason to their heart's content without let or hindrance. It is better so. To have expelled Vallandigham or Bennett would have made martyrs of them, and might have kept them alive. Now they will go back to their people with the brand of treason on their brow, and will be received with small them to the lowest depth of shame and contempt. In bright contrast with them stand the new members from Virginia and a majority of the delegations from Kentucky and Maryland. The day is not far distant, we trust, in which such men as Mr. Carlile and his followers in Congress will control the Southern States from which they come; they have shown, during this Extra Session, that they are worthy of the trust.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NECESSITY OF WAR.

IN Napier's "History of the Peninsular War" there is a short sentence which shall serve us as a text for a short sermon. "Napoleon now changed the system of the war." He had been taught by circumstances as every general is, and as we have been in our present struggle.

Up to the day at Bull Run our policy was naturally indicated by the word that describes the enemy's position. It is a rebellion. The Government is supposing an insurrection at first, therefore, it naturally deals with the difficulty as with a riot upon a great scale. It naturally sought rather to sustain the Union men at the South than to strike the rebels. It permitted, in that view, a certain freedom of intercourse. It accepted battle when and where the enemy chose. It did not forming and reluctant, and even possibly hoped to restore its authority without much fighting. Senator men, as we have already said, understood, that it may even have hoped to tire out or intimidate the rebellion.

The day at Bull Run showed that this policy was impracticable. "Napoleon now changed the system of the war."

The movement is still a rebellion, but the method of the rebels is war, and a war of desperation and vindictiveness. The Government must now—and its recent steps show that it will—accept the suppression as a matter of war. The object is by military force to restore the supremacy of the Government. The rebels are in open defiance of all the section they possess. They are earnest, resolute, devoted; and much more united against the Government than the Union men are against Espeland. But, for all that, they are only a faction of citizens aiming to destroy the Government of the whole.

Their section will, therefore, doubtless be treated like the country of an enemy. It will be absolutely blockaded by land and sea. All communication with the loyal part of the country will be cut off. Instead of allowing the rebels to hold their ground till they are driven, they wish to be and where they prefer to fight us, we shall decline to allow them to choose the battle-field and the position upon which they will fight. Besides along their coast, by threatening and destroying their cities and towns, incessantly harass them in the rear, and compel a vast force to keep the demoralization of their army in Virginia. If the men from the Gulf States know that their homes are in danger they will leave Virginia to defend herself and fly homeward.

The rebels have appealed to war against the Government of the free people: let them abide the result of their appeal. Their rebellion is to be suppressed at every cost. If the landing of our soldiers upon their coasts agitates their slaves—it is they who have done it, for they can not suppose that in appealing to war they were to have all of its advantages and none of its pains. They have made this war that they might extend slavery. Should their slaves rise, they would understand one of many reasons why the people would not suffer the nation to be at the mercy of such a system. If what they boast as their strength shall prove to be their weakness, it is not the fault of the people who did not raise their hands until they were compelled. If their crops are destroyed, if their trade is ruined, if their homes are laid desolate—they have only themselves to accuse and curse. We wanted no war—we asked for no war —we disbelieved in the necessity of war—and up to the day of Bull Run we sincerely supposed that still the worst of war might be avoided.

They have opened our eyes fully at last. Let no man grieve that it was done so slowly. Let no man regret that his Government refused to believe in the total, bloody, mad treachery of so many citizens. From the fearful day at Bull Run dates our war. Not polite war, not incredulous war, not conciliatory war, but war that breaks hearts and blights homes. Only by bloody and terrible blows teaches causeless rebellion that it shall suffer in mind, body, and estate, and that wherever it can be harmed there the love shall fall, until, in absolute submission, it shall sue for peace.

And for the security of the men still loyal among the traitors this course will be the swiftest and surest. War can make no discrimination. The shell that bursts in the city streets destroys alike the life and the property of the rebel and the true man; and every Union man in the rebellious section will see and approve the sharp necessity.

He will say, "Our city has struck soil when Boston was to be bombarded—"All that I have is in that city—but I give it willingly." He will say what he will say, but whose property was it that Manchester. "I wish our army well stationed in the Highlands, and all the lower country destroyed." The times demand the same spirit in patriots now as then.

For since the appeal is to war, war must decide. There is not a loyal man in the country whose indignation with the rebels would not be mingled with pity, if he could truly say "they have been greatly wronged." But no one can truly say. He can only exclaim as Landor makes Washington say in one of the Imaginary Conversations: "Such at last is human nature. Twenty years, half a century or more of holidays and riot, it now complains that you deprive it of its prerogative if you limit the exercise of liberty. I know not that there are those who can learn no lesson of humanity, unless we write it broadly with the point of the sword."

"RIGHTS" AND WRONGS.

THE Journal of Commerce, the Bourbon of newspapers, which thinks that the Government of the United States ought not to defend itself against treason, which is unwilling that even if a man is a rascal who is notoriously engaged in measures to overthrow the Government, and which looks serenely upon the treason of Mr. Jefferson Davis that is the outrage of the United States flag by armed rebels, suggests that a convention should be held to settle the "rights" of the South. If Mr. Davis and the country ought to satisfy "the South" by assuring it that its rights will not be assailed.

It happens that the people is precisely the other way. The word "South," by which is meant the majority of the people of the South, is the word which is to be "satisfied" by any arrangement that may follow this war. The "South" knows, and the Journal knows, that it has been ruled for the Union men have always controlled by "the South" and its "rights," by which it means slavery. They also know that the Government has never assailed those "rights," and the last Congress very unnecessarily tied up its hands in the matter as much as it could. The people cared not at all. They were not threatened. They knew perfectly well that there was no cause for a revolution, and therefore Mr. Jefferson Davis's insistent declaration that not a revolution at all, but merely a "peaceful secession" not a step against the Constitution, but under it—will be laughed at. That Stephens and precisely the opposite was not surprising, for he is a shrewder man than his chief, and knew that while "the people" are slightly revolutionary, they always hope to gain dignity by success.

"The South" having shown what respect it has for constitutional guarantees, for national honor, and for private faith; having plunged the country into desperate war because it could no longer control the Government as it was construed; having smitten all prosperity, and struck a deadly blow at every mechanic, merchant, and laborer in the country, and having brought its cause to that New York that it will consent to forgive us upon condition of our guarantees that it shall have its old control of national affairs.

To state the thing is to settle it. But "the South" might as well understand now as later, that "the North," which is determined this rebellion, means to have guarantees for its rights. Those rights are the constitutional privileges of every American citizen; his right to live freely every where in the country, and of freely expressing every where his opinion; the same right that "the South" has always enjoyed, and which, as the present struggle proves, does still enjoy at "the North." Those rights are symbolized by the flag, and to their protection the Government is pledged by its very existence, any thing in any State law to the contrary notwithstanding.

After this war is over, "the South," and the Journal of Commerce, and Messrs. Breckinridge, Burnett, Vallandigham, Wood, & Co., will find that the rights of the people of liberty, and of a firm government, will be considered and secured before the "right" of a faction to break up the Government when they are defeated in an election.

OUR BANNER IN THE SKY.

CHURCH'S little picture, which Goupil & Co. have printed in ochre, is a visible image of the American mind at this moment. Faith, symbolized by our flag, flames in the forehead of the morning sky. It is a lovely and pardonable conceit of the painter to limit in this way the justice of our cause. With stars and gleaming vapor he writes our story on the sky. The heavens approve. Good men applaud. We fight the good fight of our fathers and the freedom they have left us, against a monstrous despotism and causeless rebellion, which wages a bloody and inhuman war. And mad ambition might as well hope to stand those stars and stripes of light from the heavens as to efface from the great heroic heart and hand of this nation the truth and the peace that the stars and stripes prefigure.

THE GORILLA WAR.

DR. JOHN EDWARD GRAY writes a reply to Mr. John Murray, on the 6th of July, reaffirming the "many inaccuracies and extraordinary contradictions" which he thinks he has found in M. Du Chaillu's book; and the Athenæum, in which so much of the war has been waged, declares that it can not allow the contest to go on longer in its pages.

Captain Burton, meanwhile, himself an eminent African traveler and member of the Ethnological Society, at the meeting of which the exasperated Du Chaillu was so severely censured by his feelings, writes to the Times that he hopes "the person excluded from the future meetings of the Society will be, not Mr. Du Chaillu, but the gentleman who, after taking undue advantage of our protection, insulted a foreigner and a guest, and received (and quietly pocketed) the punishment."

Despite Dr. Gray and Mr. Morton, M. Du Chaillu has established his name as that of one of the most daring and adventurous travelers, whose story of adventure is singularly simple and fascinating. If, in the mean time, it should be asked whether he is a real liar, he is ready to defend his character, field, it might be answered that he will probably be so whenever Mr. Morton shall be confounded with Professor Owen.

THE CONDITIONS OF WAR.

WAR is among the oldest historical facts. The world has always been fighting more or less. It is the final appeal when ignorant men quarrel or when grave men differ. It is not necessary to hate your enemy, but it may be necessary to fight. If a man sincerely thinks that he ought to cut your throat, he can not complain if you think with equal sincerity that you ought not. And if he persists, he can not quarrel with your persistence.

The principle of war is always the same. And however science may improve the means of war, it will leave its principle untouched. And however civilization and the moral sentiment may abolish war, so long as it remains war where unabolished, it will there be founded upon the same principle. It aims to control, either by killing, the will of terror or by bodily injury. It aims to fall with irresistible force upon the foe, that he may be either morally or physically conquered.

To the success of war, therefore, whether in the half-fabulous early era of Rome, or the latest year of the Christian era, certain conditions are manifold and essential. Two of them, and after the grand one of adequate force, the most essential are secrecy and promptness. You can not fight well if the enemy knows how and where you are going to strike, or if you own counsels are distracted, or if you have a board of Generals instead of one leader.

These two conditions have always been forcibly secured by every nation which undertook war. War is in its nature despotic, and must therefore be directed absolutely. When the Roman Republic was in peril, it named a Dictator pro hac vice. In the French Revolution it was controlled by the will and word of one man, Napoleon Bonaparte. In the troubles of '48 in France, peace was restored only by putting the military power absolutely into the hands of Cavaignac. In our Revolution the most serious impediment in the path of Washington was not the enemy so much as the Congress which criticised, doubted, and questioned his conduct of the war.

What then? Shall we have a Dictator? Certainly not; for the danger with him would be greater than the chance of delay and defeat without him. Let us pass on to another paragraph to answer the question, what then?

GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

NEITHER our system, our education, nor our common sense would allow us to desire or accept a dictator or a supreme supreme, temporarily exempted from public affairs. The contest we wage is for free, popular institutions, which are confessedly based upon the intelligence of the people. Freedom of action of discussion is one of the chief of those rights. By consequence, another of them is immunity from legal penalty for the free expression of treason. Properly speaking, our Constitution takes no cognizance of thoughts or words. A man may openly think and say that he considers a Republic a failure, and that he heartily desires a King. But he is still not a traitor, under the Constitution. He is defended to the last in the right of saying as if he wishes: and he is justly defended.

But when we engage in war, or in the suppression of a sectional rebellion on a gigantic scale that it is virtually war, we undertake to use a machine whose efficiency depends, as it has always depended, upon two things—adequate force, secrecy, and unanimity. The force is supplied by the glad enthusiasm of the people. It is, as becomes our system, voluntary. And so must the other two be. They must be entirely voluntary. And since we can not have, and ought not to have a law restraining the expression of opinion—it must be left to the patriotic good sense of the people. Neither to please the enemy nor embarrass ourselves by an incessant carping and quibbling at the management of our affairs. What is carping and quibbling is precisely the point to be left to the general common sense.

Our system presupposes enough discretion in the citizens not to destroy itself. It implies in its very nature that liberty does not necessarily decline into licentiousness. Its very claim is that

GENERAL MANSFIELD.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

BRIG.-GEN. M'DOWELL, U.S.A.

GENERAL IRVIN M'DOWELL, whose portrait will be found above, is a native of Ohio, from which State he was appointed to a cadetship in the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1834. He graduated in July, 1838, and was immediately promoted to the rank of Brevet Second Lieutenant. He was assistant instructor in tactics at West Point from September to November, 1841, and Adjutant to October, 1845; he was promoted to a First Lieutenancy in October, 1842; Aid-de-camp to General Wool from October, 1845, to May, 1847, and took an active part in the war with Mexico. He received the honorary rank of Brevet Captain for gallant conduct in the battle of Buena Vista, February 23, 1847; promoted to post of Assistant Adjutant-General, with rank of Captain, in May, 1847, and relinquished rank in line in February, 1851; Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Major, March, 31, 1856; Brevet Brigadier-General, May, 1861. He commanded the United States troops on the recent advance to Bull Run, and though unfortunate in that affair is not blamed by any one for his management of the attack.

BRIG.-GEN. MANSFIELD, U.S.A.

GENERAL J. K. F. MANSFIELD, whose portrait we give herewith, is a native of Connecticut, from which State he was appointed to a cadetship in the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1817. He graduated in July, 1822, and was immediately appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers. He was subsequently promoted to a First Lieutenancy in March, 1832; Captain, July, 1838; Chief Engineer of the army commanded by General Taylor in the Mexican war, 1846-'47. He was promoted to the honorary rank of Brevet-Major for gallant and distinguished services in defense of Fort Brown, on the Rio Grande, May 9, 1846, and was severely wounded in the battle of Monterey. He received the honorary rank of Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel for gallant services in several conflicts with the enemy in September, 1846, and Brevet Colonel for distinguished bravery in the battle of Buena Vista, February 23, 1847. He was appointed Inspector-General of the army, with the rank of Colonel, May 28, 1853, thereupon relinquishing his rank in the Engineer Corps. He held this responsible position until recently, when President Lincoln, appreciating the high scientific and military talent of this distinguished officer, promoted him to a full Brigadier-Generalship, and placed him in command of the troops at Washington. He is about fifty-five years of age, tall and graceful in form, with a snowy beard.

FLAG-OFFICER STRINGHAM,

COMMANDING THE ATLANTIC BLOCKADING SQUADRON.

COMMODORE SILAS H. STRINGHAM, whose portrait we publish below, is a native of the State of New York, and was born near Newburgh, Orange Co. He has been connected with our navy and in active service since the year 1809, when he entered as midshipman, at the age of eleven. His advancement has been by the regular course of promotion, his present commission dating September, 1841. The Department at Washington have always had the fullest confidence in his ability, as is shown by the many and important commands in which he has been placed. Since holding his present rank he has successively been Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy-yard, followed by a cruise to the Brazils, then Commandant at the Norfolk Navy-yard, then a cruise as Commodore of the Mediterranean squadron, from whence he returned in July, 1855; was soon ordered to the Charlestown Navy-yard as Commandant, holding that position some four years; upon leaving there he was the recipient of various testimonials of esteem and regard from those under his command. Upon the incoming of the present Administration he was early ordered to Washington on special duty, and upon deciding to blockade all the Southern ports, he was ordered to his present command, reaching from Key West on the south to Cape Charles, at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, on the north, with the Minnesota, a forty-gun steamer, as the flag-ship, and some twenty-five vessels in all, manned by 3500 sailors and marines. The fleet is the most important ever put in commission by the Department (although not yet as large as it should be to be entirely effective).

In person the Commodore is of medium height, and a compact, athletic frame, of manly bearing and frank demeanor; in manner, a pleasing mixture of gentleman-like refinement and sailor-like frankness, with a character of high moral tone, "without fear and without reproach." No officer is more beloved and respected by those who serve under him than Commodore Stringham, while we of the Empire State know our honor, and that of the flag of our Union, is in safe keeping while under his care.

COL. FRANCIS P. BLAIR, JUN.

We publish herewith the portrait of COLONEL FRANCIS PRESTON BLAIR, JUN., of St. Louis, Missouri, Member of Congress, and Chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. Blair comes of one of the most distinguished families in the country. His father, Francis P. Blair, Sen., was the editor of the Globe under General Jackson, and the intimate personal friend and adviser of that President, and of his successor, Van Buren. He is still alive. Three of the sons of Mr. Blair, Sen., have distinguished themselves in politics. One has been Governor of Michigan; another, Montgomery, is Postmaster-General; a third, perhaps the most distinguished of all, is the one whose portrait we now publish. Born at Lexington, Kentucky, in 1821, Mr. Blair chose the law for his profession and St. Louis for his residence. On the outbreak of the Mexican war he served as a private under Kearney for some months. He was elected for two consecutive terms to the Missouri Legislature, and in 1856 and 1860 to Congress. Mr. Blair is known as the leader of the emancipationists of St. Louis, and is a man of extraordinary courage, energy, and perseverance.

RETURN OF A FORAGING PARTY TO PHILIPPI.

OUR special artist writes: "While in Philippi I was attracted by an immense row in the street in front of the Court-house, and ran with the entire population of the town to learn the cause. Instead of the arrival of secession prisoners, or of an army courier, I found the tumult occasioned by the return from the country of a foraging party of volunteers—a squad of some half dozen, under command of a sergeant, with their spoil. Each man carried one or more young pigs—from the suckling up to the 'likely' shoat—and the squad entered the street in rank with piggy shouldered or trailed, according to the orders of the officer, to the vociferous music of their captives. As they neared the camp the town pigs took the alarm, and made a rush for the spoilers, followed by every cur of the neighborhood. The sergeant ordered 'double-quick,' but one old sow was too fast for the men; she broke their ranks and scattered them as they had routed the secessionists on the same ground. They saved their bacon by a rush into the Court-house yard."

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.

On page 518 we illustrate the RESCUE OF COLONEL SMITH'S COMMAND from an overwhelming rebel attack by a force of Union cavalry under Governor Wood, of Illinois. Colonel Smith's command occupied the brick college building at Monroe, and the rebels, 1200 strong, had surrounded it and planted cannon so as to destroy the building and its inmates. A flag of truce had been sent out, but it was disregarded. Three hundred mounted men were at once sent to the rescue. On arriving at Monroe they formed a junction with Colonel Smith's force, who had intrenched themselves in the academy buildings. The rebels, 1200 strong, were grouped around over the prairies, out of the reach of Colonel Smith's rifles. They had two pieces of artillery, which were brought to bear, but the distance was so great that their balls were almost spent before they reached our lines. Colonel Smith's artillery, of longer range, did considerable execution. The fight lasted until dusk. The last shot from Colonel Smith's guns dismounted one of the enemy's. Just at that moment Governor Wood, of Illinois, fell on their rear with the cavalry sent from Quincy on Wednesday, completely routing them, and taking seventy-five prisoners, one gun, and a large number of horses. Twenty or thirty of the enemy were killed; but not a man of the Union forces was killed, although several were severely wounded.

RECAPTURE OF THE SCHOONER "ENCHANTRESS."

We give on page 519 an illustration of the RECAPTURE OF THE SCHOONER "ENCHANTRESS" BY THE GUN-BOAT "ALBATROSS," from a sketch by Mr. DONOVAN, of the latter craft. A letter in the Tribune thus describes the affair:

On Sunday, the 28th, after sailing two or three hours eastward and eastward, the Albatross sighted a vessel and gave chase, and soon fetched up to what proved to be the Enchantress, captured by the privateer Jeff Davis, six days out from Boston to St. Jago, and in possession of a prize crew of five rebels and a negro belonging to the schooner before she was taken. On speaking her and demanding where from and whence bound, she replied, "Boston for St. Jago." At this moment the negro rushed from the galley where the pirates had secreted him and jumped into the sea, exclaiming, "They are a privateer crew from the Jeff Davis, and bound for Charleston." The negro was picked up and taken on the Albatross. The prize was ordered to heave to, which she did. Lieut. Neville jumped aboard of her, and ordered the pirates into the boats, and to pull for the Albatross, where they were secured in irons. Two of the prisoners are Charleston pilots, one is from Boston, and two from Brooklyn—one of the latter has a brother in Fortress Monroe, and the other has a brother on the Roanoke. Prize-master Tobias D. Wendell was ordered on board the schooner, which was taken in tow by the Albatross, and arrived in Hampton Roads on Wednesday, the 31st. The Albatross will shortly proceed to Philadelphia or New York for repairs to her machinery. The vessel has now a reputation which is a terror to the rebels, on sea and coast, as a fighting craft which they had better give a wide berth to.

"THERE IS A SECRET DRAWER IN EVERY HEART—"

AFTER THE BATTLE.

OUR special artist in Washington has supplied us with the sketches which we reproduce on pages 513 and 519. One represents a WOUNDED ZOUAVE in the hospital at Washington looking gratefully up at the face of his kind hospital nurse. The poor fellow is evidently not used to the tender attention bestowed upon him by the lady volunteer; he does not quite understand it, and some secret well of honest, grateful feeling seems to have been suddenly opened in his heart. Another picture introduces us to the same character, the typical Zouave, relating his adventures at the Battle of Bull Run to a crowd of eager listeners on Pennsylvania Avenue. He is in his hour of triumph, and well he may be. He feels a quiet contempt for the men of his own age who were not at the battle; for he knows that henceforth no lady fair will smile on them so long as he or any of his comrades who were "in the battle" are near by.

THE REBEL FLAG AT HARPER'S FERRY.

ENCAMPMENT OF THE NINTH REGIMENT, N. Y. S. M., HARPER'S FERRY, VA., July 30, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

HAVING noticed in your paper of August 3 a sketch representing two members of the [illegible] leaving from the rebel flag at Harper's Ferry, [illegible] of the 4th, and flag at Harper's Ferry, [illegible] who performed the daring feat in question, I [illegible] this correction.

The facts, I [illegible] looking this correction.

On [illegible] with about a dozen of the men [illegible] crossed the river to Harper's Ferry [illegible] and strolled around the town. Seeing the [illegible] floating from the flag-staff, a member of Company C of the regiment, Edwin W. Butler by name, succeeded in climbing up to it and tearing it down. The person mentioned in your paper (Gen. Dickenson and George M. Smith) are not members of this regiment, nor were they present at the time the occurrence took place.

A portion of the State flag, which you mention, still remains, and was flying over the "Stars and Bars," which latter Butler succeeded in taking down. The stars and stripes proudly floats from the pole at present, directly under the State flag, nobody having displaced it. I take the liberty of inclosing you a small piece obtained from this "original Jacobs," who is one of my messmates.

Hoping you will give this an early insertion, and give honor to whom honor is due, I am, dear Sir,

Respectfully yours,

ISAAC S. SHARPE,
Co. C, Ninth Regt., N. Y. S. M.,
Pro tem.

It seems that there must have been two rebel flags hauled down at Harper's Ferry, one by Blakemore and McMullin, the other by Butler of the New-York Ninth. Our picture represented the former scene.—ED. Harper's Weekly.

OUR SECRET DRAWER.

THERE is a secret drawer in every heart,
Wherein we lay our treasures one by one;
Each dear remembrance of the buried past;
Each cherished relic of the time that's gone;

The old delights of childhood long ago;
The things we loved, because we knew them best;
The first discovered primrose in our path;
The cuckoo's earliest note; the robin's nest;

The merry bay-makings around our home;
Our rambles in the summer woods and lanes;
The story told beside the winter fire,
While the wind moaned across the window panes;

The golden dreams we dreamt in after-years:
Those magic visions of our young romance:
The sunny nooks, the fountains and the flowers,
Gilding the fairy landscape of our trance:

The link which bound us later still to one
Who fills a corner in our life to-day,
Without whom love we dare not dream how dark
The rest would seem, if it were gone away;

The song that thrill'd our souls with very joy;
The gentle word that unexpected came;
The gift we prized, because the thought was kind;
The thousand, thousand things that have no name.

All these in some fair hidden corner lie;
Within the mystery of that secret drawer,
Whose magic springs, though stranger hands may touch,
Yet none may gaze upon its guarded store.

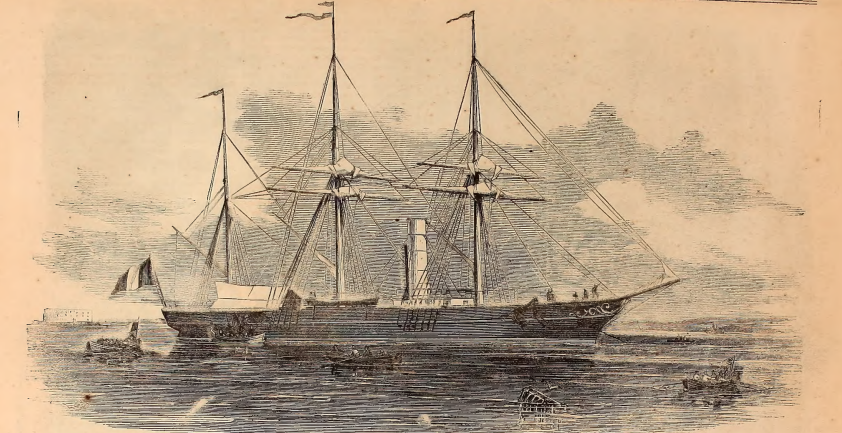
BAYONETING OUR WOUNDED.

On page 524 we illustrate a most disgraceful episode of the Battle of Bull Run, which would be incredible if it were not attested by so many reliable witnesses: we mean the BAYONETING OF OUR WOUNDED BY THE REBEL TROOPS. The following evidence of Surgeon Barnes, given to the reporter of the New York Tribune, is unfortunately too precise and clear to be questioned:

Surgeon Barnes, of the New York Twenty-eighth Volunteers, was in the field all through, and came out of it in his shirt sleeves, having lost coat, sash, watch, and all his surgical instruments, having been charged on by the 2d Horse Cavalry and compelled to leave the field, before which from under a tree where he had established the temporary quarters, and where he was attending to the wants of about twenty-five injured men, part of whom were accessionists.

Surgeon Barnes went up to the battle-field in the rear of the attacking column, and, as soon as our men began to fall, he took a position with his assistants under a tree, a little ravine. The wounded men were brought to him, and he took off his green sash and hung it on the tree to notify that the place was under the charge of a surgeon. The injured men were brought in rapidly, and in fifteen minutes he had under his charge nearly thirty. As fast as possible he attended to their hurts, and in a short time he had been compelled to perform a number of capital operations. He amputated four legs, three arms, a hand, and a foot, and attended to a number of minor injuries. By this time the enemy had discovered the place, and the nature of the men in charge, and began to pour in musket-balls, and to pick off the rebel cannon. The place became the rendezvous for the wounded men, and it was soon to be necessary to remove them. The Surgeon's Assistants and steward had become separated from him, and he had no one to act as ambulances, and was obliged to leave the wounded men and go himself. It was no easy matter to procure conveyances enough, and it was probably thirty minutes before the Surgeon returned with the necessary assistance. When he returned he found that every one of those wounded men had been bayoneted or sabred, and was dead. They were literally cut to pieces.

Other evidence abounds. An officer of the Massachusetts 5th, lying wounded on the field, heard the order given by a rebel officer to "bayonet the sons of —— of red shirts!" Cannon were trained on the soldiers who were bearing off the field the body of Colonel Cameron, and five were killed. The ambulance in which Colonel Wood (New York 14th) was being carried was repeatedly fired at.



THE "JEROME NAPOLEON," PRINCE NAPOLEON'S STEAM-YACHT, NOW IN THE HARBOR OF NEW YORK.

Lieutenant-colonel Chambers saw a wounded soldier bayoneted by a rebel in cold blood. Colonel Slocum, wounded, and bleeding to death, was fired at by cannon so that he had to be moved six times by the surgeons before his wounds could be dressed. The Black Horse Cavalry rode down to the Shelley Church, which was used as a hospital, and fired their revolvers through the windows at the wounded as they lay. In a word, scores upon scores of reliable witnesses testify that at this Bull Run battle the savages who fought under the Confederate Flag systematically butchered the wounded, and this not only in obedience to their own fiendish instincts, but by the order of their officers.

ON HER DEATH-BED.

A LULLABY.

Hush, baby, hush! the still dews are falling—
Silvery shuffles all the earth, and steals over the sea, love;
Fair rides the moon—but, ah, the fairest soon
Will never bring my darling back to me, love!

Hush, baby, hush! the gray light is dawning—
Shudder dies from earth and sea, and peace hurries away, love;
Fair glows the morn—but, ah, the morning light
Has other eyes than mine to fill to-day, love!

Hush, baby, hush! the dull winds are wailing—
Mournful over land and sea, and wild through the sky, love;
Yet, let them moan—the love that man can give
Will never fill my darling's heart like my love!

Ah, how they wail! And yet, they have tidings—
Tidings to a mother's soul too sweet not to be true, love;
Death may be dark; but soon there is a day
When Love Himself shall lead me back to you, love!

THE CAVALIER'S ESCAPE.

TRAMPLE! trample! went the roan,
Trap! trap! went the gray:
But pad! pad! pad! like a thing that was mad,
My chestnut broke away.—
It was just five miles from Salisbury town,
And but one hour to-day.

Thud! thud! came on the heavy roan,
Rap! rap! the mettled gray;
But my chestnut mare was of blood so rare,
That she showed them all the way.
Spur on! spur on!—I doffed my hat,
And wished them all good-day.

They splashed through miry rut and pool,
Splintered through fence and rail;
But chestnut Kate switched over the gate—
I saw them droop and tail.
To Salisbury town—but a mile of down,
Once over this brook and rail.

Trap! trap! I heard their steel hoofs beat
Past the walls of mossy stone;
The roan flew on at a staggering pace,
But blood is better than bone.

I patted old Kate, and gave her the spur,
For I knew it was all my own.

But trample! trample! came their steeds,
And I saw their walls' eyes burn;
I felt like a royal hart at bay,
And made me ready to turn.
I looked where highest grew the May,
And deepest arched the fern.

I flew at the first knave's sallow throat:
One blow, and he was down.
The second rogue fired twice, and missed;
I sliced the villain's crown.
Clove through the rest, and flogged brave Kate,
Past, fast to Salisbury town!

Pad! pad! they came on the level sward,
Thud! thud! upon the sand
With a gleam of swords, and a burning match,
And a shaking of flag and hand:
But one long bound, and I passed the gate,
Safe from the canting band.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S YACHT.

WE publish on this page a picture of PRINCE NAPOLEON'S YACHT, the Jerome Napoleon, now lying in this port, where she arrived on 27th. She is about 1200 tons measurement, and is propelled by a screw, with an engine of 300 horse power. She is handsomely modeled, and is rigged as a bark, in polacca style. In place of the usual white streak there is a wide gilt band around the ship. Her crew consists of 150 persons. The officers are dressed in the blue of the French navy, and wear neat tarpaulin hats. The servants wear the imperial livery. The interior arrangements and decorations of the ship are rich, without attempt at meretricious display. The officers' rooms are models of comfort and neatness in their arrangement and decorations. The great saloon is finished somewhat in the style of the grand saloon of the Great Eastern. She carries two 12-pound brass carronades for firing signals or salutes.

The following account of the distinguished travelers is from the Times:

Prince Napoleon is a son of Jerome Napoleon by his second wife, and stands, next after the Prince Imperial, heir to the throne of the Napoleons. He is about forty years of age—stands, about five feet eight, and rather like Napoleon the First in face.

His Princess Clotilde (Marie Therese Louise Clotilde, to write the name in full) is a daughter of Victor Emanuel, and it will be remembered that the union, a couple of years ago, was looked upon as a "political marriage." The alliance was determined upon by an intimate understanding between the two sovereigns, and the reciprocal interests of France and Piedmont, and the negotiations to bring it about were delayed more than a year. She was born in 1843, and is consequently at present in her fourteenth year, and is petite, of Italian complexion and features, and very prepossessing and unassuming in manners. With the Princess, as her first maid of honor, is the Duchess d'Abruzzes, also quite young and very pretty.

Among the suite of the Prince are two Colonels of the Empire, M. Bagon and M. Favre Pisani, both of them soldiers—the former Governor of the island of Guadaloupe, now a commander in the French navy, M. Bastide, and M. Maurice Sand, son of Madame George Sand, the illustrious novelist, and himself an author of mark. The commander of the vessel is M. Georgette de Bolson, and the officers are Lieutenant Brocquet, M. Brunet, Ensign and Artillery Officer of the ship; Ensign Marquis Arpino, of the great astronomer; Ensign De la Gueronniere, son of the French senator, newly elevated from the Parisian celestial ranks; M. Georgis, Lawyer; Surgeon Reboreau, and Chief-Engineer Monnier.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER III.

IT was some time before I could shake off the impression made on me by the words and the look of that dying man.

It was not that my conscience upbraided me. What had I done? Denounced a fraud which I held, in common with most men of sense in or out of my profession, to be one of those illusions by which quackery draws profit from the weakness of ignorance. Was I to blame if I had refused to treat with the grave respect due to asserted discovery in legitimate science pretensions to powers akin to the fables of wizards? was I to descend from the Academe of decorous science to examine whether a sleeper could read from a book placed at her back, or tell me at L—— what at that moment was being done by my friend at the Antipodes?

And what though Dr. Lloyd himself might be a worthy and honest man, and a sincere believer in the extravagances for which he demanded an equal credulity in others, do not honest men every day incur the penalty of ridicule if, from a defect of good sense, they make themselves ridiculous? Could I have foreseen that a satire so justly provoked would inflict so deadly a wound? Was I inhumanly barbarous because the antagonist destroyed was morbidly sensitive? My conscience, therefore, made me no reproach, and the public was as little severe as my conscience. The public had been with me in our contest—the public knew nothing of my opponent's death-bed accusations—the public knew only that I had attended him in his last moments—I saw me walk beside the bier that bore him to his grave—it praised the energy with which I set on foot a subscription for his orphan children, and the generosity with which I headed that subscription by a sum that was large in proportion to my means.

To that sum I did not, indeed, limit my contribution. The sobs of the poor female child rang still on my heart. As her grief had been keener than that of her brothers, she was soon be subjected to sharper trials than they, when the time came for her to fight her own way through the world; therefore I secured to her, that sum which, added to the little she would be traced to my hand, a sum to accumulate till she was of marriageable age, and which then might suffice for a small wedding portion; or, if she remained single, for an income that would place her beyond the temptation of want, or the bitterness of a servile dependence.

That Dr. Lloyd should have died in poverty was a matter of surprise at first, for his profits during the last few years had been considerable, and his mode of life far from extravagant. But just before the date of our controversy he had been induced to assist the brother of his lost wife, who was a junior partner in a London bank, with the loan of his accumulated savings. This man proved dishonest; he embezzled that and other sums intrusted to him, and fled the country. The same sentiment of cognizant affection which had cost Dr. Lloyd his fortune kept him silent as to the cause of the ills. It was reserved for his executors to discover the treachery of the brother-in-law whom he, poor man, would have generously screened from additional disgrace.

A wealthy and public-spirited merchant at L—— purchased the museum, which Dr. Lloyd's passion for natural history had formed; and the sums thus obtained that raised by subscription, sufficed, not only to discharge all debts due by the deceased, but to insure to the orphans the benefits of an education that might fit at least the boys to enter fairly armed into that game, more of skill than of chance, in which Fortune is really so little blinded that we see, in each turn of her wheel, wealth and its honors pass away from the lax fingers of ignorance and sloth to the resolute grasp of labor and knowledge.

Meanwhile a relation in a distant county unknown to the deceased, and who had long disappeared from the scene, and the tides of life in a commercial community soon flowed over the place which the dead man had occupied in the thoughts of his bustling townsfolk.

One person at L——, and only one, appeared to share and inherit the regret which the poor physician had denounced me on his death-bed. It was a gentleman named Vigors, distantly related to the deceased, and who had been in point of station, the most eminent of Dr. Lloyd's partisans in the controversy with myself; a man of no great scholastic acquirements, but of respectable abilities. He had that kind of power which the world concedes to respectable abilities, when accompanied with a temper more than usually stern, and a moral character more than usually austere. His ruling passion was to sit in judgment upon others; and, being a magistrate, he was the most active and the most rigid of all the magistrates L—— had ever known.

Mr. Vigors at first spoke of me with great bitterness, as having ruined, and in fact killed, his friend by the uncharitable and unscientific severity which he declared I had brought into what ought to have been an unprejudiced examination of simple matter of fact. But finding no sympathy in these charges, he had the discretion to cease from making them, contenting himself with a solemn shake of his head if the board any name mentioned in terms of praise, and an oracular sentence or two, such as "Time will show;" "All's well that ends well," &c. Mr. Vigors, however, mixed very little in the more convivial intercourse of the townspeople. He called himself domestic; but, in truth, he was ungregarious. A stiff man, starched with self-esteem. He thought that his dignity of station was not sufficiently acknowledged by the merchants of Avon Town, and his superiority of intellect not sufficiently recognized by the exclusive set of which His visits were, therefore, chiefly confined to the houses of neighboring squires, to whom his reputation as a magistrate, combined with the solemn exterior, made him one of those oracles by which men consent to be awed on condition that the awe is not often inflicted. His visits might be opened his house three times a week, it was only to a select few, whom he first fed and then biologized. Electro-biology was then naturally the special entertainment of a man whom no intercourse ever pleased in which his will was not imposed upon others. Sometimes he invited to his table persons whom he could stare into the abnegation of their senses, willing to say that beef was hard or pudding was coffee, according as he willed them to say. And, no doubt, the persons asked would have said any thing he willed so long as they were in his substance as well as in idea, the beef and the brandy, the lamb and the coffee. I did not, then, often meet Mr. Vigors at the houses in which I occasionally spent my evenings. I heard of his enmity as a man safe in his home bears the slough of a wind on a common without. If he and then we happened to pass in the streets, he looked up at me (he was a small man walking on tip-toe) with the stalk of his cane. And from the height of my statue I dropped upon the small man and sullen scowl the affable smile of supreme indifference.

CHAPTER IV.

I HAD now arrived at that age when an ambitious man, satisfied with his progress in the world without, begins to feel in the cravings of unsatisfied affection, the void of a solitary hearth. I resolved to marry, and looked out for a wife. I had never hitherto admitted into my life the passion of love. In fact, I had regarded that passion, even in my earlier youth, with a certain superb contempt—as a malady engendered by an effeminate idleness, and fostered by a sickly imagination.

I wished to find in a wife a rational companion, an affectionate and trust-worthy friend. No views of matrimony could be less romantic, more soberly sensible, than those which I conceived. Nor were my requirements mercenary or presumptuous. I cared not for fortune; I asked nothing from connections. My ambition was exclusively professional; it could be served by no titled kindred, accelerated by no wealthy dower. It was no slave to love. I did not seek in a wife the accomplishments of a finishing schoolteacher.

Having decided that the time had come to select my helpmate, I imagined that I should find no difficulty in a choice that my reason would approve. But day after day, week upon week passed away, and though among the families I visited there were many young ladies who possessed more than the qualifications with which I conceived that I should be amply contented, and by whom I might flatter myself that my proposals would not be disdained, I saw not one to whose life-long companionship I should not infinitely have preferred the solitude I found so irksome.

One evening I was returning home from visiting a poor female patient whom I attended gratuitously, and whose case demanded more thought than that of any other in my list—for though it had been considered hopeless in the hospital, and she had come home to die, I felt certain that I could save her, and she seemed recovering under my care—one evening, it was the 15th of May, I found myself just before the gates of the house that had been inhabited by Dr. Lloyd. Since his death the house had been unoccupied; the rent asked for it by the proprietor was considered high; and from the sacred Hill on which it was situated shyness or pride banished the wealthier traders. The garden gates stood wide open, as they had stood on the winter night on which I had passed through them to the chamber of death. The remembrance of that death-bed came vividly before me, and the dying man's fantastic threat rang again in my startled ears. An irresistible impulse, which I could not then account for, and which I can not account for now—an impulse the reverse of that which usually makes us turn away with quickened pace from a spot that recalls associations of pain—urged me on through the open gates, up the neglected, grass-grown road; urged me to look, under the sweeping sun of the joyous spring, at that house which I had never seen but in the gloom of a winter night, under the melancholy moon. As the building came in sight, with dark red bricks, partially overgrown with ivy, I perceived that it was no longer unoccupied. I saw forms passing without the open windows; a van laden with articles of furniture stood before the door; a servant in livery was beside it giving directions to the men who were unloading. Evidently some family was just entering into possession. I felt somewhat ashamed of my trespass, and turned round quickly to retrace my steps. I had retreated but a few yards when I saw before me at the entrance gates Mr. Vigors, walking beside a lady apparently of middle age, while, just at hand, a path cut through the shrubs gave view of a small wicket-gate at the end of the grounds. I felt unwilling not only to meet the lady, whom I guessed to be the new occupier, and to whom I should have to make a somewhat awkward apology for intrusion, but still more to encounter the scornful look of Mr. Vigors, in what appeared to my pride a false or undignified position. Involuntarily, therefore, I turned down the path which would favor my escape unobserved. When about half way between the house and the wicket-gate the shrubs that had clothed the path on either side suddenly opened to the left, bringing into view a circle of sward, surrounded by irregular fragments of old brick-work, partially covered with ferns, creepers, or rock-plants, weeds, or wild-flowers, and in the centre of the circle a fountain, or rather water-cistern, over which was built a Gothic mimetic dome, or canopy, resting on small Norman columns, time-worn, dilapidated. A large willow overhung this unmistakable relic of the ancient abbey. There was an air of antiquity, romance, legend about this spot, so abruptly disclosed amidst the delicate green of the young shrubberies. But it was not the ruined wall nor the Gothic well that chained my footstep and charmed my eye.

It was a solitary human form—seated there amidst the mournful ruins.

The form was so slight, the face so young, that at the first glance I murmured to myself, "What a lovely child!" But as my eye lingered, it recognized in the upturned, thoughtful brow, in the sedate, serious aspect, in the rounded outlines of that slender shape, the inexpressible dignity of virgin woman.

A book was on her lap; at her feet a little basket, half filled with violets and blossoms culled from the rock plants that nestled amidst the ruins. Behind her, the willow, like an emerald waterfall, showered down its arching abundant green, bough after bough, from the tree-top to the sward, discerning in wavy verdure, bright toward the summit, in the smile of the setting sun, and darkening into shadow as it neared the earth.

She did not notice, she did not see me; her eyes were fixed upon the horizon, where it sloped farthest into space, above the tree-tops and the ruins—fixed so intently that mechanically I turned my own gaze to follow the flight of hers. It was as if she watched for some expected, familiar sign to grow out from the depths of heaven; perhaps to greet, before other eyes behold it, the ray of the earliest star.

The birds dropped from the boughs on the turf around her, so fearlessly that one alighted amidst the flowers in the little basket at her feet. There is a famous German poem, which I had read in my youth. I read the German poem called "The Maiden from Abroad," variously supposed to be an allegory of Spring, or of Poetry, according to the choice of commentators: it seemed to me as if the poem had been made for her. Verily, indeed, in her quiet or painter might have seen an image equally true to either of those adorners of the earth; both outwardly a delight to sense, yet both wakening up thoughts within us, not sad, but akin to sadness.

I heard now a step behind me, and a voice which I recognized as that of Mr. Vigors. I broke from the charm by which I had been so lingeringly spell-bound, hurried on confusedly, gained the wicket-gate, from which a short flight of stairs descended into the common thoroughfare. And there the everyday life lay again before me. On the opposite side houses, shops, church-spires; a few steps more, and the bustling streets! How immeasurably far from, yet how familiarly near to the world in which we move and have being is that fairy land of romance which opens out from the hard earth before us, when Love steals at first to our side, fading back, fading back into the hard earth again as Love smiles or sighs its farewell!

"IT WAS A SOLITARY HUMAN FORM—SEATED THERE AMIDST THE MOURNFUL RUINS."

CHAPTER V.

AND before that evening I had looked on Mr. Vigors with supreme indifference—what importance he now assumed in my eyes! The lady with whom I had seen him was doubtless the new tenant of that house in which the young creature by whom my heart was so strangely moved evidently had her home. Most probably the relation between the two ladies was that of mother and daughter. Mr. Vigors, the friend of one, might himself be related to both—might prejudice them against me—might—here, starting up, I snapped the thread of conjecture, for right before my eyes, on the table beside which I had seated myself on entering the room, lay a card of invitation:

MRS. POYNTZ.
At Home,
Wednesday, May 15th.
Early.

Mrs. Poyntz—Mrs. Colonel Poyntz! the Queen of the Hill. There, at her house, I could not fail to learn all about the new-comers, who could never without her sanction have settled on her domain.

I hastily changed my dress, and, with beating heart, wound my way up the venerable entrance.

I did not pass through the lane which led direct to Abbots' House (for that old building stood solitary amidst its grounds, a little apart from the spacious platform on which the society of the Hill was concentred), but up the broad causeway, with visual gardening: the gayer shops still unclosed, the tide of busy life only slowly ebbing from the still animated street, on to a square, in which the four main thoroughfares of the city converged, and which formed the boundary of Low Town. A huge dark archway, popularly called Monk's Gate, at the angle of this square, made the entrance to Abbey Hill. When the arch was passed, one felt at once that one was in the town of a former day. The pavement was narrow and rugged; the shops small, their upper stories projecting, with, here and there, plastered fronts, quaintly arabesqued. An ancient, short, but steep and tortuous, conducted at once to the old Abbey Church, nobly situated in a vast quadrangle, around which were the genteel and gloomy dwellings of the Areopagites of the Hill. More genteel and less gloomy than the rest—light on the windows and flowers on the balcony—stood forth, flanked by a garden wall at either side, the mansion of Mrs. Colonel Poynz.

As I entered the drawing-room I heard the voice of the hostess: it was a voice clear, decided, metallic, bell-like, uttering these words: "Taken Abbots' House? I will tell you."

CHAPTER VI.

Mrs. Poyntz was seated on the sofa; at her right sat fat Mrs. Bruce, who was a Scotch lord's grand-daughter: at her left thin Miss Brabazon, who was an Irish baronet's niece. Around her —a few seated, many standing—had grouped all the guests, save two old gentlemen, who remained about with Colonel Poyntz near the tiled-table, waiting for the fourth old gentleman, who was to make up the rubber, but who was at that moment quick-bowing in the magic circle, which exercisity, that strongest of social demons, had attracted round the hostess.

"Taken Abbots' House? I will tell you. Ah, Dr. Fenwick! charmed to see you. You know Abbots' House is let at last? Well, Miss Brabazon, you, who have also been taken it. I will tell you—a particular piece of mine."

"Indeed! Dear me!" said Miss Brabazon, looking confused. "I hope I did not say any thing to—"

"Wound my feelings. Not in the least. You said your uncle, Sir Phelim, had a coach-maker named Ashleigh, that Ashleigh was an uncommon name, though Ashley was a common one; you intimated an appalling suspicion that the Mrs. Ashleigh who had come to the Hill was the coach-maker's wife. I believe your mother's name is not; she is the widow of Gilbert Ashleigh, of Kirby Hall."

"Gilbert Ashleigh," said one of the guests, a bachelor, whose parents had reared him for the church, but who, like poor Goldsmith, did not think himself good enough for it—a man of the over-modesty, for he matured into a very harmless creature. "Gilbert Ashleigh. I was at Oxford with him—gentleman commoner of Christ Church. Good-looking man — very: soyped—"

"Sayped! what's that? Oh, studied. That he did all his life. He married young—Anne Chaloner: she and I were girls together: married for money. They settled at Kirby Hall —nice place, but dull. Poyntz and I spent Christmas there. Ashleigh when he talked was charming, but talked very little. Anne, when she talked, was commonplace, and she talked very much. Naturally, poor thing, she was so happy. Poyntz and I did not spend another Christ—as there. Friendship is long, but life is short. Gilbert Ashleigh's life was short indeed: he died in the fifty-year of his marriage, having only one child, a girl. Since then, though I never spent another Christmas at Kirby Hall, I have frequently spent a day there, during my last to cheer up Anne. She was no longer talkative, poor dear. Wrapt up in her child, who has now grown to a beautiful girl of eighteen —such eyes, her father's—the real dark blue-rare; sweet creature, but delicate; not, I hope, consumptive. Poor Anne! I was very sorry when

PRINCE NAPOLEON AT WASHINGTON.

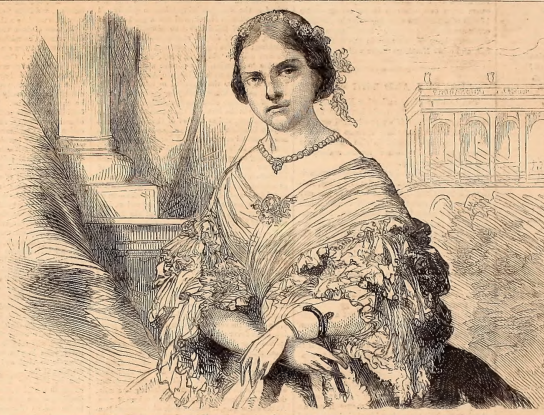
We herewith illustrate THE PRESENTATION OF PRINCE NAPOLEON TO THE PRESIDENT by the Secretary of State, which took place on 3d instant at the White House; and we also give a portrait of the PRINCESS CLOTILDE, who accompanied her husband to New York. The Herald correspondent said: "On Saturday the Prince called on the President at twelve o'clock, and was duly presented by the Secretary of State. The President received the Prince with marked courtesy, and welcomed him to the country in a few simple but hearty words of compliment. Without seeking, he said, to attach to this flattering visit of one so closely allied to the French throne, at this solemn crisis of the country's history, an undue importance, he could but feel that his presence at the capital was a guarantee of the friendly interest and generous sympathy of the French Government. The Prince, it is reported, listened with deep interest to the informal address of the President, and replied with brevity and much feeling."

The lady's name is Clotilde Maria Teresa of Savoy. She was born on 2d March, 1843, and is consequently eighteen, and very pretty. Of course, so young a person, however distinguished by birth, can have but little history as yet. It is said that she is very sweet-tempered and amiable, and extremely religious. One writer says of her:

> Imagine a girl with golden-brown hair, and a skin of pearly whiteness, just dawning into womanhood; a form already full and round, a figure of commanding aspect. Then the expression of the Princess's face is tenderly intellectual.

At the time of her marriage, the correspondent of the London Times, who saw her at the Opera with her future husband, on the occasion of the state visit of the King and the nuptial party to the theatre at Turin, said of her:

> I can not indorse the statement of the Opinione that the Princess was brilliant with beauty. She is not beautiful, but she has what is perhaps better than beauty, a very sweet and amiable expression, which, I am assured, is but the faithful mirror of her charming character. She is rather petite and girlish-looking, with brown hair, and a beautifully white skin. Her bearing was graceful, and free from any sort of embarrassment, although her position last night, as the focus of the public gaze, must have been a little trying to a young lady not yet sixteen.



THE PRINCESS CLOTILDE, WIFE OF PRINCE NAPOLEON, NOW IN THIS COUNTRY.

PRESENTATION OF PRINCE NAPOLEON BY SECRETARY SEWARD TO THE PRESIDENT.

Here every body agrees that abe is quite beautiful. In the absence of his Imperial Highness the beautiful Princess Clotilde occupies her time in visiting the points and places of interest in and about the city. The Princess, being as good as she is beautiful, devoutly attends Mass at the Chapel in Twenty-eighth Street each morning—thus in some sort atoning for the rebellion of her father against the Holy Father.

TO TALKERS.

GIVE us action—speech no longer;
Cheer no fellow to the fray;
Words are well, but deeds are stronger—
Only arms and lead the way.

Should each man but urge his neighbor:
"Go ye forth and reap the plain"—
Holding back himself from labor—
Where would be the ripened grain?

When goes up the roar of battle
Stoutest voices are bet weak;
Not of cause and duty prattle—
Let your silent service speak.

Have you wives?—do soft eyes, pleading,
Hold you with their gentle spell?
Other hearts are torn and bleeding,
Other men have homes as well.

Urge them not the smoking altar
With such gifts as these to strew,
If you feel your bosom falter
When the gods appeal to you.

Point not out a path to others
Which your feet refuse to tread;
Follow with your earnest brothers,
Though it lead among the dead.

Even now the forest arches
With the tramp of men are rife;
Join your brothers on their marches,
Join them in the surging strife.

Whether drummer-boy or colonel
Matters not be duty done;
Battling for truth eternal,
All are equal—ranks are one.

Should you win a brave dismission
From your country's holy wars,
Yours shall be a high commission,
Bearing date among the stars!

But bring deeds, not mouthings merely,
Urging others to the fray;
You that see the path so clearly,
Yours the feet should lead the way!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1861.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WEEK.

THE national cause has made progress during the week. Kentucky has gone for the Union by a majority exceeding 60,000; and, this time, there is no doubt about the quality of the Unionism. John J. Crittenden and other Union leaders have plainly said that they are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war. That is a sort of Unionism that needs no explanation and leaves no loophole for treachery: it finds practical expression in the daily increasing volunteer force which is being assembled near Louisville. Kentucky, we think we may now say, is not only safe, but is sure to contribute a fair share of soldiers to the Union army. She could not afford to do less.

In Missouri, too, the cause is stronger than it was a week ago. General Lyon has defeated Ben. McCulloch; General Pope is setting the northern counties in order; and Major-General Frémont is working with such energy in the organization of the army of the Mississippi, that all danger of an attack upon Cairo is past, and the promised descent upon Western Tennessee can not be for distant. A camp of instruction for 30,000 men is being established near St. Louis, and another, with an equal force, at Springfield, Illinois. Money has gone forward to pay the Missouri volunteers.

No actual progress has been made in Virginia, but the enemy has not attempted to cross the Potomac. A week ago this was highly probable; and even now, if Beauregard were the general he is painted, he would not allow the Bull Run victory to remain fruitless. But General M'Clellan has taken such precautions that no attack on our intrenchments in the vicinity of Washington seems to be apprehended; and between Georgetown and Harper's Ferry a strong force with heavy artillery, under General Banks and General M'Call, guard every ford. It is understood that the rebels are fortifying Manthias Point, with a view to close the navigation of the Lower Potomac: this will probably necessitate an attack on the place, and the capture of the works of the insurgents. Nothing is allowed to transpire with regard to our force at Washington; it is probably not less than 75,000 men, all of whom, under the M'Clellan régime, are daily improving in discipline and military condition. No attack has been made upon Fortress Monroe or Newport News; but Colonel Magruder has burned the Virginian town of Hampton, and rendered hundreds of Virginian families homeless.

The Maryland Legislature has adjourned without passing an ordinance of secession, or making any approach thereto. The Baltimore mob attempted last week to rouse the secessionists of Baltimore to active violence by an inflammatory speech; but the Union men of the city hooted him down. We presume that contempt for his fallen condition alone prevented Major-General Dix from arresting this Breckinridge for attempting to provoke a treasonable breach of the peace.

Recruiting progresses steadily. The Western States are pouring out men. A large proportion of the three months' volunteers—among others, Colonel Wallace's Eleventh Indiana Regiment —having taken the oath for the war. In New York city—which is the bulk of the three months' volunteers are still holding back, principally because every one wants to be an officer—some 17,000 of the 25,000 men called for by the Governor are already enrolled. New York will undoubtedly have 60,000 men in the field by the fall, and other Northern States will do as well.

SLAVERY AND THE WAR.

THE London Times and other European papers assure us that we would have the hearty sympathy of Europe if we proclaimed emancipation to the slaves. The London Saturday Review and other European journals, in like manner, are severe upon the Government for not making an end of slavery at once.

It is a good deal easier to talk about emancipation than to effect it. In the first place, neither Congress nor the Administration has any more power to free the slaves in Virginia than to confiscate cattle in New England. The control of the institution of slavery is by the Constitution reserved to the States in which it exists, and so late as last July Congress almost unanimously declared that it had no authority to interfere with it in any State.

In the second place, four of the fifteen slave States—Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri—must be classed as loyal. The contest, therefore, though primarily growing out of the institution of slavery, is not a struggle between free States and slave States, or between abolition and slavery. For the sake of Kentucky and Missouri, it would be impolitic, if it were Constitutional, for the Government to convert the war into a war of emancipation.

Again, the theory of the Government—which rests upon substantial evidence—is that the rebellion is the work of a part only of the Southern people, and that many of them—if not an absolute majority—are loyal in their hearts, and are now silenced by the armed despotism of Jeff Davis. There is reason to believe that this theory is sound with regard to every State except perhaps South Carolina. Now a decree of emancipation—even if it were Constitutional and otherwise politic—would fall with equal severity upon loyal and disloyal citizens in the insurgent region, and would effectually prevent the loyal people of that and the Government in overthrowing the rebel despotism, as they have done in Western Virginia and Missouri, and as it is anticipated they will do in Tennessee in the time in every Southern State.

Finally, as has been well observed by leading statesmen, the hour of battle is not the time for the emancipation of the slaves or of any slaves. The abolition of negro slavery in the Southern States will be a work of such magnitude and such difficulty, that to accomplish it safely will take the skill and wisdom of the whole race to the utmost. It were undoubtedly better that slavery should be maintained forever than that it should disappear in the consideration of civil wars and wholesale massacres. It is not desirable, in any point of view, that the relation of master and slave should end before some stringent provision has been made for the amelioration of vagrancy among the emancipated laborers, and for the protection of the late owners. And though the present temptation to the exercise ediness and outrage could not be entertained by any citizens of the United States!

It is surprising that thoughtful men at home and abroad wondered whether we were not so utterly rotten that nothing but death could be expected?

PUT NOT YOUR TRUST IN "RELIABLE INFORMATION."

It is impossible to advise too strongly that nobody should put his peace of mind into the keeping of the newspapers. If you are pained and alarmed by any thing you see "reported," or "surmised," or "stated," or "inferred," or by what is "understood," or "highly probable," or "beyond doubt," or "of course," the only way is to push on far enough and you will find the antidote in the same paper.

For instance, in a Morning paper the Lounger reads:

"In those sections, such as Middle and Southern Georgia, and similar portions of Alabama, where the large slaveholders are in the ascendency, many, very many, would wish to see a reconstruction of the old Government, but no one dares openly to utter a Union sentiment."

This is given upon the authority of a gentleman who left Savannah on the day of the battle at Bull Run.

And imme iately below it, in the same column, is the "statement of a Union man of Georgia." He says:

"The war is really carried on by the large slaveowning planters, and they have thrown life and all into the cotton crop."

These gentlemen are both unquestionably veracious, but their impressions totally differ. The true way to comfort of mind is to grant the enemy equal earnestness of conviction and resolution and bravery with ourselves; to believe that the rebel forces are larger at any particular point than we are told, and that they are well led; that they must fight soon, and fight desperately. It is foolish to be swayed by the statements of this affable gentleman and that perfectly trust-worthy person, each of which has the amplest means of information. Believe the worst of the enemy, and we shall be sure to do the best ourselves. The men in arms against us are not to be coaxed; they are to be conquered if we would save the country.

HUMORS OF THE WAR.

A MORNING'S REFLECTION.

BY A VERY YOUNG GENTLEMAN WHO HAD BEEN "MAKING A NIGHT OF IT."

THIS truth I've learned, and I say do too like,
That drinking makes a dirty pate.

LIBEL, CHEESE-IT, COMPLIMENTARY, AND LITERARY!—At the review of the Curragh the other day, there were a large number of beauties present, which interesting fact led H. R. H. to exclaim, with that happiness and gallantry for which his family has long been distinguished, that he was delighted to find the race of CURSES BELIES!) was far from extinct.

SMART MARINE (in the most disconcerted). "Don't know, Sir, unless it is in the hatchway."

Squigjaw says he always travels with his wife, who contrives to be obstinate and out of humor all the time they leave home till they get where they are going to. The only time she ever smiled, he says, was when he broke his cane.

All that most young women need to infuse their hearts is a spark.

A surgical journal tells of a man who lived five years with a ball in his head. We have known ladies live twice as long with nothing but balls in their heads.

A HINT FOR GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

"After we had hanged a few contractors, I am bound to say that the quality of beef served out to the troops improved amazingly."—SIR C. NAPIER'S Dispatches.

THE HIGHWAYMAN WORSTED.

"I've been rifled in Mexico, robbed by bandits,"
"Poor rebel Caleb! your case I most heartily pity."
"Yes; they stole all my coats, and my manuscript leaves."
"Then, Caleb, I pity not you, but the thieves!"

"I say, William," said the wife of an English laborer, breathing her hot whisper, "you'll see the old law don't kill her young one!" "Ay, ay, wife, set thee good." "And I say, William, you'll see Lizzie go to school regular?" "Ay, ay, wife, set thee good." "And I say, William, you'll not let Lizzie be robbed of her property?" "Ay, ay, wife, set thee good." "And I say, William, you'll see that Lizzie don't be married against her goes to school again?" "Ay, ay, wife, set thee good." "And I say, William, you'll see that I am laid proper in the yard?" William grew impatient. "Now never mind them things, wife; I'll see to them all; you just go on with your dying."

Why are well-fed chickens like successful farmers? They are blessed with plenty of corn.

"Is there much water in the cistern, Biddy?" inquired a gentleman of his servant-girl as she came up from the kitchen. "Jist a full tub-full, Sir, but there's none at all on the top," was the reply.

KEEPING LATE HOURS.—In the city resides William Jones, a tailor, who is noted for his jollity, and also for keeping late hours, as he usually goes home at two o'clock in the morning. Well, one stormy night, about a year ago, William concluded to go home early, and accordingly he arrived at his house at just midnight. In answer to his knock, his mother opened a window and inquired, "Who is there?" "William," was the reply. "No," said she, "you can't come that game on me, for you have been home for two hours yet." Poor Bill had to wait till his usual time.

"Dog cheap" is now defined as meaning the keeping of a canine without paying the tax.

TRAGEDY.—"Toby, what did the Israelites do when they crossed the Red Sea?"

TOBY. "I don't know, ma'am, but I guess they dived to Jamaica."

An ignorant tailor, zealous overmuch, waited upon Dean Swift to express his fears that, for a clergyman, he was too convivial, and not sufficiently conversant with his Scriptures, concerning passages of which he had come, he said, to examine him. The Dean answered his fears and questions with great good-nature; and when he had completed, expressed a wish to consult him, as he should soon be up in the matter, in relation to a doubtful point contained in an important chapter of the Bible. "Why," said the Dean, "in Revelations, that the Angel of the Lord stood with one foot on the land, the other on the sea. Now what I wish you to inform me, with the same freedom that I have answered your queries, is, How much cloth would it take to make the angel alluded to a pair of pantaloons that should fit him as he stood?" The tailor, of course, was nonplussed.

Some one says that the music of the Chinese is delightfully horrible.—like cats trying to sing bass with wet throats.

"How many deaths?" asked the hospital physician, while going his rounds. "Only two, Sir. Why, I ordered medicine for ten." "Yes, but one wouldn't take it."

AN INDIANT LOGICIAN.—A grandchild of Dr. Emmons, when not more than six years of age, came to him with a trouble weighing on her mind. "A I say that the moon is made of green cheese, and I don't believe it." "Don't you believe it? Why not?" "I know it isn't." "How do you know?" "Cos, I grandpa?" "Don't ask me that question; you must find it out for yourself." "How can I find it out?" "You must study into it." She knew enough to resort to the first element of Genesis for information, and after a truly Emmonsikes search she ran into the study exclaiming: "I've found it out; the moon is not made of green cheese, for the moon was made before the cows."

"This is the warmest weather I ever knew," observed Lord Langdale to Lord Lyndhurst; "it is enough to drive any Judge crazy." "Ay," said the Chancellor, "even an injunction without any argument."

A GREAT POET says that "the mountains stand fixed for ages." He knows, however, that it is no uncommon thing for them to adjoin.

MOCK ACTIONS.—The places where the buyer is sold.

The heirs of Robinson Crusoe have instituted a suit to recover the island of Juan Fernandez, founding their claim upon the ground that he was "monarch of all he surveyed."

The immortal Raphael paints a unicorn fare, and made, no doubt, an excellent likeness. Many a lady paints her own face, and makes no likeness at all.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, August 5, in the Senate, the bill confiscating the property of rebels, with the House amendment confiscating all slaves found engaged in the military and naval service of the rebels, was taken up, on motion of Senator BRECKINRIDGE, and the amendment was agreed to by a vote of 34 to 11. A bill providing for additional enlistments in the army was passed. The House bill to promote the efficiency of the Engineer corps was passed. A bill increasing the pay of privates and non-commissioned officers of the army, and also that of officers and soldiers disabled in battle, was passed. In the House the Judiciary Committee reported a bill failing the bounties to the members of the House under the late census, after March 3, at two hundred and thirty-three. The bill was passed among the regular appropriation bills in accordance with the act of 1850. The bill was passed. The Indian appropriation bill, containing additional enlistments for the navy was amended by striking out the word "marines," and the bill passed. A bill to increase the Engineer corps and the corps of Topographical Engineers was passed. The Senate bill increasing the pay of the army and navy was passed. The Senate bill requiring an oath of allegiance and support to be taken by all persons in the civil service of the United States, and declaring that a refusal to take such oath shall be considered cause for dismissal, and the breaking of it shall be deemed a high crime, Indictment, perjury, was passed. A bill was introduced repealing, after the 4th of March, an exemption from militia duties from attending on the Supreme Court. The bill was passed by the Senate was the one to punish certain crimes against the United States and for other purposes. Mr. CLARK offered a resolution relating to the imprisonment of the Baltimore Police Commissioners, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. A bill was introduced providing for the appointment of a Commissioner of Patents, whose duty it shall be to investigate applications for the extension of patents, and to report thereon to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall have power to extend the patent for a term not exceeding seven years. The bill was passed. A resolution was adopted calling upon the President to communicate to the House copies of all correspondence with foreign nations, since 1851, relative to maritime rights. The House bill to amend the act of 1851, passed, passed the House, and is now a law. This will make an increase in the United States army of about 400,000 men. The hour for adjournment having arrived, the President was waited upon by a committee, and informed that he had, with them informed the House that he had no further communication to make. Whereupon the Speaker declared the House adjourned sine die.

MOVEMENTS OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S ARMY.

General M'CLELLAN'S army of the Potomac is now largely occupies the entire attention of the commanding General, and demands the undivided attention of all corps of the service on the line of the Potomac.

HAMPTON BURNED.

On Friday, of last week, General Magruder, with a force of 7000 men, including 200 cavalry and eight pieces of artillery, left Yorktown, and advanced toward Hampton, reaching the outskirts of that place at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the evening, after firing on our pickets on this side of the river, wounding one or two rebels, entering Great and Little Bethels, and giving to the few inhabitants remaining there, the usual notice that they would be fired upon. fire to the houses and destroyed the village. The flames raged furiously, and only the town of Phœbus escaped. only seven or eight houses were standing. The rebels retired to Big Bethel, and encamped. Meanwhile Colonel Weber's regiment was guarding the bridge, the passage of which the enemy evidently attempted to force, being repulsed with the loss of three killed and six wounded.

THE TRAITORS IN BALTIMORE.

The Secretary of War has replied to General Butler respecting the disposition of fugitives seeking protection, that they are to be treated as a matter of law. President that all existing rights in all the States be fully respected and maintained. The only way now presented for the part of the Federal Government is a war forthe Union, for the preservation of all constitutional rights of States, and the citizens of the States in the Union. Hence no fugitives can be received into military service either in the States and Territories in which the authorities of the Union is fully established, or in which it is being re-established, wholly or in part under insurrectionary control, where the laws of the United States are for the present opposed, and denied that they can not be effectually enforced, it is obvious that fugitives claiming support upon the constitutional laws must temporarily fail, and it is equally obvious that this right dependent on the laws of the State within which military operations are conducted must be necessarily subordinate to the exigencies caused by the insurrection, if not wholly forfeited by the treasonable conduct of parties claiming them. It is thus the general rule of right to service forms an exception. The act of Congress approved August 6, 1861, declares that persons held to labor or service shall be employed in hostility to the United States, the right to their service shall be forfeited, and such persons shall be discharged therefrom. It follows, he adds, of necessity, that no claim can be recognized by the military authority of the Union for the services of such persons when fugitives. With respect to the slaves of loyal masters, Mr. CAMERON says that a careful record should be kept of the name and description of each fugitive, in order that Congress may provide for a just compensation for their services when peace is restored. General Butler is instructed not to permit any interference by his troops with the slaves of peaceful citizens, nor encourage them to leave the service of their masters, nor prevent the voluntary returns of any fugitives to those from whom they may have escaped.

PRINCE NAPOLEON AMONG THE REBELS.

Prince Napoleon and his suite returned to Washington on Friday night, after a visit to Manassas Junction, where they were received by Generals Beauregard and Johnston, and the Prince, after passing the night of Thursday in the hut of General Beauregard, reviewed about six thousand of the rebel troops on Friday morning. He was very cordially received both by them and officers. He was escorted by Generals Beauregard and Johnston to proceed to Richmond, but he declined to go any further South. On his visit to Manassas he was accompanied by General M'Dowell, and a body-guard of cavalry. General M'Dowell left him at Clark's Mills, but the cavalry escort, bearing a flag of truce, proceeded with the Prince to the rebel picket-station near Fairfax Court House, where the commanding officer, Captain Ferre, of the Virginia cavalry, and the officer in command of the Union troops, conversed with him and took the imperial visitor under his charge. Colonel Stuart, the commandant at Fairfax Court House, entertained the party hospitably and forwarded them to Manassas, where General Beauregard received the Prince with great courtesy, gave him a French supper, a soldier's bed, and an equally soldierly breakfast. Among those in the retinue of the party aforesaid are Generals Gustavus Smith and M'Donald. From them, after a courteous leave-taking from Beauregard, they returned by steamer with them to Washington. With regard to the defenses at Manassas the suite of Prince Napoleon stated, but they describe the soldiers, whom they suppose to number sixty thousand, as ragged, dirty, and half-starved.

THE TRAITORS IN BALTIMORE.

Baltimore was the scene of considerable excitement, and almost a riot, on Thursday night of last week, on the occasion of Senator Breckinridge's visit there. A number of prominent secessionists of Baltimore entertained Messrs. Breckinridge and Vallandigham with a dinner at the Exchange House, and at the close of the entertainment, Mr. Breckinridge undertook to make a speech to a considerable crowd collected outside. His appearance was the signal for a scene of the utmost confusion, in which he found it impossible to make himself heard, and he was finally compelled to retire without concluding his remarks. Several fights took place in the course of the evening, and some of the secessionists were rather roughly handled. Mr. Vallandigham was subsequently called for, but did not consider it advisable, under the circumstances, to make his appearance.

OUR LOSS AT BULL RUN.

We have the official list of the loss in killed, wounded, and missing at the battle of Bull Run, furnished by the direction of the commanders of divisions and brigades. The aggregate purports to be as follows:

	Killed.
Officers	19
Men	462
Total killed	481
	Wounded.
Officers	64
Men	947
Total wounded	1011
	Missing.
Officers	40
Men	1276
Total missing	1756
Aggregate loss	3768

The loss of artillery amounts to seventeen rifled cannon and eight small bore guns. In ammunition the loss amounts to 110 boxes of musket cartridges and eighty-seven boxes of rifled cannon cartridges. Thirty boxes of rifled cannon, thirteen wagons of provisions, 1000 muskets, and 8000 knapsacks and blankets were also lost in the retreat and during the battle.

UNION PRISONERS IN THE ENEMY'S HANDS.

General M'Dowell, in his official report, places the Sgeneral prisoners at 1816. The number of officers held in the hands of the rebels is ascertained to be 640—leaving a balance of 1176 unaccounted for. The number supposed to have returned to their homes; some may be working their way back to the Union army, and some of them may yet turn up, or will be shortly published as deserters.

THE CHARLESTON PAPER PUNISHED.

The office of The Courier, at Charleston, was burned, New Hampshire, was last week destroyed by a crowd composed of the most respectable and influential citizens of the place, which had been notorious for its disunion toon, published an article on the subject for the rebel Secretary referred to demanded a retraction: the editors threatened to fire on the crowd; threatened the office was attacked and looted. During this proceeding four pistol-shots were fired from the windows of the building, and some one killed.

ARREST OF C. J. FAULKNER.

A very important arrest, on a charge of treason, was made by the Provost-Marshal in Washington on the 5th, the prisoner being our late Minister to the Court of France, Charles J. Faulkner, of Virginia. It is alleged that the principal charges against him are based on acts committed in Paris—in the purchase of arms for the rebel States, representing the United States Government, and endeavoring to prevent the recognition of the rebel Confederacy by the Government of France. Mr. Faulkner was conveyed as jail by order of Secretary SEWARD, and was forbidden to hold correspondence with any one. A formal examination into the case will take place speedily. He declares that he is not cognizant of having done any thing to warrant his arrest.

WESTERN VIRGINIA TO HAVE MAILS AGAIN.

Brigadier-General Rosecrans has dispatched to the Post-office Department at Washington, from Western Virginia, under August 7: "The rebels have been expelled from Kanawha." On the receipt of this dispatch the Department informed him that the immediate resumption of the mail service would be necessary, if it was safe, and where it could be intrusted to proper hands.

REBEL OUTRAGES IN VIRGINIA.

Accounts have been received from Texas that the rebels are committing terrible outrages in that portion of Virginia around Harper's Ferry, particularly, which they have in the possession of since the battle of Bull Run. Neither age, nor sex, nor infirmity is spared from insult and violence. All those capable of bearing arms and refusing to do so are sent as prisoners to Manassas or Richmond.

A RIGHTEOUS DISPENSATION.

Nearly all of the Southern newspapers that are yet in existence have announced their positive increase in their price. The Charleston News has recently given up the ghost, and the Mobile Register, and Register, are all three now merged into one concern.

PERSONAL.

David R. Atchison, formerly United States Senator from Missouri, and subsequently the great border-ruffian leader in Kansas, has been made a rebel Brigadier. He has declined when last heard of was in Memphis.

Captain Fox, the new Assistant Secretary of the Navy, is on a visit to the New England ports on matters connected with preparations for a more effective blockade of the ports of the Southern States.

The Abbé Hecker, as we understand, on the most undoubted authority, that Major-General John E. Wool has received orders to report himself for duty immediately at Fortress Monroe, for the purpose, undoubtedly, of assuming command of that important position.

A little piece of news has come along that surprises interest in more circles than one, and which will seem somewhat thoughtful than usual. It is only that Patti, "little Patti," is married to a Baltimore gentleman of one of the bankers. Such a fact is occasion enough for poetry. Young tenors could scarcely sing their usual songs with such a lullaby. The news comes tolerably straight, but we are not told how the new relation will affect Mario's fellowship artistic career. A man who would marry off a young and charming prima donna would be capable of anything. Mario, however respectable, is an enemy of the whole race, and to be resented by all spirited men.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND.

CHANGES IN THE MINISTRY.

The contemplated changes in the British ministry were accomplished on the 25th ult., viz.: Sir G. C. Lewis to be War Department; Sir George Grey, Secretary for Home Affairs; Mr. Cardwell, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Layard, Secretary of Public Works.

SLAVERY AND THE COTTON SUPPLY.

The Southern question has been engaged in discussing the slavery and cotton culture question in the House of Commons, on the 25th, Sir C. Wood made some financial statements in relation to the war, and asked for discretionary power to borrow £5,000,000 for railway purposes. He said the Government had exhausted great activity to develop the resources of India as a cotton-producing country. He believed that the result would be that ultimately England would be rendered independent of American for her supply. The supply of cotton from India would be about 200,000 bales more than ever before.

FRANCE.

FRENCH SYMPATHIZATIONS WITH THE REBELS.

The recognition of the Southern Confederacy by France is generally anticipated, and Fabvier, Paris, and subscribed that journal has just been divested of its semi-official character, its arguments were looked on as foreshadowing some imperial movement on the American question.

ST. DOMINGO.

THE END OF THE WAR.

From St. Domingo we have advices to the 28th ult., stating that the war between Hayti and Spain is at an end, the difficulties between the two countries being amicably adjusted. The Spanish authorities declare slavery forever abolished in the Island, and threaten with severe penalties any person endeavoring to threaten this system.

Of General M'Clellan himself, on whom such hopes now rest, we gave a biographical sketch, with a portrait, two or three weeks since; we now borrow from the Herald the following accounts of the three officers who constitute his personal staff.

MAJOR BARRY.

MAJOR WILLIAM FARQUHAR BARRY, chief of artillery, is a native of the city of New York, and is at present about forty years of age. He entered as a cadet at West Point in September, 1834, and graduated with honors in 1838. On the 1st of July of the same year he was brevetted Second Lieutenant in the Fourth Artillery, transferred to the Second Artillery, and in the same year and month appointed Assistant Commissary of Subsistence. In August, 1841, he was appointed First Lieutenant, and Captain in July, 1852.

At the breaking out of the Mexican war Major BARRY was First Lieutenant, and attached to the famous Ringgold battery, doing such effective service in that campaign. When it was found that more recruits for the artillery were needed, Lieutenant Barry was at once sent to this city to recruit, and this officer being as strict in his views as regards discipline and qualifications, he only recruited a force of about five per cent. of those who offered, while the regular infantry service accepted forty per cent. This Lieutenant Barry missed nearly one half of the war. When he returned to Mexico, General Worth, of New York, appointed Lieutenant Barry on his staff, which position he held until our victorious army returned to the United States.

After the war Lieutenant Barry was stationed at different posts, Fort Hamilton among the rest, where he received his commission as captain. When the troubles in Kansas broke out he was at once sent to Fort Leavenworth, where he placed himself under the command of General Harney, and remained there for several years.

On the evacuation of Fort Sumter more and efficient artillery was needed at FORT PICKENS, and the most reliable man the government could select was Captain Barry, who was instantly dispatched to that post, until it was reinforced by the energy of Colonel E. D. KEYES. On the 5th of July Barry and his battery left Fort Pickens in the steamer Columbia; arrived at New York on Sunday, the 14th; left that same evening by special train to Washington; made a requisition for extra horses while there, and joined the grand army of General M'Dowell on Wednesday, the 17th, at SPRING FIELD, about two hours after our troops had taken possession of Fairfax Court House and Fairfax Junction. Major Barry was assigned to the Fifth Division, commanded by Colonel DIXON S. MILES, and proceeding in that column to Centreville.

Major Barry was appointed on the staff of General M'DOWELL and acted as chief of artillery during the encampment at and about Centreville and on to the day of the battle. In the march to Manassas, was in command of Captain J. C. Tidball, kept as a reserve, with Colonel Miles's column, between Centreville and the stone bridge, where Hunt's and Green's batteries were playing on the enemy to prevent General M'Dowell's troops from being attacked in rear.

CAPTAIN STEWART VAN VLIET, ASSISTANT QUARTER-MASTER-GENERAL.

CAPTAIN VAN VLIET is a native of NEW YORK, and about forty-two years of age. He entered the West Point Academy as cadet in 1836, graduated 1840, and was brevetted Second Lieutenant in the Third Artillery, July 1, 1840. In November, 1841, he was promoted to a First Lieutenancy, and acted as Professor of Mathematics at the Military Academy until November, 1847. In February, 1847, he was appointed Regimental Quarter-master, and subsequently Assistant Quarter-master. June 4, 1847, Lieutenant Van Vliet was promoted to a Captaincy, but still acting as Quarter-master. Under the administration of President Buchanan, during the disturbances at Utah, Captain Van Vliet was sent as a special commissioner. There being no regular conveyance, the Captain was compelled to ride on horseback all the way, alone and unattended. He accomplished his journey to Great Salt Lake City in an uncommon short time, and his famous ride was the subject of comment with every body. In President Buchanan's message to Congress on the subject which took Captain Van Vliet to the Mormon territory, the Commissioner was honorably mentioned as "Major Van Vliet."

On his return from Utah he was appointed Assistant Quarter-master-General at Leavenworth, which position he held until called upon by General M'Clellan to act in the same capacity on his own staff. From the previous career of Captain Van Vliet the brightest anticipations of his future may be made; and it is safe to assert that the Quarter-master's Department could hardly have been intrusted in better hands, and speaks volumes for the wise selection of the popular young commander of the Department of Ohio.

CAPTAIN HENRY FRANCIS CLARK, ASSISTANT COMMISSARY GENERAL.

CAPTAIN CLARK was born in the old Keystone State, about the year 1809, and is at present in the neighborhood of forty years of age. He entered at West Point, from Pennsylvania, in 1830, graduated in 1834, was brevetted Second Lieutenant in 1843, and ordered in active service to the Second Artillery. Captain Clark went through the entire Mexican campaign, and in the official dispatches he was particularly mentioned as having highly distinguished himself in the battle of Monterey, with Dunbar's battery in the battle of Chancellorsville, and was wounded at the battle of Bull Run.

In September, 1847, he was promoted to First Lieutenant, and on the 16th of September he received the brevet of Captain "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Chapultepec." In July, 1848, Captain Clark was appointed Assistant Instructor of artillery and cavalry in the Military Academy at West Point, which position he held for a long time afterward.

THE NAVY-YARD AT BROOKLYN.

WE devote page 534 to illustrations of the Navy-yard at Brooklyn, which is at present a scene of remarkable activity. The Evening Post thus describes the work that is going on:

Nearly twenty-five hundred men are now employed at the Brooklyn Navy-yard, and the number is constantly increasing. Add to the present rate three thousand men will soon be engaged there; a greater number, perhaps, than were ever before employed within its walls. One year ago the number was less than one thousand. It will be seen, therefore, that the immediate effect of war has been great employment, in this department alone, to many hundreds —probably can be extended to thousands—of mechanics, who would otherwise be out of work and their families in distress.

There is on every hand the greatest activity. The whole force of the yard is not engaged in the work of fitting out vessels. On the contrary, but few war ships are at present in the hands of the workmen. Two only are building, the Cumberland and Adirondack, of which the keels are scarcely laid. The former will be of about 1,700 tons, and the latter somewhat larger, rating with the sloop-of-war Brooklyn. Four or five vessels in all are getting out, and the work upon them is pushed with the greatest rapidity.

A vast amount of work seems to have been laid out and to be in progress in the different departments which manufacture supplies for the navy. Much forging and blacksmith, tinwork, and coopering is going on. Quantities of ordinary ship's stores are constantly accumulating to supply the extraordinary demands of the present and future; the vast military stores which lie about in every direction are preparing for use, and workmen are engaged in breaking up and fitting with sights the great cannon which are ranged in rows along the main avenue of the yard. The scene is one of the most curious as well as the busiest which has ever been witnessed in that locality.

The steam sloop of war Richmond, which arrived from the Mediterranean on the 3d of July, has been refitted, and is nearly ready to join the blockading squadron. A portion of her armament, which is very heavy,—consisting of sixteen 9-inch Dahlgren guns, carrying shot, shell, or canister,—has been put on board. It is possible that two other guns of a different class may be put on, or two rifled guns will be added. The vessel is pierced for twenty-eight guns, but could not carry so great a number. She is a first-class vessel of nearly 2000 tons, and will be a valuable addition to our blockading service. It is intended to get her off to-morrow, but probably she will not be ready. Her complement of men is 296, and she will have an extra number of marines on going again into commission. Her officers are: Captain, John POPE; Lieutenants, N. C. Bryant, A. B. Cummings, Albert Boyd, Jun.; Master, Edward Terry; Paymaster, George F. Cutter; Surgeon, A. Henderson; Chief Engineer, John W. Moore.

The gun-boat Harriet Lane is also refitting at the yard, and will be ready to sail in a day or two. Her armament is on board.

The Connecticut (steamship) will have her armament and be ready to sail in a few days. She will be armed with four heavy 32-pounders and one rifled 18-pounder. The last will be placed on the fore-castle deck. She is 1900 ton burden, with very heavy steam power, and will be employed in the transport service in connection with our blockading fleet, making trips monthly. She is to be the consort of the Rhode Island, which recently sailed.

The Potomac, a sailing vessel carrying fifty guns, is also fitting out, and will be ready in ten days.

In a short a month four cruising vessels will be prepared to enter upon their work in supplying our squadron. The vessels have been procured, but it is understood that the refitting has not been commenced.

The Iroquois, which has been in search of the privateer Jeff Davis, sailed from the Navy-yard yesterday.

Several United States vessels are in the stream, among them the PEIKE, Varian, and Crusader.

Several of these vessels have gone to sea since the above was written.

CAMP WARREN, BURLINGTON, IOWA. THE RENDEZVOUS FOR THE IOWA TROOPS.—[SKETCHED BY A. SCHOLTZ.]

THE BATTLE OF DUG SPRINGS.

On page 533 will be found an illustration of the BRILLIANT CHARGE OF THE UNITED STATES CAVALRY ATTACHED TO GENERAL LYON'S ARMY upon an enormous force of rebel infantry, at the BATTLE OF DUG SPRINGS, on 1st August. The dispatch from Springfield, Missouri, dated August 2, says:

On Thursday news reached here that the enemy were advancing on us, in three columns, with a force numbering 30,000 men. General LYON immediately set out to meet them with the Second and Third Missouri regiments from Camp Clay, the First and Second Kansas regiments, and the First Iowa regiment; also with two or three companies of regular infantry and his or three companies of regular cavalry from Camp M'Clellan. About twelve miles west of Wilson's Creek, and about that evening, on Tyrah Creek, and on Friday advanced to Dug Springs, about nineteen miles southwest of Springfield, where he obtained intelligence of the enemy.

A fight took place between four and six o'clock that afternoon. A party of two hundred and seventy of General LYON'S cavalry, at previously reported, were crossing a ridge of high land, partially inclosed on the east by a valley, and, when descending the hill, came upon a large force of the enemy's infantry, variously estimated at from three hundred to four thousand, and being unable to retreat, they charged and cut their way through with the loss of only seven men. The lieutenant commanding the cavalry was killed, after killing eight of the rebels. Meantime the enemy opposed the large cavalry force moving along the valley, but they were put to flight by our artillery. Our infantry was not engaged. Our rebels retreated southward, to a place called M'Cullough's Store, on Fayetteville Road.

The number of rebels found dead on the field amounted to forty, and some forty-four wounded were picked up.

The correspondent of the Herald thus describes the affair:

About nine in the morning, after a march of seven miles, a picket guard of twenty-seven men was seen, and a shell was thrown among them as a gentle reminder that the Union troops were approaching. A cure was made good time toward the main body, some two miles ahead. Near a place called Dug Spring, about nineteen miles from Springfield, our advanced pickets met those of the enemy and exchanged a few shots. Our regular cavalry was on the right of the road, and Captain STOKES, with two companies of infantry, on the left. Captain PLUMMER, with three companies of First Infantry, supported by Captain LYON'S battery, formed the centre. The enemy was posted in a wood crowning a gentle slope, and covering it to the foot, where the road for half a mile ran through a valley between low hills, or rather "swells" of land, covered with a scanty growth of oak bushes, from one to five feet in height, interspersed with a few small trees. As the rebels' position and numbers were concealed by the wood, General LYON did not deem it prudent to advance the column with its usual order, as a masked battery might at any moment open upon it with considerable effect, while at the same time our strength would avail us nothing.

For upward of an hour nothing was done save the exchange of a few shots among the pickets, and at length General LYON gave the order for the column to fall back from among the high ground in the vicinity of the spring. The movements was considered by the rebels to be a retreat, and as soon as the rear of our column had cleared the cavalry made its appearance from the wood and passed to the front of a corn-field which covered their retreat. Their number was not far from four hundred, and they formed in a solid line of battle, dismounted. Not to their very rear in the point of rushing forward, Captain TOTTEN sent a twelve pound shell from his favorite howitzer; but the elevation was too great and the missile passed over its mark. A half minute later another shell followed with better success, bursting directly in the centre of the cavalry and completely upon the enemy's line. The whole body made a retreat for the timber in "precipitous and tumultuous haste."

Captain STOKES was still on the left, and a body of nearly eight hundred infantry, with a few mounted men, came forward from the enemy's right with the evident intention of engaging and assembling the Captain's two companies. Company C, of First cavalry, was in the rear (lately front), near Captain STOKES and Lieutenant M. J. KELLY, with twenty men from this company, made a BALAKLAVA charge with the loss of four rebels and beyond of the whole rebel infantry. Four of the twenty were killed and six were wounded, but they succeeded in breaking the infantry and putting them to flight. Four horses were wounded so badly that it was necessary to kill them—one was a white, and another eleven rifle balls. One of the men—Sergeant SULLIVAN—received eight bullets, though not fatal, wounds. As he was falling from his horse he waved his arms, and shouted "Hurrah for the Old Stars and Stripes!" With brought to camp he seemed to forget his wounds in the act of waving cheers in love for the Union. One of the enemy's wounded inquired of Lieutenant KELLY, with great earnestness,

"Are your cavalry men or devils?"

The lieutenant replied that he was possible they might be a composition of both.

"Well," said the man, "we can't stand such a charge as that. You can whip us all out if you've got a decent army of such soldiers."

One of our wounded, a private named Jacobs, who was captured by the rebels, was knocked from his horse while a prisoner by a blow from a musket, and left for dead. He was found on the field the next morning and carefully attended to. He will probably recover.

The enemy did not again appear that day, and the command encamped and passed the night in quiet. The utmost care was taken to prevent a surprise during the night by posting pickets in all directions, and arranging the camp with special reference to a defense in the darkness. Major STURGIS was particularly active at all hours, and if the enemy had made an attack they would have met a warm reception.

THE UNITED STATES FRIGATE "ST. LAWRENCE" SINKING TH

PRIVATEER "PETREL" AT SEA, AUGUST 1, 1861.—[See Page 538.]

INTERIOR OF UPPER BATTERY AT THE CHAIN BRIDGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WHITEHURST.]

BATTERIES AT THE CHAIN BRIDGE.

We publish herewith pictures of two of the batteries erected at the north end of the Chain Bridge at Washington. They are planted so as to sweep the bridge in case the rebels should attempt to cross it for the attack of Washington. We understand that every ford across the Potomac, from Washington to Harper's Ferry, is similarly guarded, and that batteries of heavy cannon, well supported by infantry, protect the whole line of the river.

ANOTHER PRIVATEER SUNK.

We illustrate, on pages 536 and 537, the remarkable adventure which befell the Southern privateer Petrel, formerly the revenue cutter Aiken, which was seized by the Charleston rebels in December last. A correspondent of the Herald writes:

The St. Lawrence lay directly off one of the small shoal islands on the Carolina coast, on the afternoon of the 1st of August, when a trim-built, rakish vessel of war was seen coming out of Charleston harbor, making directly for the supposed merchantman. The St. Lawrence affected to crowd all sail and get out to sea, but in reality was edging close in to the stranger, and making preparations to open the ports and deluge her with shot. The pirate's deck was seen crowded with men, and the gunners distinctly seen ramming and pointing the guns. She flew the rebel flag, and shouted twice for the merchantman to heave to and send a boat aboard. No response being made, the pirate fired three shots in quick succession—the first too ahead and the third directly over the deck of the St. Lawrence, the grape and canister whistling through the rigging and falling in dangerous proximity to some of the officers.

Then the St. Lawrence threw up her port lids, and showed in a moment the tiers of cannon with the gunners at the lowers holding lighted matches. Scarcely a second intervened when a shock that shook the sea and made the ship tremble in all her timbers broke from the guns, and when the smoke cleared away the waves where the pirate stood were seen full of drift-wood and swimming men.

She had been literally cut to pieces, and one ball that knocked a hole in the bow at the water line caused her to fill in a moment and go down, while a shell exploded in her hold.

All the boats of the St. Lawrence were put out and the seamen picked up. Five of them, either wounded or unable to swim, went down with the hulk.

It was found that the audacious craft was the Petrel, formerly the General Aiken, a U. S. revenue cutter.

Some of the men, when fished out of the water, were at a loss to know what had happened to them. The outburstings of the St. Lawrence's reply, the deafening roar of the guns and the splinters and submerged vessel, were all incidents that happened in less time than we can take to relate them.

Nearly all the crew are Irishmen, who state that they were out of work. The pirate crew were heavily ironed. They were lodged to-night in Moyamensing prison. The St. Lawrence was slightly damaged.

GHOSTS AND APPARITIONS.

APPARITIONS often spring from some physical derangement, which, acting on the sight, causes one to see things which really do not exist, and sometimes to hear sounds which have not in reality vibrated. Bodily weakness, a disordered state of health, loss of blood, will often produce organic deceptions of this class.

A lady-friend of mine told me a curious instance of this, which happened to her own maid. The young woman, who was subject to inflammation of the lungs, had generally to be leeched when these attacks came on. Frequently after the loss of blood she would see persons and things which she knew perfectly at the time could not be real. During the Crimean war she and her mistress were residing in a house in Constantinople, and the maids' work-room, which was a very small one, was at the top of the house, while the bedrooms were below. The door of this room did not fasten very well—no uncommon occurrence in Turkish hotels. She often missed little articles, such as cotton, scissors, and so forth, and naturally wished to discover by whom they were taken. One day, while weak from recent illness and loss of blood, she went up stairs to fetch something for her mistress, and on entering the room perceived a man seated on a corner of the sofa. Her first thought was that she had caught the thief in the act; but the next moment, perceiving the illusion, and determining to overcome it, she walked straight up to the place where the man seemed to be, with her eyes fixed on her. As she approached the figure appeared to glide along the sofa without rising or taking its eyes off her, until, reaching the other corner, it remained stationary there. She then went up to it, and, putting her hand where the head seemed to be, brought it violently down on the sofa. Although assured of the deception she hurried, pale and trembling, back to her mistress, to whom she recounted the adventure.

There are other causes, however, for such apparitions. The early training of young children often much to do with them. A child who has been often frightened by threats of Bogie, will have its mind so filled with a dread of visits from supernatural beings, that the feeling may cling to it in a certain measure, against better sense, and against all reasoning on experience, all through life.

The following story, however, has always been a mystery to me. The more I have thought of it, the more inexplicable it is as an illusion or reality. It seems impossible to assign a cause for the catastrophe with which it winds up. It is from a source absolutely devoid of misleading, and exceedingly unlikely to be misled:

"It is about thirty years since the events occurred which I am about to relate to you," writes the friend who has set the story down for me, "but so deep was the impression which they made on my mind that it seems to me as though the whole time should be counted by months rather than years.

"I was then a young officer in one of those regiments which had borne the brunt of the earlier part of the war in the Peninsula, and which, being greatly reduced in numbers, was first formed into provisional battalions, and ultimately directed to return home. We were none of us over well pleased with this arrangement; neither was our great chief, who knew the value of veteran troops, and considered the provisional battalions among the best of his army. But there was no help for it; and so, like good soldiers who know that their first duty is obedience, we received the order with little murmuring, and prepared to obey it.

"It was necessary to convey us for a brief space to the east, where transports should be ready; and few in number as we were, it was far easier necessary to do so in detachments. I went with several others in the direction of the village which had been pointed out to us on the route, and which good fun we made of, each on the way. Among my companions was a fellow named Harrison, a kindhearted, amiable lad, full of fun and even mischief, yet withal unflinching in principle, and ever an honorable gentleman. As to higher considerations than even these, we were all careless and reckless enough, thinking of nothing so much as how we might best amuse ourselves. Harrison was a prime favorite in our corps. He was young and handsome, well-knit, and capable of enduring any amount of fatigue. I know of no lad he had been my brother, and we were inseparable.

"Well! My party and I, after wandering about for a while, reached at length a small and beautiful village. It was situated in a valley, and was surrounded by trees, and shrubs, and plants of many kinds. Orange and olive, pomegranate and fig tree, all filled the air with their delicious fragrance. There were mountains, too, in the distance, softening beauty to the scene, and on a little eminence close to the village stood an old half-ruined monastery, partly covered with ivy and wild passion-flower, and adorned by a plantation of beautiful trees. On one side of the monastery lay a lovely little lake, by the margin of which Harrison and I often afterward wandered together in the cool hours of the evening.

"I immediately on reaching the village our attention was attracted to the old monastery, and we all pronounced it to be the place of all others in which to quarter our officers and men. Accordingly the few monks who still inhabited it were with no small difficulty persuaded to move out, and we very unceremoniously took their places. Tired by the toil of the day, I had sat down, like one or two others, to rest under one of the large olive-trees, when an old monk, whom I had noticed hovering about the place ever since his companions left, approached us. His silver hair and beard streamed over his brown serge dress; but there was a fierce light in his eye which age had not quenched. He shook his head gravely as he came near, and holding up his hand, said, 'Signor, you will repent that ever you came here; you will find no rest day nor night in this place. San Francesco guards his servants with jealous care, and you will call down his just wrath for desecrating this sanctuary. None ever offend him yet go unpunished. Remember my words, Signor; they are not vain words.'

"The old man crossed himself two or three times, and then hurried down by the wooded path which led into the valley, leaving us rather surprised, but of course not alarmed. Harrison laughed; we all laughed, finally resumed our conversation, and forgot all about the monk.

"Our next step was to make arrangements for getting supplies from the country people of the neighborhood, and on the whole we considered ourselves snugly and romantically disposed of for the week or more that we had to remain. Beautiful rides and walks within our reach, we had the assurance of good fishing in the lake, and shooting in the woods; and what with rides and walks, and fishing and shooting, and occasional dances with the village girls, time was not likely to hang heavy on our hands.

"Matters did not, however, turn out exactly as we had anticipated. It happened one day as I was passing round into the cook-room, that I noticed that the men were collected into knots of two and three, rather excited, and talking earnestly together; and returning to where I had left a quick step behind me, ...ergeant of our company came up, and touching his cap, begged to say a few words to me in private. He said,

"'I am quite at leisure now,' I said; 'what do you want?'

"'Well, Sir,' he began, with some embarrassment, clearing his throat two or three times, 'I am not in the way to trouble you, but did you observe, Sir, how odd the men in the guard are behaving round their room?'

"'No, I did not observe anything unusual, but thought it best to take no notice for this once. What is the matter with the men?'

"'Well, Sir,' continued the sergeant, his embarrassment growing greater, 'it does seem rather ridiculous, and yet it is true. The fact is, Sir (for it is no use the mincing the matter), the men declare they have seen a ghost passing through their room for two nights past, and they swear they won't sleep there again.'

"'A ghost!' I repeated, with a stare of amazement at the man, half doubting whether he were in his right senses. 'What do you mean, sergeant? Let me hear no more of it. If ghosts were realities—which they are not—I should be ashamed of the men if they could be afraid of ghosts.'

"The sergeant said no more, but, touching his cap, turned away, muttering that he was sorry he had spoken.

"Well, Sir,' continued the sergeant, his embarrassment growing greater, 'it does seem rather ridiculous, and yet it is true. The fact is, Sir (for it is no use the mincing the matter), the men declare they have seen a ghost passing through their room for two nights past, and they swear they won't sleep there again.'

"'A ghost!' I repeated, with a stare of amazement at the man, half doubting whether he were in his right senses. 'What do you mean, sergeant? Let me hear no more of it. If ghosts were realities—which they are not—I should be ashamed of the men if they could be afraid of ghosts.'

"The sergeant said no more, but, touching his cap, turned away, muttering that he was sorry he had spoken.

"The matter was brought to an end in another way. I had looked upon the matter as nonsense, I had treated it lightly, and been almost angry at the absurdity of the tale; yet it had left a deeper impression upon me than I liked, or those to admit to myself. Was this a dim, vague presentiment of what was to come? I cannot tell it was.

"I was half angry with myself for harboring the feeling, and determined to shake it off. I ordered a portion of the men off duty, and the remainder were assembled, and recounted what had passed between me and the sergeant. They all laughed, and declared that I was right, and that it was ridiculous to be afraid of ghosts, and so on, and so on, concluding any thing more to be said on the subject.

"The monastery consisted of three buildings: one long, low building which formed the side bounding formed the chapel, and the other contained the rooms and cells once occupied by the monks. In the centre of these buildings was a small quadrangular yard, from which you passed into the garden, and thence descended into the valley beneath, planted with trees and shrubs. The quadrangle was quite empty, save that a fountain stood in the centre; an arrangement not unusual in southern countries. The long building was the one which had been allotted to me, some lounged about doing nothing. Harrison and I wandered away from the rest taking our arms with us, and did not return until late in the evening. We had been more than usually joyous, and I had almost forgotten the occurrence of the morning, when, on my return to the quarters of the monastery, we were surprised to perceive the men's blankets all arranged in order round the yard. Before either of us had time to make a remark, the sergeant who had spoken to me before came up, and touching his cap, begged to inform me that, the night being extremely hot, the men had brought out their blankets to sleep in the open air, as they could not bear the confinement of the under vault in their room from their midnight intruder. I made no objection to their preferring the cool air to the stifling one of the rooms, and at dinner it was quietly arranged that a few of us should not go to bed at the usual time, but should remain up to watch.

"It was a clear, bright night. Beautiful as nights can be only in southern climates. I had seldom seen any thing more striking than the grim old monastery, with its turrets and battles, its grated windows and massive iron portals, and its large surrounding trees, standing out clear and distinct under the rays of a full moon. And beyond it, about half a mile off, lay the small lake, calm and quiet as a mirror, and reflecting the graceful trees which grew on its edge, and bent their slender boughs into its water. Upon its smooth surface the heavens were reflected; each particular star looking down upon its image.

"A few of the officers, including Harrison and myself, had gone into the court-yard about eleven o'clock, determined to wait there until the clock struck one, and then, if nothing appeared, return quietly to our rooms. The men had all lain down, but I am sure there was not one of them asleep; not a light was to be seen any where about the building, for at an appointed hour they had been all put out. Growing tired of waiting for the ghost in vain, Harrison and I walked up and down the yard, the others following our example; and we were already thinking of going in, when, as the clock struck half past twelve, Harrison suddenly stopped short, touched my arm, and without saying a word pointed toward the chapel. His movement had been noticed by the rest, and all eyes were immediately turned in that direction, when we perceived issuing from one of the windows overlooking the yard a faint, greenish light. We said nothing, but drawing to one side, stood still. In a few moments we saw emerging from the same window a shadowy figure, holding in its right hand a small lamp, evidently the source of the strange light which had attracted our notice. The apparition moved slowly and noiselessly along the sill, though evidently its feet did not rest upon any thing, and looked at them all as it passed; then, reaching our group, it turned its gaze upon us for a moment, and disappeared through the left wing of the building.

"A dead silence succeeded; we were all too much astonished to speak, and we looked at one another. Then the silence was broken by a murmur of triumph among the men, and we were obliged to acknowledge that we had seen their ghost, and could not account for it. Various surmises and conjectures were broached, and we determined to discover what the ghost was.

"Next day we were all astir early, and every room in the building was examined; not a corner but was thoroughly searched. Up and down, right and left, above ground, and in the vaults below, we went, but in vain. We ransacked the floor of the chapel through and through. Seeing nothing that gave the faintest clew to the mystery, we sent for masons from the village, and had the doors walled up. The windows were all barred and bolted, and we hoped that we had most effectually shut out, or shut in, the ghost.

"The day passed much as usual, except that we awaited the evening with much anxiety, which increased as the hour for taking up our watch approached. This time all the officers remained up to keep watch together. Slowly the hours passed over until the eleven o'clock struck twelve. Then we stood ready and intent, awaiting the next stroke. Half past twelve, a quarter to one, and we were beginning to congratulate ourselves on having effectually walled up the ghost when the pale green light of the previous night again became visible. It appeared for a moment in its progress over the beds of five or six of the men, and breathed a sort of infernal hiss into each of their faces. Again it came down to us, and then vanished. We were petrified; all our proceedings had availed us nothing, and that this time the dread apparition had emitted a sufficiently audible to be heard by us, who were some distance.

"What was to be done next?

"Whatever this is,' said Harrison, while his lips curled slightly with contempt, 'I am determined to drive it from our rooms. We must not allow ourselves to be frightened. Since I was a child I have been taught to reject ghosts, and I have no belief in ghosts now.' Saying this, if this thing appears, we must give chase. You will help me?' he added, turning to me.

"Of course I promised to stand by him, though more than doubtful of our doing any good. It was agreed that on the following night we, the officers, should sleep in the rooms, one sentry posting at the right wing, the other at the left; and that we should both rush on this mysterious appearance as soon as it left the wall by closing in upon it, render escape impossible. In this plan the men joined most heartily.

"We were all on our towards, yet, I confess it, the sight of this strangely mysterious apparition, with its unearthly light, had made my blood run cold, while its hiss and its breath upon my face had proved that they liked it as little as I did.

"Again night arrived, and again we took post in the court-yard, awaiting the accustomed hour. Our hearts beat faster when we saw the now well-known green light appearing at the chapel window. Slowly it descended, followed over the men's beds, holding up its pale lamp; and I remarked, with something like a shudder, that it uttered its horrible hiss to the same six men as on the previous night. At a signal we rushed forward from both sides and closed in. The spectre, with a movement which seemed attempt, gave one of its fearful hisses into Harrison's very face, and then we saw it walking (so it seemed) above our heads, as it passed through the inner entry.

"Without a word from any one—for we were all too much horrified to speak—we re-entered the house, and each one, except Harrison and I, occupied a room together, and, as we went into it, I remarked that his face and lips were ashy pale.

"'For Heaven's sake,' he said, in a voice so hollow that it made me start, 'never speak of this thing again, and let us leave this place as soon as possible.'

"We went to bed, but did not sleep. The apparition was before my closed eyes, while its hiss seemed still ringing in my ears. I could hear, by the restless tossing of my companion, that he, too, shared my vigils. At length, after some weary hours, I fell asleep, and when I awoke, late in the morning, I was pleased and relieved to see Harrison sleeping soundly.

"We all met at breakfast; but as if by one consent, seemed to avoid the subject of the apparition. I had serious thoughts of leaving the village, and seeking for billets elsewhere, only it was difficult, now that all our arrangements were made, to leave the place; not to speak of the embarrassment of explaining such an unusual proceeding. We agreed to remain where we were for a few days longer, in the hope that order to march for Lisbon would soon arrive. I do not know that an immediate removal from the monastery would have effected any change in the catastrophe of the story, except, perhaps, in some of its details; but I greatly regretted at the time, and can not but regret to this day, that we did not thereby some pretext to escape from that terrible place.

"We kept no more watch for the ghost, and three nights passed by without any report being made from the men of its reappearance.

"One sunny afternoon—it was either the fourth or the fifth day after the last appearance of the apparition—Harrison, and two other officers, set out on horseback for a neighboring point of interest. It was a glorious day, and we were all in capital spirits, which seemed to be shared by our horses, for they carried us lightly and swiftly along. Harrison had a beautiful horse—a noble animal—a light chestnut, and as quiet and gentle a horse as ever man rode. It was the pride of its master and the admiration of the regiment. We had ridden about a mile or more from the abbey, and were pausing to look at its view, which was fine, when we perceived an orderly coming toward us. He wanted to speak to Harrison, and as our horses were impatient we rode on slowly before, leaving Harrison to overtake us when his business was done.

"'What on earth can be keeping Harrison?' said one of my companions, after a time; 'we shall lose our ride.'

"'I hope he had to turn back,' I replied. 'We had better ride on; mounted as he is, he will soon come up with us.'

"We proceeded, expecting every moment to see him arrive, yet no sound of his horse's feet reached us; and so time passed, and he came not. At any rate, we thought, he must have thought nothing of it, except that pressing business, after a time, forced him to return to the monastery; but the disagreeable occurrence of the previous week had rendered me unable to rid myself of a certain feeling of presentiment of evil to come. Often and often since then have I reproached myself for not having obeyed its warning voice!

"A sudden turn in the road widened the prospect before us, and we stopped again to wait for Harrison, and to admire the spreading country around. About two hundred yards from us, toward the right, the lake already mentioned. We had not reined up many minutes when, in a voice of wonder and alarm, one of my companions exclaimed,

"'There's Harrison! Good God! what is he about?'

We all looked in the direction to which he pointed, and saw Harrison galloping at full speed along the path which girded the lake. The reins were loose upon the horse's neck; the bit had had fallen off, and his hair, blown about by the wind, gave a wild appearance to his face. Before many seconds had elapsed the horse and rider swerved, and galloped straight into the lake. The waters gurgled for a moment, and then both horse and rider disappeared!

"A few minutes brought us to the monastery, where we gave the alarm, and the men turned out with ropes and poles and such means as they could lay hold upon. Not a trace of Harrison or his horse could be discerned, and for a full hour all our efforts to discover the spot where or where they had sunk proved fruitless. At last one of our drags struck upon something, and first the horse and then Harrison were dragged to shore. Both were dead, of course; but never, to my own dying day, shall I forget the peculiar expression that overshadowed my friend's face. It was one of such fearful agony, such intense anguish, that my heart sickened, and though not a word was said by those around, we felt assured that all were equally struck and confounded by it. How dreadfully painful and mysterious still was the horror that hung over the face of the dead!

"Slowly and sadly the body of Harrison was brought home and laid on the bed he had so lately occupied in life. As we unclosed his hand still in his locus a small miniature likeness. It was the picture of a young ...ss; I knew whose face, for Harrison had confided his history to me. I bent over my friend, and cutting off a lock of his dark hair, I placed it gently round the little picture, and then put them up in my pocket-book carefully aside.

"The evening came. All that remained to be done for our lost comrade had been done, and we—that is, I myself and a few of the others—had gathered in the room where he lay. One by one, and see whether he had left any memoranda of wishes to be fulfilled. In his desk there was a sealed letter to his mother, and another to the original of the miniature—nothing else. That night I resolved to pass in his room, with two or three of my companions, sleeping watch by the body. A fearful gloom hung over us as we sat there in silence beside our dead comrade, the favorite of every man among us. We had been many hours thus, and see whether he had left any memoranda of wishes to be fulfilled. In his desk there was a sealed letter to his mother, and another to the original of the miniature—nothing else. That night I resolved to pass in his room, with two or three of my companions, sleeping watch by the body. A fearful gloom hung over us as we sat there in silence beside our dead comrade, the favorite of every man among us. We had been many hours thus, and see whether he had left any memoranda of wishes to be fulfilled. In his desk there was a sealed letter to his mother, and another to the original of the miniature—nothing else. That night I resolved to pass in his room, with two or three of my companions, sleeping watch by the body. A fearful gloom hung over us as we sat there in silence beside our dead comrade, the favorite of every man among us. We had been many hours thus, and "Next day the body of poor Harrison was buried beside a large spreading tree. I have been at the burial of many officers and comrades, but never in my life have I attended one so sad. That very day we began our march to Lisbon, and before the end of the week embarked on board the transports prepared for us. Of the six men into whose faces the apparition had hissed, or seemed to hiss, not one reached England. One threw himself overboard in a fit of madness, and five died on the voyage.

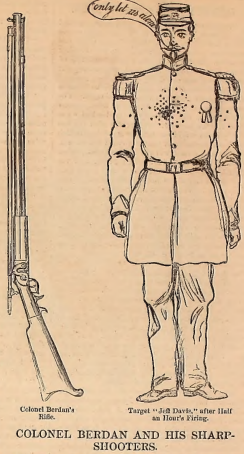
"I have never been able to unravel the mystery of Harrison's death. It will never be unraveled now, I suppose, until the day when all secrets are revealed."

COLONEL BERDAN, OF THE BERDAN SHARP-SHOOTERS, PRACTISING AT A TARGET AT WEEHAWKEN, NEW JERSEY.



Colonel Berdan's Rifle. Target "Jeff Davis," after Half an Hour's Firing.

COLONEL BERDAN AND HIS SHARP-SHOOTERS.

We illustrate herewith the exploits of Colonel Berdan and his famous sharp-shooting regiment, which will shortly be heard of at the war. On 7th the Colonel gave an exhibition of his skill at Weehawken, New Jersey, in presence of a large crowd of spectators. The reporter of the Evening Post thus described the scene:

The "man target," christened Jeff Davis, was set up at a distance of a little more than two hundred yards. Colonel Berdan inaugurated the firing. In an easy, business-like way he loaded his rifle, an ordinary target piece, with a telescopic sight, and approached the "rest." The visitors crowded around him in every direction, excepting, of course, that occupied by the muzzle of the rifle. A sense of personal danger preserved a small opening there. The wind blew quite heavily.

It will be conceded that these circumstances were not particularly conducive to careful and unerring aim. But Colonel Berdan is a man of wonderful nerve. The crowd did not at all disturb him. He proceeded in the work with the utmost steadiness, balancing his rifle for a moment, to feel the head of the figure. When the smoke cleared away, the hole made by the bullet was observed by the aid of the telescope—the cheek, near the nose.

Again the Colonel loaded and quickly fired at the head, hitting it just over the frontispiece of the cap which was pointed upon it.

The third shot was fired. "Put his eye out," remarked the Colonel. The ball had struck near enough to that organ to destroy its use had it been a real one.

The fourth shot hit the face.

"I'll try nature's rest," said the Colonel, and he proceeded to a knoll near by, and throwing himself at its side, accommodated his person to its shape and took aim, but the percussion cap only exploded. "Davis is safe this time," he remarked. "Well try him again." Another cap was provided, and the lunge was struck just below the front piece of the cap. The aim was quite as accurate as that he had previously obtained.

The sixth shot hit about two inches lower than the fifth.

The seventh hit the top of the head.

Loading again, the Colonel made ready to fire. "Where will you have this shot?" he inquired of one standing by. "In the end of the nose," was the answer. "Between the eyes," suggested another. At this moment the rifle was discharged. "You spoke too late," quietly remarked the Colonel, "he has another nostril." A gentleman was called to witness the effect of the shot, and afterward our reporter. It was as the Colonel had said. The nose had an additional aperture.

"Where shall I put the next shot?" the Colonel inquired of the gentleman at whose request he had spoiled the nose of the target. "Try his right eye," was the answer. No sooner said than it was done. The ball entered the lower part of the eye. The effect of this shot was carefully noted by several persons through the glass.

"Will you tell me where to hit him again?" once more asked the Colonel of the person who had called the last two shots. That individual declined. He was satisfied that the Colonel could hit any thing, and he was not worth while to fire at the image, whose face was riddled. "We will hit him once more, and now in the centre of the forehead." This shot, the tenth, was the finest of the whole. It took effect midway between the front piece of the cap and the root of the nose, and directly over that organ. The distances were almost mathematically accurate.

The Times thus speaks of the Regiment:

Some idea of the rigidity of the test may be gathered from the fact that no man is admitted who does not shoot, at 500 feet distance, ten consecutive shots of an average of ten inches from the bull's-eye. That is, the aggregate distance of the whole ten shots must not exceed fifty inches. Not a man is accepted under any circumstances who varies a half-breadth from the mark. Remarkable though it may seem, many of the men exceed this proficiency. Colonel Berdan himself has, on a windy day, with a strange rifle, put ten balls within an average distance of one inch and one-tenth each from the bull's-eye, at 600 feet. At 1000 feet the Colonel made a range of 72 inches. Sergeant-Major Brown, under more unfavorable circumstances, made a string of 33 inches, or a little more than three inches each ball, at a distance of 100 yards, with a strange rifle. In testing the applicants at Albany, about two-thirds were found unfitted, and indeed the general average of incompetent applicants is more than that. The American riflemen prove generally superior, especially the hunters of New England and the West. The First Lieutenant of Captain Hoschneker's company is Mr. Townley, formerly Professor of Mathematics in the Nashville Military Academy, and other gentlemen equally qualified will be in the ranks.

The uniform of the sharp-shooters will be green in summer and gray at other seasons, to assimilate as nearly as possible with the colors of nature. They ridicule the idea of Zouave and Havelock uniforms, as offering too splendid a target for marksmen. They will be armed with the most improved Springfield rifle, with a plain silver pin sight at the muzzle, and notch sight, or the globe sight at the breech for long range, or on a dark day, or night shooting. It was at first intended to arm them with the Northern target-rifle, but it was found that these were not enough in the country. Colonel Berdan has invented a ball which is superior to the old Springfield rifle ball. It will carry with great accuracy a distance of 3000 feet. It is a grooved and conical ball, and it almost certain for a horse at the distance of three-fifths of a mile. Each man may take his own rifle if he wishes.

The design of the Colonel is to have the regiment detached in squads on the field of battle to do duty in picking off officers and gunners on the European plan, by which they take the risk of being cut off by cavalry, or executed, as they certainly would be, if taken. It is the first regiment of rifles ever formed worthy of the name—i. e., that subjected each member to the rifle-shooting test.

Colonel Berdan comes of Huguenot stock. His ancestry came to this country after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He was born in the western part of New York.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL BURNSIDE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

BRIG.-GEN. BURNSIDE, U.S.A.

We take pleasure in laying before our readers the portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL BURNSIDE, United States Army, one of the most gallant officers in the army. General Burnside was born some thirty-seven years ago, in Indiana, and entered the Military Academy at West Point from that State. On graduating he entered the Second Artillery, and served in Captain (now rebel General) Bragg's Company for several years. Some six or seven years since he invented a rifle of peculiar merit, and, resigning his rank in the army (which was that of Lieutenant), devoted his whole time to his invention. At that period it was intended to arm the United States army with some improved weapon, and several inventors competed for the prize. Among others, Burnside's rifle was the subject of many tests, and, in the opinion of good judges, was the best of the many pieces offered to the War Department. The inventor had reason to believe that it would be the one chosen: he had, we understand, assurances to that effect from John B. Floyd, then Secretary of War, and was thus induced to incur heavy outlays to bring his weapon to perfection. But the fact was that Floyd had already made a secret bargain with another inventor to decide in favor of his rifle, on the condition that he, Floyd, was to participate in the profits of the invention.

This appalling discovery was made by Major Burnside after he had incurred very heavy expenses to bring his weapon to perfection. He was a ruined man. He returned to New York without occupation, without money, and with heavy debts pressing for payment.

We believe it to be a fact that, a few days after the discovery of Floyd's treachery, he walked up the Bowery to a hostile battery, entered a Jew clothing-store, and sold his uniform and sword for something like thirty dollars; handing this, and some twenty dollars more, to his wife, he kept half as much for himself, and went to the West in search of employment. There he had the good luck to meet with the President General M'Clellan. He served the Illinois Central until the outbreak of the war; and we hope that we may be forgiven for adding that, until recently—when a fortunate legacy raised General Burnside to a position of affluence—by the practice of the most rigid economy, he was able to pay over two-thirds of his salary monthly to the creditors to whom he had become indebted in consequence of the treachery of John B. Floyd.

General Burnside is a remarkably handsome man, and very winning in his manners. He is popular with every one, and has many friends at the South. In January last, when only a few persons here foresaw the issue of war, he warned the leading men of New Orleans, on the occasion of a visit there, of the consequences of their mad folly. "You are going to involve us in war," he said, "and you will be beaten. One Northern man can whip two of your people." They didn't like it, but Burnside's eye warned them that he was a man with whom it would not be pleasant to quarrel.

We can not conclude this little sketch without adding that, as in all well-ordered stories, the rogue Floyd made nothing by his rascality. Jeff Davis, then chairman of the Senate Committee on Military affairs, found him out, and was so disgusted that he introduced — solely for the purpose of heading off Floyd — a bill to prohibit the purchase of patented arms for the United States army. He explained the motive of the bill privately to the leaders of both Houses, and it became a law, greatly to Floyd's discomfiture, as may be imagined. We do not envy Brigadier-General Floyd if, in the course of the war, he should happen to meet his old acquaintance, the gallant Brigadier-General Burnside.

THE REBEL GENERAL LEE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE REBEL GENERAL LEE.

We publish herewith, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of the rebel GENERAL LEE, now one of the "generals" of the Confederate forces in Virginia. ROBERT E. LEE was born in Virginia about the year 1805. He entered West Point, where he received the usual military education at the cost of the Government of the United States. He graduated honorably in 1829, and received an appointment as Second Lieutenant of Engineers. For eighteen years he served in the army, drawing the usual pay from the Government, and rising to the rank of Major and Lieutenant-Colonel of Cavalry. In the Mexican war he was further honored by a brevet of Colonel, and on the appointment of Albert S. Johnston to the command of the Utah expedition, Lee succeeded him in command of the 2d Cavalry. After filling this honorable and agreeable post in the military service of his country for several years, he crowned his career by deserting his flag at the moment of his country's sorest need. When the Richmond politicians passed what they called an Ordinance of Secession, Robert E. Lee threw up his commission and accepted the rank of General in the rebel army.

Rules for Preserving the Health of the Soldier.

REPORT OF THE U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

PUBLISHED AT THE REQUEST OF THE SANITARY COMMISSIONERS.

THE members of the Sanitary Commission ordered by the President of the United States, and acting under the direction of the Secretary of War, in co-operation with the Army Medical Bureau, to secure by all possible means the health and efficiency of our troops not in the field, and to prevent unnecessary disease and suffering, do most earnestly and affectionately request their brethren of the volunteer and militia to adopt and carry out the following "RULES FOR PRESERVING THE HEALTH OF THE SOLDIER." They are derived from the highest authority and the largest experience of military and medical men; and it is believed that, if followed with the intelligence and honesty of purpose which characterizes the American soldier, they will save the lives of thousands of brave men who would be otherwise lost to the service of their country.

They are addressed alike to officers and privates, inasmuch as the latter are liable to promotion, and upon their officers devolves the responsibility of securing their health, safety, and comfort. They will be found in no instance to conflict with the "Army Regulations," by which all ranks are governed, and with which every good soldier should be familiar.

1. It is absolutely necessary, for the sake of humanity and the efficiency of the army, that every man laboring under any physical infirmity which is liable to unfit him for bearing without injury the fatigues and hardships of a soldier's life in the field, should be promptly discharged from the service by his commanding officer on a surgeon's certificate of disability. (Army Regulations, par. 159-167, and 1134, 1135, 1136.)

It is the duty of every good soldier who is conscious of any such disease or defect, which may have been overlooked on inspection, to report himself to the surgeon for advice.

In case of discharge, means are provided for his prompt payment and conveyance to his home.

2. Every officer and soldier should be carefully vaccinated with fresh vaccine matter, unless already marked by small-pox; and in all cases where there is any doubt as to the success of the operation it should be repeated at once.

"Good vaccine matter will be kept on hand by timely requisition on the Surgeon-General." (General Regulations, par. 1105, 1134.)

3. Medical officers are earnestly advised to make themselves familiar with the "Revised Regulations for the Medical Department of the Army," a copy of which should be obtained by application to the Surgeon-General. They will there learn the proper modes of securing supplies of medicines, instruments, and hospital stores, and rules for official conduct under all circumstances.

4. The articles of food composing the rations issued by the United States Commissary Department have been proved, by sound experience, to be those best calculated for the food of the soldier.

The amounts allowed for each man is greater in quantity than the similar allowance to the European soldier. If he understands his duties and manages well, any commissary of subsistence can save from 15 to 20 per cent. out of the ration furnished by Government, and with the money thus saved, fresh vegetables, butter, milk, etc., may be procured.

5. When the surgeon considers it necessary for the health of the troops, the commanding officer, on his recommendation, may order issues of potatoes, vegetables, pickled onions, sauer-kraut, or molasses, with an extra quantity of rice and vinegar." (Army Regulations, paragraph 1073.)

Desiccated vegetables and dried apples may be obtained on similar authority.

6. When the issues furnished for the troops are damaged, or in any way unfit for use, the Army Regulations require the commanding officer to appoint a "Board of Survey," composed of competent officers, by which they may be condemned, in which case, good provisions are issued in their stead. (Par. 959.)

7. Soldiers should always eat at regular hours, as far as the exigencies of service permit. Neglect of regular meals may be made to disorder the digestion, and to invite diarrhœa.

8. Each company should have its regularly detailed cook and assistant, who should always, on a march, be allowed to ride in one of the wagons, when practicable, inasmuch as their services are more necessary for the health of the men than in the ranks, and they are often required to cook at night the rations for the next day, while the men are sleeping. The men should always willingly procure wood and water for the cooks, whether detailed for such service or otherwise.

9. "Bread and soup are the great items of a soldier's diet in every situation; to make them well is therefore an essential part of his instruction. These great sources of a camp life, the scurvy and diarrhœa, more frequently result from a want of skill in cooking than from the badness of the ration, or from any other cause whatever. Officers in command, and more immediately regimental officers, will therefore give a strict attention to this subordinate as can be obtained. It may also be boiled; but roasting, broiling, or frying, in camp, are wasteful and unhealthy modes of cooking.

11. "In camp or barracks the company officers must visit the kitchen daily, and inspect the kettles. * * * The commanding officer of the post or regiment will make frequent inspections of the kitchens and messes. * * * The greatest care will be observed in washing and scouring the cooking utensils: those made of brass or copper should be lined with tin. * * * The bread must be thoroughly baked, and not eaten until it is cold. The soup must be boiled at least five hours, and the vegetables always cooked sufficiently to be perfectly soft and digestible." (Regulations, par. 111, 112, 1135.) Medical officers should frequently examine the articles of food issued to the men, inspect and taste it when cooked, and scrutinize the goodness of the cooking, and the condition, as to safety and cleanliness, of cooking and eating-places.

12. Spirits should only be issued to the men after unusual exertion, fatigue, or exposure, and on the discretion of the surgeon.

Those men who drink spirits habitually, or who commit excess in its use, are the first to fall when strength and endurance are required, and they are less likely to recover from wounds and injuries.

13. Water should be always drank in moderation, especially when the body is heated. The excessive thirst which follows violent exertion, or loss of blood, is unnatural, and is not quenched by large and repeated draughts; on the contrary, these are liable to do harm by causing bowel complaints. Experience teaches the old soldier that the less he drinks when on a march the better, and that he suffers less in the end by controlling the desire to drink, however urgent.

14. There is no more frequent source of disease, in camp life, than inattention to the calls of nature. Habitual neglect of nature's wants will certainly lead to disease and suffering. A trench should always be dug, and provided with a pole, supported by uprights, at a properly selected spot at some little distance from camp, as soon as the locality of the latter has been determined upon; one should be provided for the officers, and another for the men. The strictest discipline in regard to the performance of these duties is absolutely essential to health, as well as to public decency. Recruits are authorized to void their excrement elsewhere than in the regularly established sinks. In a well regulated camp the sinks are filled up, from time to time, with a certain layer of earth thrown in, and lime and other disinfecting agents employed to prevent them from becoming offensive and unhealthy. It is the duty of the surgeon to call the attention of the commanding officer to any neglect of the important item of camp police, and also to any spot in the vicinity, where the cattle are slaughtered, are not allowed to become offensive, and that all offal is promptly buried at a sufficient distance from camp, and covered by at least four feet of earth. (Regulations, par. 505, 313.)

15. Except when impossible for military reasons, the site of a camp should be selected for the dryness of its soil, its proximity to fresh water of good quality, and shelter from the winds. It should also be on a slight declivity, in order to facilitate drainage, and not in the vicinity of swamps or stagnant water.

A trench, at least two feet deep, should be dug around each tent, to secure dryness, and these should lead into other main drains or gutters, by which the water will be conducted away from the tents.

16. Sleeping upon damp ground causes dysentery and fevers. A "Board of Regulations" fixed the dimensions of the camp permit (never less than two paces); crowding is always injurious to health. (Regulations, p. 340.) Whenever it can be, encampment should be allowed to be deposited in the trenches for drainage around the tents. Each tent should be thoroughly swept out daily, and the materials used for bedding aired and sunned, if possible; the canvas should be raised freely at its base, and it should be taken down and carefully aired during the daytime, in dry weather, in order to secure ventilation, for tents are liable to become very unhealthy if not constantly and thoroughly aired.

Free ventilation should also be secured at night by opening and raising the base of the tent to as great an extent as the weather will permit.

18. The crowding of men in tents for sleeping is highly injurious to health, and may be justly prevented by a commanding officer who is anxious for the welfare of his men. Experience has proved that sleeping beneath the canvas is not so safe as even in the open air, is less dangerous to health than overcrowding in tents.

No more men in a tent should ever be allowed to sleep in a common army tent of the kind most commonly in use.

19. The men should sleep in their shirts and drawers, removing the shoes, stockings, and outer clothing, except when absolutely impracticable. Sleeping in the clothes is never so refreshing, and is absolutely unhealthy.

20. The men should never be allowed to sleep in wet clothing, or clothing damp with sweat, if it can possibly avoided; and, after being wetted, all articles of clothing and blankets should be thoroughly dried and aired before they are used. After a thorough wetting there is no serious danger as long as the body is kept in motion; but the wet clothes should be carried in a dry shirt and drawers before sleeping, otherwise there is danger of talking cold, and of other grave forms of disease. If the men are deficient in the necessary supply of clothing for a change, the surgeon should report the fact to the commanding officer.

21. Camp fires should be allowed whenever admissible; they are useful for purifying the air, for preventing annoyance from insect, for drying clothing, and for security against chilliness during the night.

22. The under-clothing should be washed and thoroughly dried once a week.

The men should bathe, or wash the whole body with water, at least once a week, and oftener when practicable, but the feet should be bathed daily, and the stockings washed whenever soiled.

23. The hair and beard should be closely cropped. If vermin make their appearance, apply promptly to the surgeon for means to destroy them. Extra soap may be procured on recommendation of the surgeon.

It is the immediate duty of non-commissioned officers in command of squads to see that these, and all other precautions required for the health of the men, are strictly carried out under the orders of the company and medical officers.

24. When bowel complaints are prevalent, be especially observant of the rules for preserving health, and apply to the surgeon for a flannel bandage to be worn constantly around the belly.

25. It is wise and prudent, when ague and fevers are prevalent, that every man should take a dose of quinine bitters at least once in twenty-four hours. This will surely serve as a safeguard against an attack of disease; it has been practiced in Florida and elsewhere with undoubted benefit.

26. The men should not be over-drilled. It is likely to beget disgust for drill, and to defeat its object. Three drills a day, of one hour each, for squads, and a proportionate length of time, when sufficiently advanced, for battalion drill, is more profitable than double the time similarly occupied.

27. When practicable, amusements, sports, and gymnastic exercises should be favored among the men, such as running, leaping, wrestling, fencing, bayonet-exercise, cricket, base-ball, foot-ball, quoits, etc., etc.

28. On a march take especial care of the feet. Bathe them carefully on encamping, not in the morning. Select a shoe of stout, soft leather, with a broad sole, and low heel.

Prefer woolen socks. If the feet begin to chafe, rub the socks with common soap where they come in contact with the sore places.

29. All the above rules and rests are little as possible while marching. The recruit, on the contrary, is continually munching the contents of his haversack—a habit to be corrected. It is a bad habit, and causes more suffering in the end.

30. The commencement of the day's march should be gradual. The habit of many men so much of hanging around a camp, waiting for the word to start.

31. It is a great comfort to the men to halt for ten or fifteen minutes at the end of the first half hour; many, about this time, require to attend to the calls of nature. At this time there should be a halt of ten or fifteen minutes at the end of every hour, with a rest of twenty minutes in the middle of the day for the meal. Each halt should take this stiffens the men and renders subsequent marching difficult. The best rule is to get through the day's march, and rest in camp, if possible, by two o'clock P.M.

32. The best pace to adopt, in marching, is from 90 to 100 steps in the minute; 90 to the minute is this will give a rate of from 2½ to 2¾ miles to the hour.

In continuous marches, the leading companies should be alternated each day, as it is always less fatiguing to be in advance.

33. At the end of the day's march every man should bathe his feet, and wash his stockings, and get his meal before lying down to rest, removing and changing the stockings, if wet.

34. Whenever, on a march, facilities of transportation are available, it is wise to allow the men to put their knapsacks in the wagons; this is a most intense saving of strength, especially to troops unaccustomed to marching.

35. When the liability to attack, and when the troops are going into battle, this measure is particularly recommended, as the men, under these circumstances, go light, and have their knapsacks, overcoats, and blankets.

36. In action, the proper position in which to meet a wound or fainting man is flat upon his back, with the head very slightly raised.

36. The most urgent want of a wounded man is water; if a canteen or cup is not at hand, bring it in a hat or any available vessel.

37. As a rule, when the skin remains extensive, are less dangerous to life than they seem; the contrary is true of bayonet and bullet wounds.

38. Whenever bleeding freely from a wound by spirts or jets, there is immediate danger, and, if the wound is situated in one of the limbs, a vessel inclosing a large artery will be pressed tightly loosely around it, between the wound and the heart; a drum-stick, bayonet, ramrod, or jack-knife is to be found in almost every case, and the bandage, and twisted around until the strangulation of the limb stops the flow of blood, and it should be held there by a tourniquet improvised.

39. Wounds should always be handled with extreme care, especially if bones are broken. The medical assistants are always provided with splints and anodynes.

40. It is by no means necessary that a bullet should always be sought for and very often remain in the body, and do little or no harm, much less, in fact, than might be done in attempts to remove them.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER VII.

I HAVE given a sketch of the outward woman of Mrs. Colonel Poyntz. The inward woman was a recondite mystery, deep as that of the sphinx, whose features her own resembled. But between the outward and the inward woman there is ever a third woman—the conventional woman—such as the whole human being appears to the world and always mantled, sometimes masked.

I am told that the fine people of London do not recognize the title of "Mrs. Colonel." If that be true, the fine people of London must be clearly in the wrong, for no people in the universe could be finer than the fine people of Abbey Hill; and they considered their sovereign had as good a right to the title of Mrs. Colonel as the Queen of England has to that of "our Gracious Lady." But Mrs. Poyntz herself never assumed the title of Mrs. Colonel; it never appeared on her cards any more than the title of "Gracious Lady" appears on the cards which convey the invitation that a Lord Steward or Lord Chamberlain is commanded by her Majesty to issue. Mrs. Miles, indeed, Mrs. Miles evinced no superstitious reverence. Two peeresses related to her, not distantly, were in the habit of paying her a yearly visit, which lasted two or three days. The Hill considered these visits an honor to its eminence. Mrs. Poyntz never seemed to consider them an honor to herself; never boasted of them; never sought to show off her grand relations, nor put herself the least out of the way to entertain them. Her mode of life was free from ostentation. She had the advantage of being a few hundreds a year richer than any other inhabitant of the Hill; but she did not devote her superior resources to the invidious exhibition of superior splendor. Like a true woman of the old régime, of her exchequer were applied to the benefit of her subjects, and not to the vanity of egotistical parade. As to her style of living and her carriage, she declined to keep one. Her entertainments were simple, but numerous. Twice a week she received at the Hill, and generally at home to it. She contrived to make her parties proverbially agreeable. The refreshments were of the best at the Hill, and especially the set of her old maids of honor might proffer; but they were better of their kind, the best of their kind—the best tea, the best lemonade, the best cakes. Her rooms had an air of comfort which was peculiar to them. They looked like rooms accustomed to receive, and receive in a homely way; well warmed, well lighted, card-tables and piano in the place that made cards and music inviting. On the walls a few old family portraits, and three or four other pictures, said to be valuable, and certainly pleasing to look upon—one, a Canaletti, a Weenix—plenty of easy-chairs and settees covered with a cheerful chintz. In the arrangement of the furniture there was an indescribable careless elegance. She herself was studiously plain in dress, more conspicuously free from jewelry and trinkets than any middle-aged lady on the Hill. But I have heard from those who were authorities on such a subject, that she was never seen in a dress of the last year's fashion. She adopted the mode as it came out, just enough to show that she was not a recluse to fancy; but with a sober reserve, as much as to say, "I adopt the fashion as far as it suits myself; I do not permit the fashion to adopt me." In short, Mrs. Colonel Poyntz was sometimes rough, sometimes coarse, always masculine; and yet, somehow or other, masculine in a womanly way; she was a clever vulgar, because never affected. It was impossible not to allow that she was a thorough gentlewoman, and that should do things that no other gentlewoman without any loss of dignity. Thus she was an admirable mimic, certainly in itself the least lady-like condescension in manners. But when she mimicked, it was with so tranquil a gravity, or so royal a good-humor, that one could only say, "What matter for gravity, but not cold; hating trouble of every kind, pleased to seem a cipher in his own house. If the sole study of Mrs. Colonel had been to make her husband comfortable, she could not have succeeded better than by bringing friends about him and leaving them and him to their friends. Colonel Poyntz, the re-colonel, had seen in his youth actual service; but had quitted the profession early in peace days ago, shortly after his marriage. He was a younger brother of one of the principal squires in his county (Hillshire), the house for him, with some other valuable property in and about L——, from an uncle; was considered a good landlord; and proudly wore his wig. He never seemed to read any thing but the newspapers and the Meteorological Journal; was supposed to be the most weather-wise man in all L——. He had another intellectual predilection—whist. But in that he had less reputation for wisdom. Perhaps it requires a rarer combination of mental faculties to win an odd trick than to divine a fall in the glass. For the rest, the re-colonel, many years older than his wife, despite the thin youthful figure, was an admirable aid-de-camp to the general in command, Mrs. Colonel; and she could not have found one more obedient, more devoted, or more proud of a distinguished chief.

In giving to Mrs. Colonel Poyntz the appellation of Queen of the Hill, let there be no mistake. She was not a constitutional sovereign; her monarchy was absolute. All her proclamations had the force of laws.

Such sovereignty could not have been attained without considerable talents for acquiring and keeping it. Amidst all her off-hand, brisk, imperious frankness, she had the ineffable discrimination of tact. Whether civil or rude, she was never civil or rude but what she carried public opinion along with her. Her knowledge of general society must have been limited, as must be that of all female sovereigns. But she seemed gifted with an intuitive knowledge of human nature, which she applied to her special ambition of ruling it. I have not a doubt that if she had been suddenly transferred, a perfect stranger, to the world of London, she would have soon forced her way to its selectest circles, and, when once there, held her own against a duchess.

I have said that she was not affected; this might be one cause of her sway over a set in which nearly every other female was trying rather to seem, than to be, a somebody.

But if Mrs. Colonel Poyntz was not artificial, she was artful, or perhaps I might more justly say—artistic. In all she said and did there were conduct, system, plan. She could be a most serviceable friend, a most damaging enemy; yet I believe she seldom indulged in strong likings or strong hatreds. All was policy—a policy akin to that of a grand privy chief, determined to raise up those whom, for any reason of state, it was prudent to favor, and to put down those whom, for any reason of state, it was expedient to humble or to crush.

Ever since the controversy with Dr. Lloyd this lady had interested me with her ingenuous countenance. And nothing could be more adroit than the manner in which, while imposing me on others as a secular authority, she sought to subject to her will the oracle itself.

She was in the habit of addressing me in a sort of motherly way, as if she had the deepest interest in my welfare, happiness, and reputation. And thus, in every compliment, in every seeming mark of respect, she maintained the superior dignity of one who takes from responsible station the duty to encourage rising merit: as that, somehow or other, despite all that pride which made me believe that I needed no helping hand to advance or to clear my way through the world, I could not shake off from my mind the impression that I was mysteriously patronized by Mrs. Colonel Poyntz.

We might be met together five minutes, side by side—in silence as complete as if in the cave of Trophonius—when, without looking up from her work, Mrs. Poyntz said abruptly,

"I am thinking about you, Dr. Fenwick. And you—are thinking about some other woman. Ungrateful man!"

"Unjust accusation! My very silence should prove how intently my thoughts were fixed on you, and on the subject which springs under your hand in meshes that bewilder the gaze and snare the conscience."

Mrs. Poyntz looked up at me for a moment,—one rapid glance of the bright red hazel eye—and said,

"Was I really in your thoughts? Answer truly."

"Truly, I answer, you were."

"That is strange! Who can it be?"

"Who can it be! What do you mean?"

"If you were thinking of me, it was in connection with some other person—some other person of my own sex. It is certainly not poor dear Miss Brabazon. Who else can it be?"

Again the red eye shot over me, and I felt my cheek redden beneath it.

"Rush!" she said, lowering her voice; "you are in love!"

"In love!—I! Permit me to ask you why you think so?"

"The signs are unmistakable; you are altered in your manner, even in the expression of your face, since we left you; your manner is generally quiet and observant, it is now restless and distracted; your expression of face is generally proud and cold, it is now humbled and mortified. You have something on your mind! It is not anxiety for your reputation, that is established; you have not fortune, that is made; it is not anxiety for a patient, or you would scarcely be here. But anxiety it is, an anxiety that is remote from your profession, that touches your heart and is new to it!"

I was startled, almost awed. But I tried to cover my confusion with a forced laugh.

"Profound observer! Subtle analyst! You have convinced me that I must be in love, though I did not suspect it before. But when I strive to conjecture the object, I am as much perplexed as yourself; and with you, I ask, who can it be?"

"Whoever it be," said Mrs. Poyntz, who had paused, while I spoke, from her knitting, and now resumed it very slowly and very carefully, as if her mind and her knitting worked in unison together, "whoever it be, love in you should be serious; and, with or without love, marriage is a serious thing to us all. It is not every pretty girl that would suit Allen Fenwick."

"Ah! is there any pretty girl whom Allen Fenwick would suit?"

"Tut! You should be above the fretful vanity that lays traps for a compliment. Yes; the time has come in your life and your career when you would do well to marry. I give my consent to that," she added, with a smile as if in jest, and a slight nod as if in earnest. The knitting here went on more decidedly, more quickly.

"But I do not yet see the person. No! 'Tis a pity, Allen Fenwick! (whenever Mrs. Poyntz called me by my Christian name, she always assumed her majestic motherly manner), "a pity that, with your birth, energies, perseverance, talents, and, let me add, your advantages of manner and person—a pity that you did not choose a career that might achieve higher fortunes and louder fame than the most brilliant success can give to a provincial physician. But in that very choice you interest me. My choice has been much the same. A small circle, but the first in it. Yet, had I been a man, or had my dear colonel been a man whose sway in the power of woman's art to raise one step higher in that metaphorical ladder which is not the ladder of the tongue, I should have been his counselor! I am contented. I transfer my ambition to Jane. Do you not think her handsome?"

"There can be no doubt of that," said I, carelessly and naturally.

"I have settled Jane's lot in my own mind," resumed Mrs. Poyntz, knitting into another row of the knitting. "She will marry a country gentleman of large estate. He will go into Parliament. She will study his constituents and study Poyntz's comfort. If he be clever, she will help to make him a minister; if he be not clever, his wealth will make him a nonentity, and lift him into a personage's husband. And, now that you see I have no matrimonial designs on you, Allen Fenwick, you may be more ready to confide in me. Possibly I may be useful—"

"I know not how to thank you. But, as yet, I have nothing to confide."

While thus saying, I turned my eyes toward the open window, beside which I sat. It was a beautiful soft night. The May moon in all her splendor. The town stretched, far and wide, below with all its numberless lights; below—but somewhat nearer—the river, on whose wave was covered, here, by the broad quadrangle (in the midst of which stood, massive and lonely, the grand old church), there, by the dark spiders and scattered cottages or mansions that clothed the sides of the hill.

"Is not this house," I said, after a short pause, "yonder, with the three gables, the one in which—which poor Dr. Lloyd lived—Abbots House?"

I spoke abruptly, as if to intimate my desire to change the subject of conversation. My host, as stopped the work, glanced at me keenly for a moment.

"Yes. But what a lovely night! How is it that the moon blends into harmony things of which the sun only shows the contrasts? That stately old church tower, gray with its thousand years—those vulgar tile-roofs and chimney-pots now in the moonlight, all seem to unite under the moonlight, all melt into one indivisible charm!"

As my hostess thus spoke she had left her seat, taking her work with her, and passed from the window into the balcony. It was not often that Mrs. Poyntz condescended to notice what is called "sentiment" into the range of her sharp practical, worldly talk, but she did so at times; always, when she did, giving me the idea of an intellect much too comprehensive not to allow that sentiment has a place in this life, but keeping it in its place with the true mixture of affability and indifference with which some high born beauty allows the genius but checks the presumption of a charming but plebeian poet. For a few minutes her eyes roved over the scene in evident enjoyment; then, as they slowly settled upon the three gables of Abbots House, her face regained that something of hardness which belonged to its decided character; her fingers again mechanically resumed their knitting, and she said, in her clear, unsoftened, metallic chime of voice, "Can you guess why I took so much trouble to oblige Mr. Vigors and locate Mrs. Ashleigh yonder?"

"You favored us with a full explanation of your reasons."

"Some of my reasons; not the main one. People who undertake the task of governing others, as I do in their rule a kingdom or a hamlet, must adopt a principle of government and adhere to it. The principle that suits best with the Hill is respect for the privacy of our prim, most old maids would have deserted Ten and Mrs. Poyntz for Champagne and her indyslyff. The Hill was never to become a gossip's den. Rather than Lady Sarah Bellasis should have had that freedom, I would have taken it myself and stocked it with owls.

"Mrs. Ashleigh turned up just in the critical moments. But, above all, the Hill, the Proprieties safe, and so that question is settled."

"And it will be pleasant to have your early friend so near you."

Mrs. Poyntz lifted her eyes full upon me.

"Do you know Mrs. Ashleigh?"

"Not the least."

"She has many virtues and few ideas. She is commonplace weak, as I am commonplace strong. But commonplace weak can be very lovable. Her husband, a man of genius and learning, gave her his whole heart—a heart worth having; but he was not ambitious, and he despised the world."

"I think you said your daughter was very much attached to Miss Ashleigh? Does her character resemble her mother's?"

I was afraid while I spoke that I should again meet Mrs. Poyntz's searching gaze, but she did not this time look up from her work.

"No: Lilian is any thing but commonplace."

"You described her as having delicate health; you implied a hope that she was not consumptive. I trust that there is no serious reason for apprehending a constitutional tendency which at her age would require the most careful watching!"

"I trust not. If she were to die— Dr. Fenwick, what is the phrase?"

So terrible had been the picture which this woman's words had brought before me, that I started as if the fatal blow had received a shock.

"I beg pardon," I said, faltering, pressing my hand to my heart; "a sudden spasm here which is over now. You were saying that—that—"

"I was about to say—" and here Mrs. Poyntz laid her hand lightly on mine, "I was about to say, that if Lilian Ashleigh were to die, I should mourn for her less than I might for one dearer to me, but not on the earth more. But I believe there is no cause for the alarm my words so inconsiderately excited in you. Her mother is watching over her child; and if the beautiful Lilian, she would call in medical advice. Mr. Vigors would, I know, recommend Dr. Jones."

Closing our conference with those stinging words, Mrs. Poyntz here turned back into the drawing-room.

I remained some minutes on the balcony, disconcerted, enraged. With what consummate skill had this accomplished diplomatist wound herself into my secret. That she had read my heart better than myself was evident from that Parthian shaft about Dr. Jones, which she had shot over her shoulder in retreat. That from the first moment in which she had decoyed me to Abbots House she had suspected "the something" on my mind, was perhaps but the ordinary quickness of female penetration. But it was with no ordinary skill that her whole conversation afterward had been so shaped as to learn the something, and lead me to reveal the some thing by whom the something was linked. For what purpose? What was it to her? What motive could she have beyond the mere gratification of curiosity? Perhaps, at first, the thought I had been caught by her daughter's showy beauty, and hence the half-friendly, half-cynical frankness with which she avowed her ambitious projects for that young lady's matrimonial advancement. Satisfied by my manner that I cherished no presumptuous hopes in that quarter, her scrutiny was doubtless continued from that pleasure in the exercise of a wily intellect which justifies the term dilettante to an activity for which, without that pleasure itself, there would seem no adequate inducement; and besides, the curiosity of this petty sovereign was power. And if knowledge be power, there is no better instrument of power over a contumacious subject than a key to all the heart which is gained in the knowledge of its secret.

But "secret!" Had it really come to this? Was it possible that, in the sight of a human face, never beheld before, could disturb the whole tenor of my life—a stranger of whose mind and character I knew nothing whose very voice I had never heard? It was only by the intolerable pang of anguish that had rent my heart in the words, calmly, abruptly spoken, "if she were to die," that I had felt how the world would be changed to me, if indeed that face were seen ill to smile no more. Yes, about it was longer to myself—I loved! Not like all on whom love descends, sometimes softly, slowly, with the gradual wing of the cradle settling down on its nest, sometimes with the swoop of the eagle on his unsuspecting quarry, I believed that none ever before loved as I loved; that such love was an abnormal wonder, made solely for me, and I for it. Then my mind insensibly hushed its angrier and more selfish thoughts, as my gaze rested upon the roof-tops of Lilian's home, and the shimmering silver of the moonlit willow, under which I had seen her gazing into the roseate heavens.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHEN I returned to the drawing-room the party was evidently about to break up. Those who had partaken of the cold collation were now assembled round the refreshment table. The cardplayers had risen, and were settling or discussing gains and losses. I was searching for my hat, which I had somewhere mislaid, a poor old gentleman, tormented by tic douloreux, crept timidly up to me and asked the income and of all the hidalgos settled on the Hill. He could not afford a fee for a physician's advice, but pain had turned his pride, and I saw at a glance that he was considering how to take a surreptitious advantage of social intercourse, and obtain the advice without paying the fee. The old man discovered the hat before I did, stooped, took it up, extended it to me with the profound bow of the old school, while the other hand, clenched and quivering, was pressed into the hollow of his cheek, and his eyes met mine with a fearful appeal as I noted that the contract of profession seized me at once. I could never behold suffering without forgetting all else in the desire to relieve it.

"You are in pain," said I, softly. "Sit down and describe the symptoms. Here, sit in this arm-chair, near the window, but I am a friend who is fond of doctoring, and knows something about it."

So we sat down a little apart from the other guests, and, after a few questions and answers, I was pleased to find that his "tic" did not belong to the less curable kind of that agonizing neuralgia. I was especially successful in my treatment of similar sufferings for which I had discovered an anodyne that was almost specific. I wrote on a leaf of my pocket-book a prescription which I felt sure would be efficacious, and as I tore it out and placed it in his hand, I chanced to look up, and saw the hazel eyes of my hostess fixed upon me with a kinder and softer expression than they often condescended to admit into their cold and penetrating lustre. At that moment, however, her attention was drawn from me to a servant, who entered with a note, and I heard him say, though in an undertone, "From Mrs. Ashleigh."

She opened the note, read it hastily, ordered the servant to wait without the door, retired to her writing-table, which stood near the place at which I still lingered, rested her face on her hand, and seemed musing. Her meditation was very soon over. She turned her head, and, to my surprise, beckoned to me. I approached.

"Sit here," she whispered, as I drew back toward those people, who are no doubt watching us. Read this."

She placed in my hand the note she had just received. It contained but a few words to this effect:

"DEAR MARGARET,—I am so distressed. Since I wrote to you, a few hours ago, Lilian is taken suddenly ill, and I fear seriously. What medical man should I send for? Let my servant have his name and address. E. A."

I sprang from my seat.

"Stay," said Mrs. Poyntz. "Would you much care if I sent the servant to Dr. Jones?"

"Ah, Madam, you are cruel! What have I done that you should become accomplice with—"

"Enemy! No. You have just befriended one of my friends. In this world of ours, intelligent should ally itself with intelligence. I am not your enemy! But you have not yet asked me to be your friend."

Here she gave me my hands a note she had written while thus speaking. "Receive your credentials. If there be any cause for alarm, or if I can be of any good for the lessening the work she had suspended, but with lingering, uncertain flutters, she added, "So far, then, this is settled. Now, no thanks; it is but little than is settled as yet."

GENERAL LYON AT THE BATTLE OF SPRINGFIELD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE BATTLE AT SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.

WE illustrate on page 545 THE DEATH OF GENERAL LYON AT THE BATTLE OF SPRINGFIELD, and on page 549 the REBEL PRISONERS HAULING OFF GENERAL SIEGEL'S GUNS, after the horses had been killed. The following account of the battle is furnished by an eye-witness, who left Springfield on Sunday morning and came through to Rolla on horseback:

Our army marched out of Springfield on Friday evening only 5200 strong, the Home Guard remaining at that place. Our forces slept on the prairie a portion of the night, and about sunrise on Saturday morning drew in the outposts of the enemy, and the battle of the attack became general.

The attack was made in two columns by Generals Lyon and Sturgis, General Siegel leading a flanking force of about one thousand men and four guns on the south of the enemy's encampment.

The fight raged from sunrise until one or two o'clock in the afternoon, when, finding it overwhelming from overpowering numbers, Captain Totten's battery three distinct times, but were repulsed with great slaughter.

General Lyon fell early in the day. He had been previously wounded in the leg, and had a horse shot under him.

The Colonel of one of the Kansas regiments having become disabled, the boys cried out, "General, you come some disabled. He did so, and at once gave command and took charge of the regiment.

Although the enemy seemed determined to be in great order, retreating and seeking fire to their train of baggage wagons, our forces were too much fatigued and out of purpose, so the battle may be considered a drawn one.

The Herald correspondent thus tells the sad tale of poor Lyon's death:

For two or three days before the battle General Lyon changed quarters in appearance. Since it became necessary to him that he must abandon the Southwest or have his army cut to pieces, he had had much of his former energy and decision. To one of his staff he remarked, the evening before the battle, "I am a man relieving in presentiments, and ever since the night surprise was planned I have had a feeling I should not get rid of that till would die disastrously. Though the retreat of Government property to the southward he was obliged to abandon he could not leave it without engaging the enemy the public will call me a coward. If I engage him, I may be defeated, and I command not to please. I am too weak to hold Springfield, and yet the people will demand that I retain it. I shall do it with the very enemy I can not keep a town against. How can this result otherwise than against us?"

On the way to the battle-field I frequently rode near him. He seemed like one bewildered, and when riding would almost fall to sleep on his saddle, and seemed totally unaware that he was spoken to. On the battle-field he gave his orders generally, and seemed solicitous for the welfare of his men, but utterly regardless of his own safety. After all he was reduced by exhaustion to the last hour, and when his favorite horse was shot from under him, some of his aids were importuned by Siegel that he would retire from the spot and seek one less exposed. Scarcely raising his eyes from the enemy, he said:

"It is well enough that I stand here. I am satisfied." While the fight was forming for the charge against the rebels in which he lost his life, General Lyon turned to Major Sturgis, and said to him, but a few words:

"I fear that the day is lost; if Colonel Siegel had been successful he would have joined me before this. I think I will lead this charge."

He had not proceeded in the leg in an early part of the engagement—a flesh wound merely—from which the blood in rivet profusely. Major Sturgis during the conversation noticed blood on General Lyon's hat, and at first supposed he had been struck in the head by his hand, which was with blood from his leg. A moment after, perceiving that it was fresh, he reported the General's hat and asked the cause of its appearance. "It is nothing, Major; nothing but a wound in the head," said General Lyon, turning away and mounting his horse. Without taking the hat he had on in his hand Major Sturgis, he addressed the Iowans he was to command with—

"Forward men! I will lead you!"

Two minutes afterward he lay dead on the field, killed by a rifle-ball through the breast, just above the heart. In death his features were the same troubled and puzzled expression that had been noted upon them for days past. wick. His body was brought to town in the afternoon, and will be forwarded to his friends in Connecticut for interment.

LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

THE presentment by the Grat Jury of the United States Circuit Court of certain New York publishers, leaders and abettors of treason, the suppression of treasonable papers in Missouri, and the forcible demolition of the offices of similar papers published in Western Virginia, naturally suggest discussion on the subject of liberty of speech. The journals assailed or suppressed claim that to interfere with them is to violate liberty of speech—a principle emphatically secured to the American people by the Constitution. It is well worth while to test this claim.

Liberty of speech, like every other kind of liberty, is not absolute, but conditional. It is subject to the condition that individuals shall not be libeled, and that the public morals or welfare shall not be directly and flagrantly assailed. The assault must be clear, and the injury obvious and gross. A journal may censure the policy of the Government with almost any severity of language, or assail the opinions of a majority of the people with any degree of virulence, and yet be entitled to protection against assault. But it can no pretend that liberty of the press justifies the publication of statements or opinions which are openly and obviously destructive of the morals, or the welfare, or the safety of the people. For the liberty of the press, like all other kinds of liberty, is limited by the essential restriction that its exercise shall not be injurious to others.

The question, therefore, involved in the case of the journals to which we have alluded is simply—did they confine themselves within the limits of a fair opposition to the measures of Government and to the opinions of the majority of the people, or was their course direct and obviously destructive of the welfare or safety of the nation? If the latter alternative be true, then it would clearly seem that they were nuisances which not only required abatement at the hands of the officers of the law, but which might be abated by any citizen or party of citizens without legal authority of any kind.

We presume that it will not be denied that these journals were hostile to the Government, and friendly to the rebels who are in arms endeavoring to destroy it; that they advocated measures which would paralyze our armies; that they did their best to damp the military spirit of the people and to injure the credit of the Government; that they excused the treason of the traitors, and blamed each successive step taken by loyal people; that the general tendency of their articles upon the mind of persons not otherwise informed must have been to create a feeling of disloyalty and opposition to the national policy at the present crisis. That some of the editors were sincere in the expression of these views is very possible. But that the views themselves were pernicious, mischievous, and calculated to injure public liberty at a time of extreme peril, there can be no doubt.

This, however, is not the worst. The chief harm which these journals have done has been in deceiving the South with regard to Northern sentiment. No rebellion would ever have taken place had not Northern journals deluded the South into the belief that, in the hour of battle, a large party at the North would stand by them. Even now the South is encouraged to persevere in its war by the hope that within a few more weeks' fighting will compel the North to yield. This notion rests entirely upon false statements contained in Northern rebel journals. The New York Daily Richmond and Memphis papers teem with articles from these sheets which are calculated to induce ignorant readers to believe that a peace party is about to spring up in the North. The Southern people and the people are tired of the war, that Mr. Lincoln has neither men nor money, and that in a few weeks the independence of the Southern Confederacy will be acknowledged at Washington. Of course the rebel leaders know better than this, but their followers do not, and hence they persevere in their struggle. Thus the press may encourage the mischief thus done. Union men in Kentucky declare that two of these journals, both published in New York, are more valuable than Magoffin, Breckinridge, and all the other native traitors. And this can easily be understood. When a wavering Southerner reads in a New York paper a statement that peace—that Mr. Lincoln is about to give way, and the North to surrender, the temptation to join what seems the winning side must be almost irresistible.

If a newspaper can inflict upon the public and the nation a greater injury than this, it can not readily be conceived. The most armored of audacious publications are far less mischievous. The deserter who conveys information to the enemy, and is hung or shot without scruple if he is caught in the act, is a benefactor to the publisher of a paper which by false statements deludes a whole people into persevering in a fatal war.

Whether it can be said that such a paper is so obviously and directly destructive of the public welfare or safety as to be a common nuisance requiring abatement, the public and the Courts of Justice must decide.

BRITISH OPINION OF THE WAR.

DISAPPOINTMENT has been felt in this country at the universal complacency with which our troubles are regarded in England. Many persons had expected that Englishmen, whose anti-slavery teachings had largely aided the spread of abolitionism here, would feel in their principles when slavery made war upon the United States. The event has not justified these expectations. And in the light of experience they must be pronounced unreasonable.

For they ignore the essential characteristic of the British temper—which is blind selfishness. All nations are to a measure selfish; that is to say, they prefer their own interest to that of others. But no nation but Great Britain is so wholly wrapped in considerations of narrow self-interest as to be entirely indifferent to the well-being of every foreign people. No nation but the English systematically rejoice over the misfortunes of their neighbors, from the mean idea that they are rivals, and that their losses are England's gain. No people but Englishmen carry selfishness to such an extent as to be incapable of feeling pleasure at any one's prosperity but their own, or of feeling sorrow at any misfortunes which do not strike directly at their pocket-nerve.

The uniform, consistent policy of the British nation has been ever based on hostility to every other nation in the world. Englishmen seem to have aimed at being Ishmaels and pariahs—and to have succeeded. At home and abroad, they hate every body, and are hated in return. No spark of generosity, or sympathy, or kindly interest in other people's welfare ever illumines British foreign policy, or the foreign articles of the leading British journals. Other nations can feel for foreigners: Frenchmen helped to free Italy; Russians are cordial to Germany. Spaniards, Portuguese, Turks, Swedes, Asiatics—all evince occasional sympathy for nations beyond their own border. Englishmen never for an instant waver in their enmity to all foreigners.

Nothing but the most exemplary forbearance on the part of the rulers of France has prevented the French resenting the uniform hostility which England has shown to every French Government from the Restoration to the present empire, and to every great measure of French policy. Spain, absorbed in the task of national regeneration, has not shown as every step in her path by the captious and aimless cavils of England. Italy, after being goaded to war by British taunts, conquered her independence in the teeth of the most virulent British opposition. The leading organ of German opinion gives fair expression to German sentiment when it calls the English the nuisances of the 19th century. Hatred is a feeble term to describe the feelings with which Englishmen are regarded in Russia and the Scandinavian kingdoms. And throughout Asia and South America, where England has played the bully, the oppressor, and the robber for a couple of centuries, every foreigner is welcome but an Englishman. Could he fairly expect to escape the ill-will of every body's foe?

Englishmen possess great qualities: energy, perseverance, courage, business capacity, and honesty. No one will deny them these. Yet wherever they go, despite the undoubted benefit these qualities confer upon the place of their residence, they contrive to win the dislike of the people with whom they live. Out of England, there is not a town in the world where Englishmen are not avoided by the educated classes, and hated by the mass of the people. They would be inconsistent and unnatural if they failed to improve the present crisis by concilinating the dislike and courting the antipathy of Americans.

THE LOUNGER.

CONSEQUENCES.

WHEN the Government was forced to take up arms, it did so to defend its own integrity, not to destroy slavery. Of course a great many thoughtful persons then, as they do now, thought more now, that one of the results of the war must be slavery upon the country will be emancipation. But other results of slave property as the dominant political interest in the Government will be overthrown, and we may have slavery without slaves. That is what precise way that result will be reached no man can say.

It is equally clear that as the rebels still persist, and the war continues and is removed to the Gulf States, there will be danger of slave-insurrections. They are always the dangerous contingency of wars in parts where slaves abound. No sane man desires them; but every fool can see the danger. Who is responsible for them if they occur? Is it the wise leader of the war, by forcibly withstanding and outraging the Government, or the Government, which, even in war was benevolent? Can he add that his impression does not justify what he fears.

No; that wretched delusion has gone forever. We have always been told how contented and happy they are. But have we forgotten how Virginia quivered and reeled with terror before the pike of one gray old man asking the slaves to come to him? Have we forgotten what John Randolph said years ago, of the fatal demand that negroes sounded at night but every mother clasped her child in vague horror to her breast, lest it might mean insurrection? Have we forgotten all the laws of all the slave States? Have we forgotten the patrol, the restless supervision, not against police offenses, but against violence and universal fear? Have we forgotten the awful fate that has overtaken any one who was suspected of telling negroes they were free? Is there was even a greater happiness than their condition? Have we forgotten that the word freedom has been the most dangerous word in the South for a generation? Have we forgotten history and human nature?

No, no: that horrible, hackneyed humbug about the contentment of slaves is forever dissipated. Individual affection of course there is. Toussaint l'Ouverture, the chief of the Saint Domingo revolt, so loved his master and his family that he saved their lives. On the other hand, the slaves upon the plantation of M. Gallifet had been so kindly treated that their happiness was proverbial. But the sanguinary scene of the insurrection upon that plantation is not less so. So much for happy slaves contented slaves!" Hitherto exclaim a mulatto author describing the revolt.

Why should we thrust our heads into the sand? The Government of the United States neither desires nor incites slave insurrections. But it is engaged in war with an enemy who inhabits a region overflowing with slaves. Is the Government to surrender lest they should rise? Is it necessary to repeat, then, what all candid men know, that the party which brought this Administration into power have always held, in common with all the loyal States of the land, that every political difference in this country, however vital to the interest of any part of it, is soluble under the Constitution. The secessionists think differently. They mean, if they can, to settle the question over the Constitution. They live among slaves, and have taken up arms. The rebellion of the slaves is the natural consequence. If they do rebel, how long is the insurrection of the masters likely to last?

BOURBON POLITICS.

THE Breckinridge State Committee is of the opinion of the Newark Evening Journal, that "our citizens are fighting for their liberties." The liberty, namely, of brooking up the Government of the United States. The same Committee has also expelled a member upon the express ground that he is loyal to the Government of his country.

Fortunately the people of the State of New York are not the property of Mr. Gideon Tucker's Committee, nor yet of Mr. Dean Richmond's Committee. They are probably of the opinion, and will make the fact appear in November, that the fate of the event of the people of the United States, when it is maintaining its constitutional authority by the hands and hearts and money of all loyal citizens, is properly "carving" rebels to obey the laws. The people of this State will probably "carve" next November, in reply to Mr. Tucker, and Mr. Cagger, and Mr. Richmond, and Mr. Ben. Wood, and Mr. Jeff Davis, and Mr. Breckinridge, and Mr. Floyd, and Mr. Claiborne F. Jackson, not forgetting Mr. Vallandigham, something substantially like this:

Resolved, The Right Reverend Major-General Leonidas Polk to the contrary notwithstanding, that the existence of an unquestionably legal allegiance of every citizen of the United States is to the National Government, and not to the Government of the State for which he may be born or chances to reside; and that the doctrine of secession, or the right of any citizen, or any number of citizens, forcibly to resist the National Government, or to seize the national property, under the plea of State sovereignty—a doctrine which is maintained with arms by Mr. Jefferson Davis, and Mr. Toombs, and General Toutant de Beauregard; and is equally maintained, with excuses and sympathy and deprecations, and with a meaner shrug, by Mr. Breckinridge, and Mr. Ben Wood, and Mr. Tucker, and Mr. Cagger, and Mr. Richmond, and Mr. Vallandigham, and Mr. Seymour—is a treasonable avive of all civil order; having no foundation or justification in the Constitution, and utterly at variance with the letter of the oath of the officers of the nation, and with the dictates of common sense.

When the people of the Empire State thunder that out hundreds of thousands strong, the worthy gentlemen who think the only way to deal with the traitors is to coax them back to duty will be pleased to take, will have no other consolation left than what may be gathered from the judicious observation in Mr. Dick Swiveller's letter to Miss Sally Brass: "It is of little importance what men or what party occupy public positions, if of honor and enlightment, but of the utmost moment that citizens of common principles should unite at this time in support of the Government and in vindication of the Constitution and Union.

There is but one principle common to loyal citizens at this time, and that is that the Government must be supported by waging it to citizens to arms. "If you will only tell us what you want, you shall have it."

PATRIOTS.

PAUL DILLINGHAM, of Waterbury, in Vermont, was recently nominated by a Democratic State Convention for Governor, and James T. Thurston and Stephen Thomas for Lieutenant Governor and Treasurer of Vermont. They have all declined the nomination, upon the sole ground that at this time there are but two parties, one for maintaining the Government unconditionally, and the other for overthrowing it.

"We must for the time," says Mr. Dillingham, "forget whether we be Republicans or Democrats. In such a union there will be strength and efficiency, and if either hereafter, let it be to settle the question who did most for his country. Let us act together, act honestly, efficiently, and let him wear honors who fairly wins them. I feel very confident that a great number—I hope a majority—of all the old parties in this State feel and judge as I do, and that they will rise above party to unite and stand for their country, one and indivisible, now and forever. With such I mean to act, whether their number be few or many, till the most wicked rebellion is crushed out; and wishing that my opinions and acts may be in harmony, I have this call upon to decline the nomination so honorably tendered to me."

Like other gentlemen say: "In reply we have to say that we are of the opinion that, until the present rebellion and treason shall be overcome, it is the duty of every true and loyal citizen to sustain the spirit and strengthen the hands of the country by every means in his power; that party names and differences should be entirely laid aside, and can be permitted to divide loyal citizens or deter any man from yielding a full and enthusiastic support to the men and measures upon which we must rely for the victory of the Government and the Constitution over Disunion."

To these sentiments every loyal heart in the land, Democratic, Republican, or whatever, will cry amen. This is the Democracy of the Green Mountains, and it is pure patriotism. How does it compare with the "democracy" of Mr. Dean Richmond's letter and the Breckinridge Committee's resolutions?

THE POINT OF THE CASE.

THERE is no question whatsoever of the unanimous desire and of the sufficient pecuniary and military resources of the loyal citizens of the country to suppress the rebellion. The only question of the moment is, whether the Administration is so deeply persuaded and so ably officered that it will respond to this unanimous popular energy and resource. If it does not, the cause is lost. The moment that the willing people see that the feeling, the money, the men, the general sacrifice they offer is feebly grasped and feebly managed, that moment they will insist upon giving up the war, whatever the consequences.

It is of no importance how you describe this war; you may call it suppressing an insurrection, or punishing rebels, or maintaining the Government, or defending the Constitution; the fact remains the same all the while, that we are at war with a domestic enemy intrenched upon our soil and dangerously fortified by a thousand advantages that no foreign foe could ever possess. Consequently it is not war only, but war of the most desperate kind. It has been actually waged by the enemy for nine months. It has been nominally recognized by the Government for four. There is no one would be so hardy as to declare that the Administration had at any time so profoundly comprehended the occasion as the great man of the people.

The open freedom of intercourse across our lines —the reluctance to accept recipients—the free publication of details of movements—the crowd of notorious traitors who held office in the Departments and elsewhere—the inexplicable imbecility of the blockade—the universal complaint of the troops—the abominable Lobbying—the public service of Alianza's Lopez—all the recalcitrant exertion these are all wrongs that ought to have been righted long and long ago. Many of them, indeed, are supposed to be the fruits of coercion. But surely a Government never before moved so slowly sad sadly in defense of its own existence. The one great effort seemed to be an unwillingness to believe that there was a war, and to remember that effective war can be made in one way only. The sole remedy for the delays and just complaints is to make it in that way.

And to that end the Departments must be in the hands of men who not only as honest men and warm partisans, but as executive officers of the most untiring and comprehensive energy and practical skill. The place in the right place is an army. Now it is a simple fact that there is a universal public conviction that two or three important members of the present Cabinet are not among The practical question therefore is, whether, with the present composition of the Cabinet, it is long possible to maintain that unity and order of public sentiment without which success is impossible?

EXCHANGING PRISONERS.

WHAT shall be done with the citizens of the United States who, in arms against the Government? This question does not concern pirates upon privateers. If the gallows is not permanently visible from time to time the whole sea, the whole world will presently furnish pirates as candidates for our clemency. If the Jeff Davis or the Sumter should be taken, there could be very little difference of opinion as to the proper fate of the crews upon conviction. If there were, it would show a state of the public mind which forebodes the surrender of the Government to the rebels.

But is the exchange of rebels taken in battle a recognition of the independence of the rebellious section of the country? The question may be answered by another. Is the ransom of a friend from robbery a recognition of the right of robbery?

Theoretically the Government of the United States is suppressing an insurrection: actually it is engaged in a war. Theoretically it is dispersing an armed mob: actually it is fighting an organized enemy. The Government must, therefore, suppress the insurrection according to the rule of war. To read the riot act is not enough. The affair has passed from the hands of the Sheriff into those of the Major-General. The Government must deal with the facts, and it does so when it receives a flag of truce. Police officers surrounding a house do not receive any flag of truce. They say, "Surrender at once, whatever the circumstances; whether you are aware of our manner in the house or not: surrender at once, or we shoot." That is the way with the police. That is the way in putting down a street riot. The authorities do not treat with the ringleaders. They summon, and if no dispersion follows, they shoot.

The English Government had the Colonies to be in rebellion and the Continental soldiers rebels, but they did not hang all the prisoners they took. They exchanged them, or they did not exchange them any the less rebels. They did it upon the principle that a human man buys a slave in order to free him. He does not think any better of slavery or the slave-trader because he deals with him as he would with an honest man for lawful merchandise: nor does he in the least remit his exertions against slavery.

There is a solution suggested by the Toronto Globe. It is, that all rebel prisoners shall be held until the close of the war. But that is a question of feasibility. Such action must depend upon numbers. For the present, certainly, they should be held. For the present and until the war threatens to be more permanent than it now promises to be, it would be better not to exchange. But the policy of exchanging is merely a matter of convenience. It involves no principle.

CHAFING.

WHY is the opportunity of making capital for treason afforded in the case of the habeas corpus of the Baltimore prisoners at Fort Diamond? The case may be settled before the question gets into print, but it is useful to ask it for future cases.

The Constitution of the United States says distinctly: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

This being gravely the case, why is it not made manifest to Judge Garrison that what Judge Taney could not do in Baltimore, Judge Garrison can not do in New York? If the Government has not suspended the writ, it has not been produced. If it has, the Judge who forcibly resists the Government and foments trouble should be himself dealt with as an offender.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE following mortification from South Carolina reached us by way of California, and for the present our postal communication with that State will be by the same, or some equally convenient route. "The session of 1860, in South Carolina had been a long one, passing away without any thing to distinguish it from the predecessors, except, perhaps, a scarcity of material for the dissecting room. To remedy the deficiency several prominent spirits of the college put themselves on the alert in the vicinage of the various negro quarters. They were always with poor success, as interments were few, and those too well guarded to allow of examination. Fortune smiled at last; and one dark night the writer, with several others, succeeded in exhuming the body of an individual who had died of delirium tremens. Being the corpse of a stranger and a drunkard it was accordingly considered a valuable acquisition, and to refill the grave. At this moment a signal from one of our watchers notified us that patrols were approaching, and operations were suspended, all observing the strictest silence and lying motionless on the ground waiting for the signal to begin again. At this moment, one of the party stretched out his hand, as he thought, with poor mesmerists

NEWPORT BARRACKS, KENTUCKY.

WE publish on this page an engraving of NEWPORT BARRACKS, KENTUCKY, the Head-quarters of General (late Major) Robert Anderson, U.S.A., and the rendezvous of part of the Kentucky Union troops. In these barracks Colonel Tyler, whose recent arrest in Cincinnati has been mentioned, has been confined as a prisoner of war. As the war progresses, these barracks will doubtless become a military site of considerable importance.

THE FOURTEENTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT.

THIS new and splendid regiment arrived at Washington last week, in the midst of a storm. We illustrate the scene on page 549. The Herald correspondent described it as follows:

The city was favored late this afternoon with a tremendous rain storm, which afforded great relief to all who had been suffering from the heat during the hottest day experienced here for eighteen years. In the midst of the storm, when the rain was pouring down in torrents, the Fourteenth Massachusetts Regiment, Colonel Devens, marched up the Avenue, en route for their camping-ground. They had been quartered since last night at the Government Military Reception House, at the depôt, but were required to move to make room for new arrivals. Their splendid horses and wagons had preceded them, and the men marched steadily through the driving storm, sometimes for squares through water two feet deep. Their songs, cheers, and shouts mingled with the roll of the thunder, and the vivid flashes of lightning gleamed along their line of muskets and revealed their forms in the gloom of night. It was a spirit-stirring scene. The steadiness of the regiment under the circumstances shows both good discipline and good grit in the material of which it is composed. Their songs, which the whole regiment seemed to participate in, heard above the loud thunder and terrific rush of waters, startled the people from their houses, who, as soon as they learned the cause of the demonstration, inspired by the patriotism of the gallant Massachusetts boys, rushed into the street and greeted the troops with loud cheers.

THE BURNING OF HAMPTON.

WE illustrate on page 550 the BURNING OF HAMPTON by the rebels under General Magruder. The correspondent of the Associated Press thus describes the scene:

A few minutes past midnight General Magruder, with about five hundred rebels, some of them belonging in Hampton, entered the town and immediately fired the buildings with torches. The greater part of the five hundred houses were built of wood, and as rain having fallen lately, the strong south wind soon produced a terrible conflagration. There were perhaps twenty white people and double that number of negroes remaining in the town from inability to move, some of whose houses were fired without waking the inmates. They gave Wilson Jones and his wife, both of them aged and infirm, but fifteen minutes to remove a few articles of furniture to the garden. Several of the whites and also of the negroes were hurried away to be pressed into the rebel service. Mr. Scofield, a merchant, took refuge in a swamp above the town. Two negroes were drowned while attempting to cross the creek. A company of rebels attempted to force the passage of the bridge, but were repulsed with a loss of three killed and six wounded.

The fire raged all night. The greater part of the rebels withdrew toward morning, and at noon to-day, when I visited the place, but seven or eight buildings were left standing.

The glare of the conflagration was so brilliant that I was enabled to write by it. A more sublime and awful spectacle has never yet been witnessed. The high south wind prevailing at the time fanned the flames into a lurid blaze, and lighted up the country for miles and miles around. The fire broke out between eleven and twelve o'clock P.M. on the 7th inst. It appears that a short time previous our pickets from Colonel Max Weber's Twentieth Regiment were fired upon by a company of rebels, but by dropping on their faces our troops did not sustain any loss. They, however, returned the fire with deadly aim from their trusty rifles, which must have made sad havoc among the enemy. We could see the rebels passing from one house to another, by the glare of the light, and use the incendiary's torch with effect. Every building in this once beautiful village is destroyed, with the exception of the Military Academy, and that can not possibly be saved.

Our camp was alarmed instanter, and the troops got under arms. An attack from Fox Hill was momentarily expected, and Colonel Weber's regiment were immediately supplied with extra ammunition, and sent out in all directions as pickets, patrols, and skirmishers. They have done their work bravely and efficiently. Two companies are now here watching for rebels and guarding the bridge from being fired. The bridge will be saved. It is dismantled about a rod from the farther shore, and terminates there in a barricade of boards, behind which a portion of our picket was stationed when fired on by the enemy. Captain Stroupie, of the Twentieth Regiment, has just started across to the barricade with six men in the face of the flames and fire. He is anxiously watched from this side, as it is expected that he will be fired upon. The light is as bright as day, and the figures of men are seen reflected in the water. They have reached the barricade in safety.

The rebels have done their work effectually, nothing is now left to mark the once beautiful Hampton but the charred, towering chimneys, looming up in the distance, as monuments of the dasterdly work of the rebels.

THE PHILADELPHIA NATIONAL GUARD.

ON page 550 we illustrate the REVIEW OF THE PHILADELPHIA NATIONAL GUARD, the crack regiment of the City of Brotherly Love, which took place on their return from the war, on Saturday, 10th August. The Philadelphia Press gave the following account of the review:

On Saturday afternoon, about six o'clock, the review of the National Guards came off at the Custom-house, in Chestnut Street above Fourth. The street was literally packed by the friends of the regiment, who came to witness what may be termed a real battalion parade and review, according to the United States Army regulations. The steps of the Custom-house were filled with the members of the Common Council, together with a large number of ladies. In the absence of Mayor Henry, Mr. Coyler represented the city.

The regiment was formed by Adjutant Brown, after which Colonel Lyle assumed the command, and put the regiment through the manual of arms; the various movements of which were executed in the best manner.

The regiment was then wheeled into column, and passed in review of the Councils, who complimented the soldiers with a marching salute; and when, at the close, the officers were drawn to the front, Mr. Coyler briefly welcomed the regiment home, and complimented the men upon the perfection of their drill. In return, Colonel Lyle assured Mr. Coyler that the regiment was ready to answer the call of the Government.

After the review the regiment marched to the armory, where they partook of a collation.

It is said that some six hundred of the regiment will re-enlist for the war.

THE NEW GUN-BOATS.

WE devote page 551 to illustrations of six out of the twenty-three gun-boats which were directed to be built for Government a few weeks since. A reporter of the Herald who visited the ship-yards shortly before our artist thus speaks of them:

MESSRS. Webb and Bell, at Greenpoint, have on the stocks at their yard one of the new gun-boats of the lot of twenty-three. Already the ribs are up, and the outlines of the vessel are clearly defined. Her length is 156 feet, with 29 feet beam and 12 feet hold. The keel is of white oak, siding thirteen inches and ten inches in depth. The gun-board strakes are six inches in thickness. The frame is of young white oak, free from sap and all imperfections. None of the timber is grain cut. The sailer bull will be diagonally braced with iron straps, three and one half inches in width by one half inch thick. The running bottom plank will be of white oak, three and one half inches in thickness, fastened with three locust treenails and one composition spike to each strake. The decks will be of yellow pine, the beams of white oak. This boat, like all the others, will be schooner rigged, and propelled by a screw. She will be planted for six guns on each side, or a long port on each side, for the pivot gun. The vessel will be launched in September, and early in October she will be ready to go into commission.

Jere. Simonson, at Greenpoint, has another of the gun-boats on the stocks. She is precisely the same size as the one at the yard of Messrs. Webb and Bell, and the work is about at the same stage of forwardness. One peculiarity about this vessel is that she is decorated very extensively with miniature flags. The workmen have placed them on the upper sides of the ribs, and so far as I can see one is added to the number it is crowned with the Stars and Stripes.

E. and H. Pollion are also building one of the twenty-three gun-boats. The work at their yard is progressing rapidly, and they are in hopes to turn out one of the model boats of the fleet.

John Englis, foot of Tenth Street, New York, has another gun-boat on the stocks. She is of the same dimensions as the others, and will be called the Frankenjon.

Jacob Westervelt, of this city, is hurrying forward another of the gun-boats. She will be completed by September. All the contractors are obliged to furnish these vessels complete, with all the boatswain's and engineer's stores, boats, rigging, sails, flags, anchors, chains, and, in fact, every thing pertaining to a war vessel, with the exception of ordnance and ordnance stores.

The engines are being built at various places. The sections we publish are from the specifications of the Novelty Works, New York.

The following is a description of the engines, boilers, etc., now building for the new gun-boats:

Each vessel will be provided with two horizontal back action engines, with the cylinders placed side by side on the same side of the keleon.

The pistons are to make one hundred strokes per minute at the maximum.

The boilers will be two in number, and of Martin's pattern, placed side by side, with a fire-room eight and a half feet wide, from front of the boiler to forward end of the crank shaft. The boilers will be furnished with draft from a blower engine and a Dumpbel blower.

The screw propeller will be fixed, and of the four-bladed pattern.

Each engine will be complete in itself, and capable of operating the propeller shaft independently of the other.

Each boiler will be complete in itself, so that they can furnish steam to both or either of the engines. A working steam pressure of thirty pounds above the atmosphere is required of them.

The screw propeller will be fixed, and have four blades of the diameter of nine feet, diameter of hub fifteen inches, thickness of blade at the hub four and a half inches, tapering to five-eighths at the periphery.

Two of Martin's boilers will be put in each vessel, with one smoke-pipe for both. They will be of the best quality of American charcoal iron, and the best American lap-welded tubes (?—?). They will contain eighty-eight and five-sixths square feet of grate surface, and twenty-seven hundred square feet of heating surface.

The ash-ejector which will be four feet in diameter and thirty-two feet in length. It will be constructed in four iron plates vertically. The lower one of No. 6 wire gauge, the next to be No. 7, the next No. 8, and the upper plate No. 7.

A fresh-water distilling apparatus, capable of making 100 gallons of fresh water per day, will be put in each ship.

The following instruments will be furnished by the contractors: One mercurial vacuum gauge, two indicators, one counter, one clock, one thermometer for hot well, one for injection water, one engine-room thermometer, one fire-room do., one gong, one bell, one glass water gauge; a complete set of engine tools, oil tanks, and cans; duplicate pieces, packing, waste, steel, iron, tallow, oil, paints, soap, and stationery, etc.

In addition to furnishing all these articles, they must furnish to the Navy Department, in one month after the completion of the machinery, tracings on cloth of every drawing used in the construction thereof, embracing both general and working plans in sufficient detail, with dimensions figured on, so that the same may be again constructed, together with a detailed statement of the weight of the machinery and of all its appurtenances.

FREMONT AT ST. LOUIS.

We publish on this page several illustrations of the progress of the war at the West. One of them represents THE DEPARTURE OF GENERAL FREMONT WITH TROOPS FROM ST. LOUIS FOR BIRD'S POINT, MISSOURI. He had with him four regiments of infantry, several detached companies of riflemen, two companies of artillery, and a number of guns. The force left in eight steamers, and was enthusiastically cheered by the people. With this reinforcement, the troops at Bird's Point number 8000, and are able to stand any attack from the rebels. Another shows us GENERAL FREMONT'S HEAD-QUARTERS AT ST. LOUIS, where the gallant General, assisted by his wife, the famous Jessie, spends eighteen hours a day in the work of the campaign. The third represents THE ARSENAL AT ST. LOUIS. Since General Frémont's arrival this place has been the scene o great excitement. Troops are arriving hourly by steamers and railcars, and departing again for Cape Girardeau, Cairo, Bird's Point, and other places in the interior. Ammunition of every kind, cannon of every calibre, and every class of army stores arrive here by each train from the East, and are rapidly distributed to points where they are needed.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER IX.

IN a very few minutes I was once more in the grounds of that old gable house. The servant, who were before me, entered them by the stair and the wicket-gate of the private entrance; that was the shortest. So again I passed by the circling glade and the mosaic-wall—rose trees, and ruins, all suffused in the limpid moonlight.

And now I was in the house; the servant took up stairs the note with which I was charged, and a minute or two afterward returned and conducted me to the corridor above, in which Mrs. Ashleigh received me. I was the first to speak.

"Your child is—is not seriously ill, I hope. What is it?"

"Hush!" she said, under her breath. "Will you step this way for a moment?" She passed through a door-way to the right. I followed her, and as she placed on the table the light she had been holding, I looked round with a still at the heart—it was the room in which Dr. Lloyd had died. Impossible to mistake. The furniture, indeed, was changed—there was no bed in the chamber; but the shape of the room, the position of the high casement, which was now wide open, and through which the moonlight streamed more softly than on that drear winter night, the great square beams intersecting the low ceiling—all were impressed vividly on my memory. The chair to which Mrs. Ashleigh beckoned me was placed just on the spot where I had stood by the bed-head of the dying man.

I shrank back—I could not have seated myself there. So I remained leaning against the chimney-piece, while Mrs. Ashleigh told her story.

She said that on their arrival the day before, Lilian had been in more than usually good health and spirits, delighted with the old house, the grounds, and especially the nook by the Monk's Well, at which Mrs. Ashleigh had left her that evening in order to make some purchases in the town, in company with Mr. Vigors. When Mrs. Ashleigh returned, she and Mr. Vigors had sought Lilian in that nook, and Mrs. Ashleigh then detected, with a mother's eye, some change in Lilian, which alarmed her. She seemed listless and dejected, and was very pale; but she denied that she felt unwell. On regaining the house she had sat down in the room in which we then were—[which," said Mrs. Ashleigh, "as it is not required for a sleeping-room, my daughter, who is fond of reading, wished to fit up as her own morning-room, or study. I left her here and went into the drawing-room below with Mr. Vigors. When he quitted me, which he did very soon, I remained for nearly an hour giving directions about the placing of furniture, which had just arrived from our late residence. I then went up stairs to join my daughter, and to my terror found her apparently lifeless in her chair. She had fainted away."

I interrupted Mrs. Ashleigh here. "Has Miss Ashleigh been subject to fainting fits?"

"No, never. When she recovered she seemed bewildered—disinclined to speak. I got her to bed, and as she then fell quietly to sleep, my mind was relieved. I thought it only a passing effect of excitement, in a change of abode; or caused by something like malaria in the atmosphere of that part of the grounds in which I had found her seated."

"Very likely. The hour of sunset at this time of year is trying to delicate constitutions. So on."

"About three-quarters of an hour ago she woke up with a loud cry, and has been ever since in a state of great agitation, wringing violently, and answering none of my questions. Yet she does not seem light-headed, but rather what we call hysterical."

"You will permit me now to see her. Take comfort—in all you tell me you are nothing to warrant serious alarm."

CHAPTER X.

To the true physician there is an inexpressible sanctity in the sick-chamber. At its threshold the mere human passions lose their hold on his heart. Love there would be profanation. Even the grief permitted to others he must put aside. He must enter that room—a Calm Intelligence. He is disabled for his mission if he suffer aught to obscure the keen quiet glance of his science. Age or youth, beauty or deformity, innocence or guilt, merge their distinctions in one common attribute—human suffering appealing to human skill.

Woe to the households in which the trusted Healer feels not on his conscience the solemn obligations of his glorious art. Reverently, as in a temple, I stood in the virgin's chamber. When her mother placed her hand in mine, and I felt the throb of its pulse, I was aware of no quicker beat of my own heart. I looked with a steady eye on the face, more beautiful from the flush that deepened the delicate hues of the young cheek, and the lustre that brightened the dark blue of the wandering eyes. She did not at first heed me; did not seem aware of my presence; but kept murmuring to herself words which I could not distinguish.

At length, when I spoke to her, in that low, soothing tone which we learn at the sick-bed, the expression of her face altered suddenly; she passed the hand I did not hold over her forehead, turned round, looked at me full and long, with unmistakable surprise, yet not as if the surprise displeased her; less the surprise which recoils from the sight of a stranger than that which seems doubtfully to recognize an unexpected friend! Yet on the surprise there seemed to creep something of apprehension—of fear: her hand trembled, her voice quivered, as she said,

"Can it be, can it be? Am I awake? Mother, who is this?"

"Only a kind visitor, Dr. Fenwick, sent by Mrs. Poynts, for I was uneasy about you, darling. How are you now?"

"Better. Strangely better."

She removed her hand gently from mine, and with an involuntary modest shrinking, turned toward Mrs. Ashleigh, who, with her mother toward herself, so that she became at once hidden from me.

Satisfied that there was here no delirium, nor even more than the slight and temporary fever which often accompanies a sudden nervous attack in constitutions unusually sensitive, I retired noiselessly from the room, and went not into that which had been occupied by the deceased husband, but down to my own drawing-room, to write my prescription. I had already sent the servant off with it to the chemist's before Mrs. Ashleigh joined me.

"She seems recovering surprisingly; her forehead is cooler; she is perfectly self-possessed, only she can not account for her own seizure, can not account either for the fainting or the agitation with which she awoke from sleep."

"I think I can account for it. The first room in which she entered—that in which she fainted—had its window open; the sides of the room were overgrown with the creeping plants in full blossom. Miss Ashley had already predisposed herself to injurious effects from the chill, fatigue, excitement, imprudence in sitting out at the fall of a heavy dew. The sleep after the fainting fit was the more distressed, because nature, always alert and active in subjects so young, was making its own effort to right itself from an injury. Nature has nearly succeeded. What I have prescribed will a little aid and accelerate that which nature has set to do, and in a day or two I do not doubt that your daughter will be perfectly restored. Only let me recommend care to avoid exposure to the open air during the close of the day. Let her avoid also the room in which she was first seized, for it is a strange phenomenon in nervous temperament as a nervous attack may, without visible cause, be repeated in the same place where it was first experienced. You had better shut up the chamber for at least some weeks, burn fires in it, repaint and paper it, sprinkle chloroform. You are not, perhaps, aware that Dr. Lloyd died in that room after a prolonged illness. Suffer me to wait till your servant returns with the medicine, and let me employ the interval in asking a few questions. Miss Ashleigh, you say, never had a fainting fit before. I should presume that she is not what we call strong. But has she ever had any illness that alarmed you?"

"Never."

"No great liability to cold and cough, to attacks of the chest or lungs?"

"Certainly not. Still I have feared that she may have a tendency to consumption. Do you think so? Your questions alarm me!"

"I do not think so; but before I pronounce a positive opinion, one question more. You say you feared a tendency to consumption. Is that disease in her family? She certainly did not inherit it from you. But on her father's side?"

"Her father," said Mrs. Ashleigh, with tears in her voice, "died young, but of brain fever, which the medical men said was brought on by over-study."

"Enough, my dear Madam. What you say confirms my belief that your daughter's constitution is the very opposite to that in which the seeds of consumption lurk. It is rather that far nobler constitution which the keenness of the nervous susceptibility renders delicate but elastic—as quick to recover as it is to suffer."

"Thank you, thank you, Dr. Fenwick, for what you say. You take a load from my heart. For Mr. Vigors, I know, thinks Lilian consumptive, and Mrs. Poynts has rather frightened me at times by hints to the same effect. But when you speak of nervous susceptibility, I do not quite understand you. My daughter is not what is commonly called nervous. Her temper is singularly even."

"But if not excitable, should you also say that she is not impressionable? The things which do not disturb her temper may, perhaps, deject her spirits. Do I make myself understood?"

"Yes, I think I understand your distinction. But I am not quite sure if it applies. To most things that affect the spirits she is not more sensitive than other girls, perhaps less so. But she is certainly very impressionable in some things."

"In what?"

"She is more moved than any one I ever knew by objects in external nature, rural scenery, rural sounds, by music, by the books that she reads—even books that are not works of imagination. Perhaps in all this she takes after her poor father, but in a more marked degree—at least, I observe it more in her. For he was peculiarly silent and reserved. And perhaps also her peculiarities have been fostered by the seclusion in which she has been brought up. It was with a view to make her a little more like girls of her own age that these friends, Mrs. Poynts, induced me to come here. Lilian was reconciled to this change; but she shrank from the thoughts of London, which I should have preferred. Her poor father could not endure London."

"Miss Ashleigh is fond of reading?"

"Yes, she is fond of reading, but more fond of music. She will sit by herself for hours without book or work, and seem as abstracted as if in a dream. She was so even in her earliest childhood. Then she would tell me what she had been conjuring up to herself. She would say that she had seen—positively seen—beautiful lands far away from earth; flowers and trees not like ours. As she grew older this visionary talk displeased me, and I scolded her, and said that if others knew her they would think that she was not only silly, but very untruthful. So of late years she never ventures to tell me what, in such dreamy moments, she suffers herself to imagine; but the habit of musing continues still. Do you not agree with Mrs. Poynts, that the best cure would be a little cheerful society among other young people?"

"Certainly," said I, honestly, though with a jealous pang. "I will wait here till you return. Will you take it up to her, and then sit with her half an hour or so? By that time I expect she will be asleep. I will wait here till you return. Oh, I can amuse myself with the newspapers and books on your table. Stay! one caution I be sure there can be no mirrors in Miss Ashleigh's sleeping-room. I think I saw a trenchmirror in a stand by the window. If so, banish it."

Left alone, I examined the room in which, I thought of joy! I had surely now won the claim to become a privileged guest. I noticed the books Lilian must have touched; in the articles of furniture, as yet so hastily disposed that the settled look of home was not about them, I still knew that I was gazing on things which her mind must associate with the history of her young life. That late-harp must be surely hers, and the scarf, with a girl's favorite colors—pure white and pale blue—and the birdcage, and the childish ivory work-case, with implements too pretty for use, all spoke of her.

It was a blissful, intoxicating reverie, which Mrs. Ashleigh's entrance disturbed.

Lilian was sleeping calmly. I had no pretense to linger there any longer.

"I leave you, I trust, with your mind quite at ease," said I. "You will allow me to call to-morrow, in the afternoon?"

"Oh yes, gratefully."

Mrs. Ashleigh held out her hand as I made toward the door.

Is there a physician who has not felt at times how that ceremonious fee throws him back from the garden land of humanity into the market-place of money—seems to put him out of the pale of equal friendship, and say, "True, you have given health and life. Adieu! there, you are paid for it." With a poor person there would have been no dilemma, but Mrs. Ashleigh was affluent: to depart from custom here was almost impertinence. But had the penalty of my refusal been the doom of never again beholding Lilian, I could not have taken her mother's gold. So I did not appear to notice the hand held out to me, and passed by with a quickened step.

"But, Dr. Fenwick, stop!"

"No, Ma'am, no! Miss Ashleigh would have recovered as soon without me. Whenever my aid is really wanted, then—but Heaven grant that time may never come! We will talk again about her to-morrow."

I was gone. Now in the garden ground, odorous with blossoms; now in the lane, inclosed by the narrow walls; now in the deserted streets, over which the moon alone fell as in that winter night when I hurried from the chamber of death. But the streets were not ghastly now, and the moon was no longer Hecate, that dreary goddess of awe and spectres, but the sweet, simple Lady of the Stars, on whose gentle face lovers have gazed ever since (if that guess of astronomers be true) she was parted from earth to rule the tides of its deeps from afar, even as love from love divided rules the heart that yearns toward it with mysterious law!

CHAPTER XI.

WITH what increased benignity I listened to the patients who visited me the next morning! The whole human race seemed to me worthier of love, and I longed to diffuse among all some rays of the glorious hope that had dawned upon my heart. My first call, when I went forth, was on the poor young woman from whom I had been returning the day before, when an impulse, which seemed like a fate, had lured me into the grounds where I had first seen Lilian. I felt grateful to this poor patient; without her, Lilian herself might be yet unknown to me.

The girl's brother, a young man employed in the police, and whose pay supported his widowed mother and the suffering sister, received me at the threshold of the cottage.

"Oh, Sir! she is so much better to-day; almost free from pain. Will she live now? can she live?"

"If my treatment has really done the good you say; if she be really better under it, I think her recovery may be pronounced. But I must see her."

The girl was indeed wonderfully better. I felt that my skill was achieving a signal triumph, but that was not even my intellectual pride was forgotten in the luxurious unfolding of that sense of heart which had so newly waked into blossom.

As I recrossed the threshold I smiled on the brother, who was still lingering there.

"Your sister is saved, Walter. She needs now chiefly wine and good though light nourishment; these you will find at my house; call there for them every day."

"God bless you, Sir! If ever I can serve

"I HAD NOT YET ASKED YOU TO BE MY FRIEND, I ASK IT NOW."

you—" His tongue faltered—he could say no more.

Serve me—Allen Fenwick—that poor policeman! Me, whom a king could not serve! What did I ask from earth but Fame and Lilian's heart? Thrones and bread man wins from the aid of Science. But a woman's heart he can only gain through himself.

So I strode gayly up the hill, through the iron gates into the fairy ground, and stood before Lilian's home.

The man-servant, on opening the door, seemed somewhat confused, and said, hastily, before I spoke,

"Not at home, Sir; a note for you."

I turned the note mechanically in my hand; I felt stunned.

"Not at home! Miss Ashleigh can not be out. How is she?"

"Better, Sir, thank you."

I still could not open the note; my eyes turned wistfully toward the windows of the house, and there—at the drawing-room window—I encountered the scowl of Mr. Vigors. I colored with resentment, divined that I was dismissed, and walked away with a proud crest and a firm step.

When I was out of the gates, in the blind lane, I opened the note. It began formally, "Mrs. Ashleigh presents her compliments," and went on to thank me, civilly enough, for my attendance the night before, would not give me the trouble to call on my visit, and inclosed a fee double the amount of the fee prescribed by custom. I flung the money, as an asp that had stung me, over the hedge, and read the note into shreds. Having thus idly vented my rage, a dull gnawing sorrow came heavily down upon all other emotions, stifling and overpowering them. At the mouth of the lane I halted. I shrank from the thought of the crowded streets beyond. I shrank no more from the tumult of care from which stretched before me in the desert into which daily life was so suddenly smitten. I sat down by the roadside, shading my dejected face with a nerveless hand. I looked up as the sound of steps reached my ear, and saw Dr. Jones coming from the house. He, too, averted his face. Abbots' House. He must have been there at the very time I had called. I was not only dismissed from remembrance, but from the recollection of the spot on which I had seated myself, and went my way into the town, went through my allotted round of professional visits, but my attentions were not so tenderly devoted, my skill so genially quickened by the glow of benevolence, as my poorer patients had found them in the morning.

I have said how the physician should enter the sick-room. "A Calm Intelligence!" But if you enter a house on the hurry, the mind inflames—that suffers. Little worth, I suspect, was my "calm intelligence" that day. Bicket, in his famous book upon Death, divides life into two parts—the chaser—animal and organic. Man's intellect, with the brain for its centre, belongs to life animal; his passions, centred in the heart, to life organic. Alas! if the noblest passions, through which alone we fit ourselves into the moral realm of the sublime and beautiful, really have their centre in the life which the very vegetable, that lives organically, shares with us! And, indeed, if it be true that life which we share with the vegetable that can cloud, obstruct, suspend, annul that life centred in the brain, which is what with every living however anagelic, in every star however remote, on whom the Creator bestows the faculty of thought!

To be continued.

CHAPTER XII.

BUT suddenly I remembered Mrs. Poyntz. I ought to call on her. So I closed my round of visits at her door. But the day was then far advanced, and the servant politely informed me that Mrs. Poyntz was at dinner. I could only leave my card with a message that I would pay my respects to her the next day. That evening I received from her this note:

"DEAR DR. FENWICK,—I regret much that I can not have the pleasure of seeing you to-day. Poyntz and I are going to visit his brother, at the other end of the county, and we shall start early. We shall be away about a week. Sorry to hear from Mrs. Ashleigh that she has been persuaded by Mr. Vigors to consult Dr. Jones about her health. Vigors and Jones both frighten the poor mother, and insist upon consultations and opinions. Unluckily, you seem to have said there was little the matter. Some doctors gain their reputation by some grandeur—fit their address by adroit use of the opposite to terror. You do not wear spectacles; Dr. Jones does. And, after all, better perhaps as it is.

Yours, etc.

"M. POYNTZ."

To my more selfish grief anxiety for Lilian was now added. I had seen many more patients die from being mistreated for consumption than from consumption itself. And Dr. Jones was a mercenary, cunning, ready man, with much ex- knowledge of human foibles, but very little of the treatment of human maladies. My fears were soon confirmed. A few days after I heard from Miss Brabazon that Miss Ashleigh was seriously ill—kept her room. Mrs. Ashleigh made this excuse for not immediately resuming the visits which the Hill had shown me. Again Miss Brabazon said, soon Dr. " who had at first shown his head; said it was a serious c , but it at time and cure (his time and his system) effects wonders.

How stealthily as the dead of the night I would climb the Hill, and look to the windows of the old mansion—one window, at which a light burned dim and mournful, the light of a sick-room—of hers!

At length Mrs. Poyntz came back, and I captured her house, having fully resolved beforehand on the line of policy to be adopted toward the potentate whom I hoped to secure as an ally. It was clear that neither disguise nor half-concurrence would baffle the penetration of so keen an intellect, or propitiate the good-will of so imperious and solute a temper. Perfect frankness here was the wisest prudence; and, after all, it was most agreeable to my own nature, and most worthy of my own honor.

Luckily, I found Mrs. Poyntz alone, and, taking in both mine the hand she somewhat coldly extended to me, I said, with the earnestness of unaffected emotion:

"You observed, when I last saw you, that I had not yet asked you to be my friend. I ask it now. Listen to me with all the indulgence you can vouchsafe, and let me at least profit by your counsel if you refuse to give me your aid."

Rapidly, however, as I spoke, I saw that I had first won Lilian, and how sudden, how strange to myself had been the impression which that first sight of her had made!

"You remarked the change that had come over me," said I; "it you divined the cause before I divined it myself. It is as if a sad thrice before you, thinking that through you I might see, in the freedom of social intercourse," the face that was then hurrying me. You know what has since passed. Miss Ashleigh is ill; her case is mine. I am answered, wholly misunderstood. All other feelings are merged in one sense of anxiety—of alarm. But it has become due to me, due to all, to honor the risk of your ridicule even more than of your anger, by stating to you thus candidly, plainly, bluntly, the sentiments which renders alarm so poignant, and which if scarcely avowed to myself, assurance of some wild, dreamy boy, may seem an unpardonable folly in a man of my years and my sober calling; but it is to me, to me, to Allen Fenwick, that all the dearest thing in life to me is to become. I ask you, if you, who know Miss Ashleigh so intimately, who must be more or less aware of her plans or wishes for her daughter's future, if you, her friend, whose plans or wishes lead to a lot far more ambitious than an alliance with me could offer to Miss Ashleigh, have still the right, if not encouraged from the house; aid me in suppressing a presumptuous, visionary passion. I can not enter that house without love or hope. I can not enter the house without love or hope. I can not cross if such love and such hope would be a sin and a treachery in the eyes of honor. I ask you, restore Miss Ashleigh to health; her gratitude you have it can not continue. This danger must not be. I am not her son, if her wishes or views form above a son-in-law. And I am the more bound to consider all this while it is yet time, because I found you present at my last sudden and a fortune—was what would be here termed an heiress. And the full consciousness that whatever favor I may have unconsciously won to acquire, does not open those vistas of social power and grandeur which are opened by professions or by trade, I, who have studied—that full consciousness, I say, was forced upon me by certain words of your own. For the rest, I have the sincerity, if I am not the wisest, to speak and avoided the career that makes me useful to man. But I acknowledge that on entering a profession such as mine, success is uncertain except that of arms or the senate—all leave their pollgree at its door, an ensured or dead letter. All must come on equal terms to the race, and into that arena in which men ask aid from a man as he makes himself; to them his dead forefathers are blank. I, therefore, look to advantage of birth I cease to have a claim. I am but a provincial physician, whose station would be the same had I not a penny's son. But solid retains its grand privilege in all ranks. He who has gold is removed from the suspicion that attaches to the adventurer. Whatever be my private fortune, swelled by my savings, is sufficient to secure to any one I married a larger settlement than many a wealthy suitor could offer. I need no fortune with a wife; if she have one, it would be settled on herself. Pardon these vulgar details. You are made practical when you love."

"Fully," answered the Queen of the Hill, who had listened to me quietly, watchfully, and without one interruption.

"Fully. And you have done well to confide to me with so generous an unreserve. But before I say more, I ask you, as a friend, to take your advice for Lilian, supposing that you ought not to attend her? You have no trust in Dr. Jones; neither have I. And Anne Ashleigh has note received to-day, begging me to call, justifies your alarm. Still you think there is no tendency to consumption?"

"Of that I am certain, so far as my slight glimpse of a case that to me, however, seems a plain and not uncommon one, will permit. But in the alternative you put—that my own skill, whatever its worth, is forbidden—my earnest advice is, that you, Mrs. Poyntz, should take her daughter at once to London, and consult there those great authorities to whom I can not compare my own opinion or experience; and by their counsel abide."

Mrs. Poyntz shaded her eyes with her hand for a few moments, and seemed deliberating with herself. Then she said, with her peculiar smile, half grave, half ironical:

"Is it matters more ordinary you we 'd have won me to your side long ago. That is, Vigors should have presumed to cancel my re- mmendation to a matter on the Hill, in case of rebellion, and involved the honor of my pr- fession in it. I suppressed my indignation at an affront so unmeaning, and out of pique against yourself, but much more, I think, out of regard for you."

"I understand. You detected the secret of my heart; you knew that Mrs. Ashleigh would not wish to see her daughter the wife of a provincial physician."

"Am I sure, or are you sure, that the daughter herself would accept that fate; or if she accepted it, would not repent?"

"Do not think me the vainest of men when I say this—that I can not believe I should be so enthralled by a feeling at war with my reason, unfavored by any thing I can detect in my habits of mind, or even by the dreams of a youth which existed science and excluded love, unless I was irresistibly convinced that Miss Ashleigh's heart was free—that I could win, and that I could keep it! Ask me why I am convinced of this, and I can say no more why I think that she could love me, than I can tell you why I love her!"

"I am of the world, worldly. But I am woman, womanly—though I may not care to be thought so. And therefore, though what you say is—regarded in a womanly point of view, it is logically sound. But still you can not know Lilian as I do. Your manner and hers are in strong contrast. I do not think she is a safe wife for you. The purest, the most innocent creature imaginable, certainly that, but always in the seventh heaven. And you in the seventh heaven just at this moment, but with an irresistible gravitation to the solid earth, which will have its way again when the honey-moon is over. I do not believe you two would harmonize by intuition. You do not believe Lilian would sympathize with you, and I am sure you could not sympathize with her throughout the long daily intercourse of every-day life. And therefore, for your sake as well as hers, I was notwithpleased to find that Dr. Jones had removed you from the sphere of your family influences, I say, frankly—do not go again to that house. Conquer this sentiment, fancy, passion, whatever it be. I will advise Mrs. Ashleigh to take Lilian to town. Shall it be so settled?"

I could not speak. I buried my face in my hands—misery, misery, desolation! I know not how long I remained thus silent, perhaps many minutes. At length I felt a cold, firm, but not ungentle hand placed upon mine; and a clear, full, but not discouraging voice said to me:

"Leave me now. I will ponder this conversation, and to-morrow, or the day after, you shall have shown that you so deeply feel. The interests of others are in the scales of the balance. The heart which does not always go in the same scale with the interests, still has its weight in the scale against them. Be a man, and not a love-sick son-in-law. And I am the more bound to consider all this while it is yet time, because I found you present at my last sudden and a fortune—was what would be here termed an heiress. And the full consciousness that whatever favor I may have unconsciously won to acquire, does not open those vistas of social power and grandeur which are opened by professions or by trade, I, who have studied—that full consciousness, I say, was forced upon me by certain words of your own. For the rest, I have the sincerity, if I am not the wisest, to speak and avoided the career that makes me useful to man. But I acknowledge that on entering a profession such as mine, success is uncertain except that of arms or the senate—all leave their pollgree at its door, an ensured or dead letter. That is, Vigors should have presumed to cancel my re- mmendation to a matter on the Hill, in case of rebellion, and involved the honor of my pr- fession in it. I suppressed my indignation at an affront so unmeaning, partly out of pique against yourself, but much more, I think, out of regard for you."

"I understand. You detected the secret of my heart; you knew that Mrs. Ashleigh would not wish to see her daughter the wife of a provincial physician."

"Am I sure, or are you sure, that the daughter herself would accept that fate; or if she accepted it, would not repent?"

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SCOTT AND HIS MAJOR GENERALS.

WE publish on page 548 a group of LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SCOTT and his MAJOR GENERALS, and subjoin the following brief memoranda of the men.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT was born near Petersburg, Virginia, on June 13, 1786, and is consequently 75 years old. He was bred a lawyer, but left the practice as an artillerycaptain in 1812, distinguished himself in a most remarkable manner in the campaign on the Canadian frontier, and was promoted to Major General at 28. In 1833 he concluded the Black Hawk War. In 1837 he led an army to the city of Mexico, and there obtained the supreme command. In 1852 he was the Whig candidate for President, and was defeated by General Pierce. He is now the Commander-in-Chief of the United States army, with the rank of Lieutenant-General.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN C. FREMONT was born in South Carolina in January, 1818. He began life by teaching mathematics; obtained employment on a Government survey of the Mississippi; grew rapidly distinguished; won a commission as Lieutenant of Engineers, and in 1842 was sent with a few men to explore the South Pass in the Rocky Mountains. He made two years in explorations of the mountain country, succeeding thoroughly in his object, though at great cost of suffering and privation. He took an active part in the conquest of California, and was the first Senator from that State. In 1856 he was the Republican candidate for the Presidency, and was defeated by James Buchanan. He commands the Department of the West, head-quarters at St. Louis.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN was born in Philadelphia on December 3, 1826. At the age of sixteen he entered the Military Academy at West Point, graduating with the class of 1846, with the rank of Brevet Second Lieutenant of Engineers. Until the Mexican war, however, he had no opportunity of distinguishing himself, and then, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco," as the orders expressed it, he was brevetted First Lieutenant. "For gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Molino del Rey, September 8, 1847, he was offered a Brevet Captaincy, which he declined. He was advanced in this rank, however, subsequently, "for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Chapultepec," and received the command of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoneers in May, 1848. At the close of the Mexican War he returned to West Point, where he remained on duty with the sappers and miners until 1851. During this time he introduced the bayonet exercise into the army, and translated and adapted a manual which has since become a text-book for the service. During the summer and fall of 1851 he superintended the construction of Fort Delaware, and in the succeeding spring was assigned to duty, under Major R. B. Marcy, in the expedition for the exploration of the Red River. Thence he was ordered Detroit to Europe as military attaché, on the staff of General Persifer F. Smith, and remained for some months in surveying the rivers and harbors of that region. In 1853 he was ordered to Pacific coast, in command of the Western division of the survey of the North Pacific Railroad route. He returned to the East in the fall of 1854, and connected with the Pacific survey, and was engaged also in secret service to the West Indies. The next year he received a commissionas Captain of Cavalry, and was appointed a member of the Commission which went to the seat of war in the Crimea and in Northern Russia. Colonel Richard Delafield, one of his colleagues, is now an officer in the relief army, and Major Alfred Mordecai, the third member of the Commission, a short time ago resigned the Superintendency of the Troy Arsenal. Major M'Clellan's report on the "Organization of the European Armies and the Operations of the War," a quarto volume, embodying the result of his observations in the Crimea, greatly enhanced his reputation as a scientific soldier. In January, 1857, weary of inaction, he resigned his position in the army to become Vice-President and Engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad, which post he held for three years, when he was offered and accepted the Presidency of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, of which he was also General Superintendent. When our domestic troubles assumed formidable dimensions, Major M'Clellan's services were at once offered and accepted. Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, tried to secure the benefit of his experience in organizing the volunteers from that State, but the tender of the Major-Generalship of the Ohio forces reached him first, and he at once accepted it. On May 14 he received a commission as Major-General in the United States Army, and now has command of the Department of Virginia.

MAJOR-GENERAL NATHANIEL P. BANKS was born at Waltham, Massachusetts, on 30th January, 1816, and is consequently forty-five years of age. His father was a manufacturer of the middle class, and after a brief term at the village school this son also took his place in a factory. He was always fond of political politics, and in early age he ran for the Legislature on the Democratic ticket. Defeated at six consecutive elections, he was successful at seventh, and became a leading member of the House, and ultimately Speaker. He was President of the Convention which revised the Constitution of Massachusetts, and was elected to Congress. His election as Speaker of the House, after a protracted contest, attracted public attention throughout the country, and his career as Speaker placed him among the foremost men in the country. He was subsequently chosen by two consecutive terms Governor of Massachusetts, and increased his reputation by his administration of the office. On the close of his second term he entered the service of the Illinois Central Railroad as General Superintendent. He only vacated his post to accept the rank he holds in the army. General Banks's Department is on the Upper Potomac.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. DIX was born at Boscawen, New Hampshire, in 1798, and is consequently sixty-three years old. He served as ensign, and subsequently as adjutant and aid to General Brown in the war of 1812. At the close of the war he began the practice of the law at Cooperstown, New York. He has since filled many public offices. In 1833 he was Secretary of State; in 1842 he was elected to the State Assembly; and from 1845 to 1849 he was one of the United States Senators from New York. In 1850 he was appointed Subtreasurer at New York; in 1860, Postmaster, and on the resignation of the traitor Thompson, he accepted the office of Secretary of the Treasury. General Dix's Department is Maryland.

A FEMALE REBEL IN BALTIMORE—AN EVERYDAY SCENE—[SEE PAGE 571.]

ON GUARD.

At midnight, on my lonely beat,
When shadow wraps the wood and lea,
A vision seems my view to greet
Of one at home that prays for me.

No roses blow upon her cheek—
Her form is not a lover's dream—
But on her face, so fair and meek,
A host of holier beauties gleam.

For softly shines her silver hair,
A patient smile is on her face,
And the mild lustrous light of prayer
Around her sheds a moon-like grace.

She prays for one that's far away—
The soldier in his holy fight—
And begs that Heaven in mercy may
Protect her boy and bless the Right!

Till, though the leagues lie far between,
This silent incense of her heart
Steals o'er my soul with hush serene,
And we no longer are apart.

So guarding thus my lonely beat,
By shadowy wood and haunted lea,
That vision seems my view to greet
Of her at home who prays for me.

A POLITICAL CATECHISM FOR CHILDREN.

IT is the boast of the United States that our children imbibe political knowledge almost with their mother's milk, and that our boys at school possess an experience of political affairs which is not surpassed by that of average citizens of most foreign countries. We are not surprised, therefore, that we have received the following POLITICAL CATECHISM, which appears to have been prepared by some very sensible American matron for the sake of her boys, and we commend it to the perusal of young men of all ages:

QUESTION. What is a Democrat, mamma?

ANSWER. A Democrat, my dear, is a defunct species, of which you will find a lively example in stuffed specimen at Lancaster, Pennsylvania. In their day Democrats were hearty patriots who sought the good of the whole country. These Democrats have now gone to the wars, and are fighting the battles of the country against traitors. Nobody calls himself a Democrat nowadays except broken-down politicians who have no honest means of living, and who assume that title in the hope of being able to cheat and steal.

QUESTION. What is a Republican, mamma?

ANSWER. Republicans, my dear, were people who sought to prevent slavery entering the national territories. As the question of slavery in the territories (and other places besides, perhaps) has been pretty thoroughly settled by the great Rebellion of the slaveholders under Jeff Davis and other traitors, there are no Republicans left now, except a few persons who desire places in the Custom-house.

QUESTION. What is the Democratic State Committee, mamma?

ANSWER. The Democratic State Committee, my dear, is composed of dead bodies which are so offensive to the sight of God and man that no one has had the charity to bury them. In November next this unpleasant job will be done by the people at large.

QUESTION. What is a Breckinridge Democrat?

ANSWER. A Breckinridge Democrat is a person who desires to see this Union overthrown, and the rebellion of Jeff Davis successful.

QUESTION. What do the Breckinridge Democrats want, mamma?

ANSWER. A very natural question, my dear. Some of them want offices under Jeff Davis: one wants licenses to sell Southern lottery tickets: another owns slaves and wants to bring them to New York: others have money owing to them all the South, and would like to get it: but most of them are mere vagabonds who want to see anarchy established in the hope of making something out of it.

QUESTION. What is coercion, mamma?

ANSWER. Coercion is resisting a robber who tries to plunder you.

QUESTION. What is compromise?

ANSWER. Compromise is giving the robber your purse, your watch, your coat, and your boots, on condition that he leaves you your shirt-collar.

QUESTION. What is a fratricidal war?

ANSWER. A fratricidal war is putting down thieves and traitors who happen to be your fellow-countrymen. The United States engaged in a fratricidal war when they chased and caught the traitor Burr; and they would have undertaken a fratricidal war against the traitor Arnold, in unanimously short order, if they could have got at him.

QUESTION. What is liberty of the press?

ANSWER. The liberty of the press, as understood by the framers of the Constitution, is the right of publishing what you will, provided no one is injured thereby; but the liberty of the press, as understood by the friends of Jeff Davis, is the right of playing the sneak thief when one has not the courage to play the burglar.

QUESTION. What is State sovereignty?

ANSWER. State sovereignty, my dear, is a fine phrase under which bad men choose the laws which they will obey and the laws which they will break. It is scarcely raised into a system.

QUESTION. What is neutrality, mamma?

ANSWER. Neutrality, my dear, is meanly shirking your duty as a citizen, and helping the enemy in a cowardly underhand way. A man who stands by and sees a poor fellow beaten to death by a ruffian is a neutral, and the model of those who are neutral in the present war.

QUESTION. What is the cause of the present war?

ANSWER. This war, my dear, is the last dying struggle of slavery as a political power. If you have real history at hand, you must have learned that all great and powerful systems or bodies die hard. The Roman Catholic hierarchy, the divine right monarchies, the feudal oligarchies, all struggled very hard before they gave way to common sense and the rights of the people. Just so slavery, as an element of political power, is now making its last dying struggle, and you may depend upon it, it will fight to the last. But if you have read your Bible right, and have the true instincts of a free-born American boy in you, you can not doubt how the contest will end.

HAVE WE AN ARMY?

Now that the Government of Mr. Lincoln is beginning to realize that we are at war in earnest, it is to be hoped that one thing will be done, organizing our present disorganized masses of volunteers into a regular army. There is a good deal of work to be done before this can be successfully achieved; but it is believed that General M'Clellan has the business in hand, and is gradually elaborating it.

Thus we are assured that the present confusing distinctions between the regiments contributed by the several loyal States are about to be abolished, and the whole body of volunteers, to be fixed into one army, and each regiment to be numbered as the —— regiment of the United States Army. At present, twenty-one States have sent forth men to fight under the old flag, to say nothing of the Territories. Thus there are twenty-one First regiments of Volunteers, at least twenty Second regiments, no end of Thirds and Fourths, and so on. This system of nomenclature only opens a door to much confusion and possibly grave mistakes. The system of distinguishing certain regiments as Massachusetts Volunteers or New York Volunteers, moreover, implies a tacit recognition of the heresy of State Sovereignty which underlies the Southern rebellion. It is well, therefore, that all the regiments of Volunteers should not deprive any State of the glory its volunteers may confer upon it. Every body will quickly learn to identify the new regiments; just as a Great Britain every body knows that the 79th and 93d are Scotchmen, the Guards Englishmen, the 23d Welshmen, and the 88th Irishmen.

We are also glad to learn that it is proposed to uniform all the volunteers in blue army cloth. In every battle that has been fought, fatal blunders have arisen from the similarity of the uniforms of the friends and enemies of the enemy. The large plates which we have published, giving the uniforms of troops in both armies, might, with a few modifications, have answered for either. It is absolutely necessary that our soldiers should be able to identify each other in battle. The very word used to describe the costume of the rebel Confederacy—explains the necessity for the proposed reform.

Other and graver changes are requisite, however, if our army is to be made serviceable. The system is not working as it ought to be working well. The troubles which have arisen in several of our New York regiments show that the judgment of the people is not always to be relied upon for the selection of the best company officers: nor have the latter been invariably right in the choice of field-officers. In the best-officered regiments, as in the field the election of officers was a farce. The colonel chose his major, captains, and lieutenants, and the privates generally confirmed the choice. In all probability a strict application of the new rules requiring all officers to undergo an examination by a Board would accomplish a similar result for regimental officers. Once appointed, if the Board would do its duty fearlessly. Large latitude should, however, be granted to commanding officers in the matter of suspending or cashiering incompetent subordinates. The officers of every mutinous company ought, for instance, to be reduced to the ranks at once: for the mutiny is generally their own and dangerous polette, instead of being virtually relinquished there?

Why are women, notorious agents of treason, openly countenanced, socially, by high officers of the Government?

Why, when loyal citizens are imprisoned at Richmond, are men taken in arms against the United States feasted and allowed honorably to go at large upon a foolish promise of doing so no more?

Why, in general, after four months of open, active, dangerous war, following months and years of careful hostile preparation, does the Administration seem so slowly to open its eyes and so reluctantly believe in battle?

Such questions are asked by thousands in no captious or disloyal spirit, and with the fullest allowances for the difficulties with which the Administration has been forced to contend. They are asked too by those who see that the movement of the Administration is constantly forward. It has not gone backward—but it has not gone forward fast enough. At such a time it should lead, not follow, the popular feeling. That and that only would deepen and strengthen the popular faith. The people naturally expect that every power necessary to preserve the existence of their Government will be assumed; and they stand ready in Congress to justify and approve the assumption. A bill of indemnity or a bill of pains and penalties, Senator Sherman says, confronts the Administration in the exercise of every strong measure necessary to the great end to be won. But it need be—but that every vigor will be censured. It should rather ask itself what will confront it if it hesitates and delays and incessantly asks small measures.

And it must bear with question and criticism, so it be fair and not querulous. The people of this country are not children. They do not feel that a truly active man or Administration is inactive. They know why they need not censure General Sackson in '32. They know that there was no need of spurring Washington in '76. They have no doubt of the fidelity of the Administration; and they hope that it is now thoroughly awake and dressed for the day.

THE SURGEONS' PAROLE.

THERE has been some surprise and regret expressed that several of our surgeons who were captured at Bull Run should have given their word not to take up arms against the conspiracy. The regret is that they have so far recognized the rebellion.

The truth of the matter is, that they were taken while in attendance upon our wounded, and they were told that they could not return to Sudbury church to continue their duties unless they gave their word not to take up arms on our side. They had, therefore, to decide whether they would abandon our wounded soldiers to die uncared for. And as they had given the field especially to take care of them, the surgeons are surely not to be very sharply censured for their conduct. It is not of course wise for the Government to allow the officers to go upon duty in our forts and camps. Nor does it materially strengthen the conspiracy; for their word merely means that there was a force sufficient to constrain their action. It concedes nothing to the rightfulness of the force.

WASHINGTON UPON REBELLION.

WHEN the Whisky Insurrection broke out in the eastern counties of Pennsylvania in 1794, Washington said that "if the laws are to be so trampled upon with impunity, and a minority, a small one too, is to dictate to the majority, there is an end put at one stroke to the existence of government."

Washington issued his proclamation on the 7th of August, 1794, declaring that, if tranquility were not perceived to restored, on the 1st of September force would be employed to compel submission to the laws. On the same day he made a requisition for twelve thousand militia, and ordered increased to fifteen thousand. He appointed Governor Lee, of Virginia, to the chief command, and Lee marched with the militia of Virginia, in two divisions.

"This great military array," says the historian, "extinguished at once the kindling elements of a civil war that would have overthrown the Republic."

Every thing that Washington said at that period is of the most singular interest to us now. In writing of the soldiers to Governor Lee he speaks of "the enlightened and patriotic zeal for the Constitution and the laws, which had led them cheerfully to quit their homes, families, and the comforts of a private life, to undertake, and thus far to perform, a long and fatiguing march, and to encounter and endure the hardships and privations of a military life. No citizen of the United States can ever be engaged in a service more important to their country, or more less liable to any reproach, solitude and preserve the blessings of that revolution which, at such expense of blood and treasure, was instituted as a free and independent nation."

When the disturbance was quelled, he said: "It has afforded a happy proof to the people of this country to show their abhorrence of the result, and their attachment to the Constitution and the laws; for I believe that five-sixths of the number of militia that was required would have come forward, if it had been necessary, in support of them."

Governor Lee, of Virginia, was the "Light Horse Harry" of the Revolution: peculiarly dear to Washington, who in youth had loved Lee's mother. He was also the father of General Robert Lee, now in arms against the same Constitution and those laws. Where does General Lee suppose that Washington, were he now living, would be found? Would he stand side by side with the Virginian Lee, who strikes at the heart of his country; or shoulder to shoulder with the Virginian Scott, whose latest years are bright with the sacred light of patriotism?

NOW AND THEN.

THE Richmond Enquirer, in speaking of the capture by the rebels of Colonel R. C. Carrington, a Virginian, who fought gallantly for his country at Manassas, says: "His eloquence and his arms have proved alike futile against his mother State. He has disgraced himself, not her."

When the first Continental Congress met in Philadelphia, Patrick Henry, says Irving, scouted the idea of sectional distinctions. "All America," said he, "is thrown into one mass. Where are your landmarks, your boundaries of colonies? They are all thrown down. The distinction between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders is no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."

So said the great Virginian patriot, long before the union that formally merged Virginians and New Yorkers in Americans. So says every patriot now, pledging, as he did, life and fortune and sacred honor in the sublime cause of free, popular, constitutional government.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

GOYON AND DE MERODE.

A LAY OF LEICESTER SQUARE.

AH! have you seen the great Monsieur de Goyon, the savior lost one?
Monsigner de Merode wie Goyon 'ave von few,
De General demande, and Monsigner dem,
Surrender of Zouave for some offease to try.

To Général Goyon, of Monsigner Merode,
Zo zame, in Inglese speech, we "is to be blowed;
I vill a not giv qo so unfortunate to you:
Your mission vos vagare, von onion, and von doo!"

Zo Général Goyon, to hear zis bad language
Spoke of Napoleon, hiv into von great rage;
"Ah! I'll be zure," he cry, "to punish you vell, you weare,
Else I vode give you two great boxes on ze ears.

"Take all your pretty robbs which keep your shoulders warm,
And I of Général will change to uniform
Like now ze ozzer Général, and zen I vill state,
I may you zander satisfaction on so plain."

Monsigner de Merode, he say, "I 'ave no excuse;
Ze offer to accept, for vhy I most refuse."
"Monsigner," zen Goyon, "you is von great coare,
"To me it pisin appears zat you are von poltron.

"Ze brave of your zare vit coures you no pain,

Monsigner de Merode did zereupon retreat,
Like von small dog wiz tail between his hinder feet,
Ze soldier of Napoleon remaining quite mad-by,
And neat him down to eat von plate of emble pie.

A MAN OF HIGH FAMILY.—It is not generally known that St. Bloodia is connected with one of the most illustrious families in Europe. The Duke of Bloodia's pedigree is confidently asserted to be a scion of the House of Lancaster.

A WOMAN TO BE ENVIED.—The wife of a poor Creole writes, sighingly, as follows: "I see that the Sultan is als ways appointing new favorites. I wish I was the favorite of the Sultana exercise the same privilege, and can come and so often as she likes to my husband's room."

ADVICE THAT NEVER WILL BE FOLLOWED.—A woman should never marry. Previous to marriage, she is an Angel—after marriage she is a Devil. Any man who marries a Woman—One who admires Women far too generally to prove a fault-perfecting husband.

VERY SMOOTABLE.—A new journal is announced, to be entitled The Quincy. We understand that a leading feature in it will be a series of articles on Whig Principles.

ADVICE TO THE INVINCIBLES.—If you will "drink like a fish," let it be then like the gold fish, whose entire gluttonies nothing but water.

STYLE!—What every coxcomb fancies he has attached to his gait.

A Methodist preacher, whose hearers were in the habit of going to sleep over his preachings, bought a tin whistle, and one Sabbath day, when he saw the congregation in a most somnolent influence, he drew forth his whistle and blew it with all his might. The effect was electrical—everybody awoke and upon their feet, staring at the minister, at each other, and inquiring what was the matter. "Nothing more is to come next. "You're a set of smart specimens of humanity, you are! I've been preaching to you for half an hour, and gazed around on the astonished assemblage. "When I preach the Gospel, by the Jews, you don't hear a word, and when I play upon the devil you're all wide awake, up and a coming, like a rush of locusts with a pole in their nest."

A SAYING AT PARTY.—When people say "Necessity has no law," they mean that necessity has no rule.

A genuine Jonathan, sojourning on the banks of Lough Neagh, says, in proof of the petrifying property of its waters, that an old soldier who had been killed at Waterloo by the sabre-point of Hugo Trout, has immersed his legs so long and so often in the lough that they have petrified, and now he knows no more reason upon what void to be laid than a log.

Men may have in their souls no locomotive strong enough to draw a train of thought.

"I'll neither tell my age for the censure or the sovereign," said cook, most resolutely, to her master, who was inquiring for the number of her years. "Hah," cried he, you down, surly-face, was the cool reply. "Upon my honor, Sir," said she, "my face is not surly," and cook, indeed, was not surly-faced.

The storms of adversity are wholesome, though, like snow-storms, their drifts are not always safe.

A MODEL OFFICER.—A certain militia captain commanding a company of raw recruits, was marching them through this body of the nation's bulwark in the act of "grim-visaged war." Coming to a narrow bridge, over which a very tricklish road, it was found necessary to stop the beating of the drum. "Mr. Drummer," shouted the "Cap," "Halt," our commander hauled out, somewhat pettishly, "Stop that drumming!" His wish understanding the order, the musician continued to perform his "paddedidder" and "Bammeraddider," with much more vigor than before. "Stop that drumming!" shouted our hero a second time: but the unconcerning drummer, with head erect and fire on the move, still went on. The indignant captain could bear it no longer: down from his charger he leaped, and, with these valiant battle words" with a flourish, and plunged it through the drum-head, "I'll make you understand, you rascal, I command!" "There, confound you, now rub-a-dub if you can!"

"Mr, get down on your hands and knees a minute, please." "What on earth could I do that for, pat?" "Cause I want to draw an elephant."

A gentleman said to his wife, a few evenings since, as they were talking over the war, "The measles—why that is a most unmilitary disease for troops to be sick with." "Why," she replied, "it is a very common sickness with the infantry, replied."

"Bob, how is your sweet-heart getting along?" "Pretty well; she says I needn't call any more."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

PREPARATIONS OF THE REBELS IN VIRGINIA.

The New York Times says: "There appears to be little doubt that the rebel Army at Manassas and in that vicinity is now made more numerous than it has ever been before, whatever its appointments may be. Immediately after the Bull Run battle, the rebel leaders made extraordinary exertions to concentrate troops in Virginia, in anticipation of another and more formidable demonstration by the National Army, and the result, it is understood, has been the transfer of large forces from Tennessee, which had been held there for the defence of the Mississippi, together with all that could be spared from the Cotton States, including a portion of Bragg's command at Pensacola. In addition to all this the work of improvement—for it can be called nothing else—has been steadily going on in Virginia. The Maryland line has been drawn the tighter, while the gaps from Leesburg and other counties, who have fled to avoid this impressment, have been the instances driving over their stock to save it from the marauders, and in others leaving every thing behind, and even to escape with their lives."

ARRESTS FOR TREASON.

Several parties have been arrested on suspicion of treason—including the Mayor of Washington, the Baltimore police commissioner, and several others now held in durance at Fort Lafayette, and two or three States in Washington Territory, for the crime of treason upon charges of communicating with the rebels. Among them are the wife of Mr. Secretary Seward, Governor Hicks, and Phillips, wife of an ex-member of Congress from Alabama, and her two children. Mrs. Phillips and children have been surrounded by a strong military guard, and the inmates held in custody.

M'CULLOCH'S MOVEMENTS IN WESTERN MISSOURI.

We learn that the Union men in the southwestern part of Missouri are rallying en masse to the rebel forces. Stragends of them being compelled to abandon their homes. About ten thousand men, under Price and Parsons, are marching northward, an advance-guard having reached as far as Lebanon on the 16th inst.

MORE SKIRMISHES.

Active military operations continue in Missouri. We learn from Springfield that a fight took place on Sunday night at twelve o'clock at Charleston, between the Union force, about 500 strong, commanded by Col. Dougherty, and Illinois Regiment, under command of Colonel Dougherty, accompanied by Major Gorman and Captain Hall of the Eleventh Illinois Regiment. The rebel force was estimated at 600 to 700 men, and was led by Colonel Thompson, of Jeff Thompson's army. The Union force was victorious, completely routing the rebels, killing forty and taking seventeen prisoners.

Captain Hickeman, with fifty mounted men, left Bird's Point at about six o'clock the same evening for Charleston, to join the forces under Colonel Dougherty, but failed to form a junction with them. They met a party of rebels about one hundred strong, and had a skirmish with them, two and taking thirty-three prisoners; they also captured thirty-three horses, and lost the loss of a man.

A PROCLAMATION BY GOVERNOR GAMBLE.

The following proclamation has been issued by Governor Gamble:

"Whereas the power of the civil authority is insufficient to execute the laws for the recovery of the citizens of the State, I, Hamilton R. Gamble, Governor of Missouri, do hereby call into the service of the State Militia forty-two thousand men of the militia of the State, assigning six thousand to each division, and one thousand to each, which is the same as a Congressional district. The force thus called into service will be, as far as possible, a volunteer force, and will consist of ten thousand cavalry and thirty-two thousand infantry. The number of volunteers should not exceed this requisition the excess will be held as a reserve corps. If there should be a deficiency it may become necessary to draft to fill the force. The Adjutant-General will issue to the Division Inspectors of the several military districts the necessary instructions to carry into effect this requisition. The force called out will be for six months, unless sooner discharged. The troops when entered, will not be furnished as rapidly as they can be had.

"Given under my hand and the seal of the State, at Jefferson City, this 24th day of August, in the year 1861.

"By the Governor:

M. OLIVER, Secretary of State."

TREASURY IN GOOD INVESTMENT SERVICE.

The investigation of the Potter Committee, it is said, has resulted in exposing a number of fraudulent claims, and several departments at Washington as persons who can not be relied upon to carry out Government.

BOUNTY FOR VOLUNTEERS.

The State of New York has adopted a policy which it would well for other States to follow. An order has been issued from head-quarters at Albany, giving a bounty of five dollars per man to every person who shall raise a company of thirty-two volunteers to the service of the Government.

TROUBLES OF THE SECESSION PRESS.

Last week, at Philadelphia, the Market [seized and stopped the publication of the New York News and the Christian Observer. The former sheet depends chiefly on the Southern trade for support, and the latter circulates at its issue in that direction much effect it seriously. At Philadelphia, however, the News was found in a measure to call out a guard to protect two disunion papers from the violence of the Union people.

The Westchester (Pennsylvania) Jeffersonian has been taken possession of by the Union men, who detest its secession sentiments. The Starke County (Ohio) Democrat has been suppressed because of its disloyal sentiments and aid to the Government.

On 24th inst. orders were received at the Post-Office here forbidding the transmission of the Journal of Commerce, the Daily News, the Freeman's Journal, and the Brooklyn Eagle through the mails of the United States. News-dealers will not be supplied with these papers, and the Marshals seize them wherever found. The Allegheanian, a Western Virginia paper, has also been suppressed. On Thursday night, in revenge for an attack upon a meeting at which Governor Pierpont was present, the Wheeling mansion was utterly destroyed on Friday by a party of returned volunteers, and upon the ruins was found a placard, published in the Northern States. The True Americans at Steubenville, Ohio, has been suppressed to popular opinion and suspended publication, remarking that as it can not be circulated, it will not be issued until the war is concluded. The press fever has also broken out in Wilmington, Delaware, where the publication of the Gazette office was forcibly set by an excited crowd, in consequence of certain remarks about the Union volunteers.

THE NEW STATE OF KANAWHA.

The members of the Convention of Western Virginia, in order to give the people time to consent to follow the advice of Attorney-General Bates, but have decided to extend the time for voting on the question to be submitted to the people at the election of Delegates to a Constitutional Convention, and upon the adoption of the Constitution of the new State, to be called Kanawha, may be enlarged by permitting counties adjoining counties to come in if they should desire to do so.

BOMBARDMENT OF GALVESTON.

The city of Galveston, Texas, was attacked on a pretty severe bombardment by the United States war vessels Harriet Lane, Brooklyn, Westfield, Sachem, and Owasco. They continued to throw shells into the city for half an hour, doing considerable damage. The batteries on shore responded, and it was thought that the South Carolina had received some hurt, as it was observed that she was undergoing repairs after the fight was over. The citizens of Galveston sent a protest on board, under a flag of truce, against the alleged violation of the rules of war in shelling the city without giving notice to remove the women and children. These facts we learn from Southern sources.

THE SEIZURE OF THE SUMTER AT CURACOA.

Letters from Curacoa, concerning the pirate Sumter, state that this craft was refused admittance to the port of Curacoa, and was compelled to anchor below the fort, at the entrance. Her six prizes, however, went inside. The Sumter shortly after was taken with an expectation that a National war vessel was in pursuit of her; she accordingly retired precipitately, leaving her prizes in the harbor. She subsequently captured two American vessels, loaded with provisions. On the 24 inst., she was in the vicinity of Maturin, on the coast of Venezuela. The Governor of Cumana had said that, if the pirate desired again to enter this harbor, it would not be allowed to do so. This decision should have been made earlier.

THE "JEFF DAVIS" AT PORTO RICO.

A correspondent at Ponce, Porto Rico, gives a full report of the arrival of the privateer Jeff Davis in that port. She mounted five guns and had sixty men on board. The men were in want of provisions, but they were being allowed to land, the privateer was compelled to go in need the twenty-four hours' limitation of the Queen of Spain. The Captain General sent the war steamer Hernando to the harbor to look after the Jeff Davis, and, as well as to watch her subsequent movements. The Jeff Davis had landed her men, her guns and prizes, and was then about to land the Baltimore brig Frances Jane and given to her commander a formidable-looking pronunciamento.

BALL AT LONG BRANCH.

The boarders at the various hotels at Long Branch, in conjunction with some of the patriotic citizens of New York, gave a ball at the Stockton House, on Thursday evening, in honor of Mrs. Frederick Law Olmsted. It was a most gratifying one to all concerned. During the afternoon and evening, all the most pleasant exercise was given for the gratification of the distinguished guest, under the supervision of Ex-Governor Newell, the superintendent of the stations in that district. A large number were present from the city.

GEORGIA GOING TO SECEDE AGAIN.

There are very strong indications that Georgia is about to secede from the Southern Confederacy. Governor Brown has ordered all the troops of that State from Virginia, and in a recent proclamation he says there is no probability on the part of the new Government to ignore State rights, and he declares that if the people of the Free and Slave States of Georgia to be fought over for the possession of the State of Georgia.

THE SOUTHERN PRODUCE LOAN.

The Richmond Examiner says that the Treasury Department is already in receipt of volunteers returns from almost every county in the South, pledging 1,000,000 bales of cotton, grain, and money; and the aggregate of these subscriptions will exceed the $50,000,000 required by the Produce loan of dollars, and will doubtless be swelled to fifty or sixty millions. Subscriptions with all the lists are brought in, and the canvass is fully completed.

PRIVATEERING AT CHARLESTON.

The Charleston Courier again advertises there for sale in the privateer schooner Beauregard. There is an abundance of provisions on board of the vessel yet in the harbor. Attention alone there are the steamships Nashville, 1250 tons; the Gordon, 1200 tons; and the Orizaba, 900 tons; ships Mendenhall, 1094 tons; and John Bassett, 700 tons; bark Eleanor, 400 tons; and brigs Emma Eyre, 196 tons; and Louise, 175 tons.

THE NEW ORLEANS BATTERING-RAM.

The New Orleans battering-ram, which is to destroy the blockading squadron at the mouth of the Mississippi, and all the other means of necessary, was launched on the 14th ult. The "thing" draws twelve feet of water.

PERSONAL.

Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, has been tendered, and has accepted, a position on the staff of General McClellan. The appointment will be a most desirable one, giving the advantages such a position will give him as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

A lady Richmond correspondent of the Mobile News says that the health of Mrs. Jefferson Davis is not improved. Of Mrs. Jefferson Davis, says: "While here, Mrs. Davis has received considerable attention, is very popular, and, as it was etiquette, we did ourselves the honor of calling upon her. She is a lady of fine sense, and is exceedingly intelligent and sprightly talker; and, while she did not assume the mantle, she is peculiarly fitted to do honor to our Executive mansion."

Mrs. Sue A. Carter Foster, of Murfreesboro, North Carolina, the wife of Attorney Henry Foster, applied for a divorce, on the ground that her husband is an abolitionist. Judge Manning, of the Circuit Court of Rutherford county, has done to think seriously of the Southern Rebellion, and he signified his readiness to grant the divorce. The other day, remarking on Governor Brown's (Georgia) proclamation against the military forces of the Free States, that it embodied words which came from many quarters, and that the whole six can not be put together, from which Brown foreshadow

The Ohio Legislature decided last week to volunteer for the war, and to go out under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Stager. It is highly probable that Captain McClellan Meagher will accompany them.

Colonel Forney, the editor of the Louisville Journal, is about to receive a handsome testimonial from the friends of Lincoln's administration, and from all parts of the city. The bold and fearless position taken by Mr. Prentice, in defence of the Union, against the enemies of it in the South, has been the cause of much gratulation at the North, and nowhere more than in New York.

The Richmond papers say that Mrs. Henaldegen, "one of the children of the late Professor Wm. Wirt's staff, has arrived in that city from New York. They also state that at Mrs. Wm. Wirt's residence, by the Capitol square, she "managed to get through with over thirty pounds of quinine, five revolvers, and a guitratic battery." Smart lady!

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

HOSTILITY OF THE ENGLISH TO THE UNITED STATES.

DATES from Europe to the 10th of August state that the London press was still engaged in the discussion of the late American question. The Globe denies that Admiral Milne had reported on the subject of the blockade of the Southern ports, and asserts that no official notice on that subject had been received by the Government. The London Times in a leading article and an editorial comments its apprehension of the financial ability of the Government of Washington to carry on the war. Mr. Russell has wandered another letter to that journal, which is spoken of in unmeasured terms by the London Times.

BRITISH OPINION ON OUR WAR.

The London Times says that the 20th instant and the American cause of the North even take pleasure in the sensation caused by their recent victory at Bull Run. Another letter from Mr. Russell says, he having acquired further information regarding the battle, confirms his former statements. There was not a buoyant change made by the Federal infantry during the fight; there was not a single order made by the Confederate cavalry upon any regiment of the army until they fled. There was not a break in the ranks of the enemy between any regiments; there was not a battery dragged out of action by the Federals; there were no masked batteries in play to the Confederates; there was no ambuscade of any kind. The Federals struggled up the hill unchecked by one battalion supported three saddles among a body of horse, who were stationed at some distance for the purpose of preventing the retreating being pell-mell, and, when they did retire, they did not fly, or even run, but walked.

FRANCE.

THE QUARREL WITH THE POPE.

BRIGADIER GENERAL FRANZ SIEGEL.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST IN THE WEST.]

BRIG.-GENERAL FRANZ SIEGEL.

WE publish herewith a portrait of this now famous General, from a sketch by one of our artists in the West. General Siegel was born in 1824, at Baden, in Germany, and was educated at the Military School of Carlsruhe. In 1847 he held the rank of Chief Adjutant, and was universally allowed to be one of the most promising officers, and perhaps the best artillerist in Germany. When the revolution broke out in 1848, he joined it at once, and lost his commission in consequence. He obtained service, however, among the revolutionists, and soon rose to the chief command of their armies. When the reaction took place, the sovereigns raised an overwhelming force to crush out Siegel. He fought them with 30,000 men against 80,000, and, more fortunate than at Springfield, he brought off every one of his guns. Peace soon left the General without an army, and he emigrated shortly afterward to this country. Here he entered the academy of a Monsieur Dulen, whose daughter he afterward married. A few years since he was chosen professor in a college at St. Louis, where he taught among other things the art of war to his pupils. When the rebellion broke out, General Siegel was one of the first of the gallant Germans of Missouri who rallied in support of the Government. He, and Blair, and Boernstein commanded the first three regiments of Volunteers raised at St. Louis. He subsequently co-operated, with vigor and ability, with the late lamented Lyon, and was with him up to the eve of the battle of Springfield. After the death of Lyon, General Siegel commanded our army, and led the retreat to Rolla, where he was at latest advices. General Siegel is a man of whom much is expected. If General M'Culloch is attempting any rash proceedings in his vicinity, General Siegel will probably give a good account of him.

AMONG THE ARABS.

THE Souvenirs Intimes d'un Vieux Chasseur d'Afrique, by M. Antoine Gandon, combine solid information with entertaining narrative. They are truthful and vivid military reminiscences of an epoch—the settlement of French rule in Algeria—which is passing fast from contemporary news into the domain of history. Nearly thirty years—a generation—have slipped away since the great Arab chief submitted to the sway of the conqueror. But besides their historic value, the Souvenirs possess a simple, serious, and sympathetic charm of their own. We have had, M. Paul d'Ivoi observes, plenty of memoirs of courts, and to spare. Here we are offered the memoirs of a nation; for the soldier who has established and who still holds Algeria is more than a mere soldier: he is in the peasant son of the energetic country who has planted her vines, in the name of agriculture and civilization, on an uncultivated and savage land. This soldier, a rustic in endurance, a cavalier at heart, a hero and a martyr when occasion requires, is painted by the Chasseur d'Afrique with all the affectionate accuracy we should bestow on the portrait of a bosom friend.

That which gives to old African soldiers their peculiar physiognomy is not their complexion bronzed by the sun, but the intelligence which illumines their countenance whenever there is danger to be foreseen or annoyance to be avoided. Warfare with the Bedouins is a rude school. Inquires of those who wage it not only the courage indispensable to every good soldier, but also an individual discipline enabling them to combine skill and cunning with the boldest marauders and the most finished thieves in the world. Few will believe that Arabs have penetrated, during the night, into the midst of an army of ten thousand men, and have there stolen horses that were guarded and watched by hundreds of sentinels. As the intelligent tricks did not always succeed, and a culprit was occasionally caught in the fact, it afforded the means of ascertaining their modes of proceeding.

The Arab who is projecting a master-stroke, and intends selecting the handsomest out of a dozen fine steeds, usually comes in the course of the day to inspect the animals, although he is obliged to make his preliminary observations from a distance—often from a very considerable distance, it may be. The mirrors, it is said, are allowed to penetrate easily into the middle of an encampment; but they are not the always people of the neighborhood who form part of the regular troops, such as camel-drivers, herdsmen, and pack-horse leaders, who have been hired for the transport of provisions. In the latter case, the Arab will be mistaken for one of the men employed; he will take good care that no one shall see him enter.

His choice made, the rogue disappears till night. In order to return to the middle of the bivouac he habitually divests himself of every item of clothing, and wears no other arm than a well-sharpened knife in a leather sheaf slung with a strap across his body. He is also provided with a long rope of cocoa fiber, which is twisted round his head like a turban. As soon as he has passed the first sentries the thief is metamorphosed into a serpent; he crawls on continually, without hurry, without noise, without any perceptible rustling. With his eyes fixed off the living objects whom he wishes to avoid, he stops short if he perceives that the sentinels the slightest sign that their attention has been attracted. He will take three hours, if need be, to clear a distance of a hundred yards.

At last he gets near the coveted object, the horse intended to be stolen. There his movements are more deliberate than ever, in order not to frighten the animal, who must not be allowed, for several minutes, to perceive any but very natural motions capable of deceiving the eye of the most vigilant sentinel. At first he cuts the shackles with which the horse's hinder feet are tied together, he fastens his rope to one of the horse's feet, and retires, watching all the while, as far as the length of the rope allows him. The distance between himself and the animal then varies from twelve to fifteen feet. If, during these preparations, the horsekeepers appear to have the slightest suspicion, the thief again remains motionless; the horse remaining quiet and the sentinels resuming their former tranquillity, the process of stealing is continued.

The Arab slightly pulls the rope; solicited by this mute appeal, the horse rises and sets a step; but the movement is so perfectly similar to that which the animal is in the habit of making when he wants to reach a wisp of hay or a blade of grass a little way off, that he who is fond of his horse, that, by night, nine sentinels out of ten would be deceived. The thief lays down at full length, and the horse follows him. As he has carefully studied the ground, he will continue it while no obstacle interposes, but generally, once out of the immediate reach of the man whose duty is to keep special watch over the stolen horse, he leaps on the animal's back and sets off at full gallop, well knowing that gunshots by night are only dangerous for the comrades of those who fire them. Sometimes the thief carries a protective with leaves, but he will commit no such foolish act in a country denuded of shrubs and bushes. On naked ground he is as naked as a worm, in a bushy country he transforms himself into a living bush; in short, he assimilates his person to the aspect of the country he is traversing.

From the general to the private soldier every one was so liable to these misadventures that few held in: the appearance of their neighbors. Nobody could boast of being safe from these audacious thefts, in spite of every imaginable precaution. If you made guess of your comrade who had lost his calf, you might find, next morning, that you had been robbed of your cow.

At that date the army was not yet provided with those little tents, so convenient and so easy to carry, which are now in fashion. They slept, then, with the sky for their roof; the foot-soldier, with a modest camp coverlet; the luckier horseman, sheltered by his immense cloak and the vast blanket which, in the light cavalry, was placed, folded into sixteen, between the saddle and the horse's back. The police-station, placed as it is in the centre of the bivouac, guarded by the sentinels of its own regiment, and by all those of the brigade, as one ought, one would think, to have nothing to fear from thieves. Nevertheless, a station of this kind was victimized by some thieves of the province of Tlemcen one splendid summer's night of 1836.

The police-station in question, with the exception of the sentinels, was deserted. One man, including the quarter-master of the platoon, was profiting by the calmness of the atmosphere and the mildness of the temperature, had thrown off nearly all his clothing, in order to enjoy complete repose. Rolled up in a warm blanket, which itself was encased with a thick cloak, with his head reposing on a sack of barley, beneath which he had placed his clothes, the brave sous-officier was dreaming, perhaps, that he was taking off one of the army's flags—the customary dream of all Chasseurs d'Afrique in Abd-el-Kader's time—when the trumpets of the regiment sounded the sar-gierring summons to awake.

"Already!" said the happy sleeper, with a yawn. "Are we never to enjoy twenty-four hours of quiet? Sentinel!"

"Here, quarter-master. Do you want any thing?"

"Yes; hand me my pantaloons and my boots, that I may dress myself behind the curtains. You will find them under the head of my bed."

The sentinel lifted the sack, and announced, "Neither pantaloons nor boots do I see there."

"What do you mean? Look about you now. I say, you there, you follows of the guard, get up a little quicker than that. What have you done with my boots?"

"Your boots?" replied a chasseur, who had followed his quarter-master's example in relieving his feet of their cangue (finding the night, he "I can't find my own!"

"Fortunately I only took off my braces," muttered the brigadier, who sought in vain for the two leather straps so important.

"In that case, we had best say no more about it," the quarter-master replied, with a laugh. "When we were fast asleep, some Bedouin thief has paid us a visit. We must conceal the matter, if possible; only you will allow me to observe that you have all slept on guard, like so many logs of wood, be it said without offending you."

As usual, the chasseurs made oath that they had watched conscientiously; but the mischief was done, and they had now only to remedy it. Some comrades, who were fortunately supplied with a change, helped to furnish the missing articles; and the only incident that had any further revenge on his superior than to remark, "You see, lieutenant, that every body is liable to these accidents—even you." And, indeed, the officer and the parties robbed are not the more villainous soldiers for that."

Captain Cavaignac—as he then was—who was exceedingly beloved by his men, possessed a magical influence over all, which were confided to the care of a Chasseur d'Afrique. Some malefactors took them to graze in the orchards which extend around the ramparts of Méchoun, taking good care also to keep watch over the colt which their horses had been witness of the theft. On awaking, the poor fellow in charge could not believe his eyes. In vain he searched the environs, in vain he interrogated the sentinels, who had not lost sight of the horse for a moment. They had not heard the slightest noise; and they considered the colt's sudden appearance so extraordinary a fact that they asserted that nothing in the world would have forgotten to bring the young one in the morning to its mother. The chasseur, convinced of the contrary, as well as of the uselessness of any further search, led back the mare to Méchoun, and, with tears in his eyes, related his misadventure to Captain Cavaignac.

"They have contrived to steal my colt, Captain, but I assure you it was no fault of mine. What I mean to catch the thief, I give you my word for it."

"I forbid you to go and meet your death for the sake of a wretched colt which is but just recovered," replied the Captain. "One day or other, satisfied as we are, we might be obliged to kill and eat it; and I had rather eat it than that your little creature should be alive and well with the Arabs who dwell with us."

"You tell me that, Captain, in order not to vex me; but I can see very well that you are vexed about it yourself. Sacre—! It shall never be said that a chief of a Bedouin—I have a plan of my own—"

In vain did the Captain endeavor to console the disconsolate chasseur; who promised, it is true, not to rush into danger, but who would not swear to give up the pursuit of the robber.

"Let me see," said our chasseur, as he returned to the stable, which was by no means the worst lodging in Méchoun, "how I must set about to catch my thief. If I go pittering and pitying to my comrades, they will all of them want to come with me, although I was the only one to fall asleep, like the great big imbecile that I was. I must undertake the expedition alone. The Bedouin has the colt: he will be wanting the mother. Good; I, in my turn, will have a meeting tête-à-tête."

The day after the colt had been so cleverly conjured away, the chasseur led the mare, as usual, to grass, and lay down in the shade of the olive-trees, exactly as he had done the day before. The day nothing new occurred. Next day a repetition of the same occurrences. On the third day things took quite a different turn.

While the sentinels, believing their comrade asleep as usual, were playing-place, gave a look now and then at the mare who was fastened with a long rope to a stake fixed in the ground, an Arab, almost naked, jumped on the animal's back, after cutting the rope round its foot. But, at the same instant, another individual, just as lightly clad as the former, rolling over on the rubber, dashed him to the ground, and literally strangled him, without cord or lasso, with the help of nothing but his hands. The chasseur had had perfectly succeeded. For three days, after pretending to fall asleep beneath his favorite olive-tree, he had crawled out of the camp, and had remained on the spot to deceive the thief, and then, creeping in another direction, had crouched in a hole dug close to the mare, who served to decoy the ravisher of the colt.

GENERAL BEN M'CULLOCH.

GENERAL BEN M'CULLOCH, whose portrait we publish on page 565, is now the commander of the rebel forces in Southwestern Missouri. He is a Tennesseean by birth, having first seen the light in Rutherford county, Tennessee, in 1814. His father served as an officer in General Jackson's army. The son was always a wild, daring lad; most of his youth was spent in hunting bears and other wild animals. Having arrived at the age of manhood, he took to a trapper's life, and found himself in Texas when the war broke out between that State and Mexico. He served under General Houston, and commanded a gun at the battle of San Jacinto. After the battle he went forward he was employed by the Government in surveying lands and resisting Indian forays. At the outbreak of the Mexican war he raised a company in Texas, and joined General Taylor's army after the battles of Resaca de la Palma and Palo Alto: previous to the battle of Buena Vista he distinguished himself as a scout. He was subsequently attached to General Scott's army, which he accompanied to the City of Mexico. In Col. Jack Hays's regiment Mr. M'Culloch, like the bulk of the rebel leaders, has been living on the Government he is now in arms endeavoring to destroy. Some years ago he served as United States Marshal in Texas—one of poor Pierce's appointments. Mr. Buchanan, whose affinity for traitors was conspicuous, made him Peace Commissioner to Utah—a post he was about as well qualified to fill as Mr. Elihu Burritt would be to command an army. M'Culloch then prepared in Virginia in January last, and was said to be at the head of a body of rebels who were to seize the capital of the State of Missouri, and by the wisest heads of the rebellion, and sent off to the West. His victory at Springfield will probably bring him into direct collision with General Fremont.

LIFE AMONG THE REBELS.

WE devote page 561 to an illustration of a scene which will be familiar to all the volunteers who have left encampments in Virginia. It represents A FEMALE SECESSIONIST PLANTING HER COLORS in the face of our troops. This has been an everyday incident at Ballin's since ever since the 21st April. The men dare not insult the troops, but the women of Baltimore presume upon their sex, and are accordingly guilty of insults not toys with.

"Hurrah for Jeff Davis!" "How about Bull Run?" "Why don't you go home?"—vastly to the amusement of the crowd.

Another picture on page 565, from a sketch by the artist in Virginia, we are indebted for so many life-like sketches of the camps, represents THE KILL OF THE SPOTSWOOD HOUSE at Richmond, Virginia, which is now the officers most congregate. It is a good spot to hear about Secessionists and abolitionists, and, judging from the reports of prisoners, the Secessionists have boats the performance of "our army in Flanders" all to nothing.

Again, on page 569 we give a picture of THE OLD MARKET-HOUSE AT WINCHESTER, VIRGINIA, which, our correspondent says, now presents a very animated appearance. It is the head-quarters of Gen. Johnston and the turnpike by the which, our correspondent says, now presents a very animated appearance. It is the head-quarters of Gen. Johnston and the turnpike by the which there are generally from 6000 to 8000 men which who are kept constantly at work drilling. Each regiment spends a few weeks, and is then replaced by another, and after a fortnight's furlough returns to Winchester. Late rumors, which need confirmation, however, assert that General Banks is in possession of Winchester.

With regard to the sketch of the hotel at Centreville, and Alexandria, which is the resort when not fifty people in the United States outside of Virginia had ever heard of the place. Centreville was once a place of some importance, having kept up by the stage travel on the old Warrington turnpike; but since the opening of the Orange and Alexandria railroad the turnpike has gone down, and Centerville has been compelled to follow it. Our artist says he stopped there one night, and, though quartered in the best chamber in the hotel, had to sleep with his head on a saddle, there being no bolsters or pillows in the house. The right name of the place is Centreville, not Centreville, as the maps have it.

The two views on the Upper Potomac, which are published on the same page, are places frequently mentioned in the newspapers. The bridge at Berlin was destroyed by the Confederates in June last; their pickets now hold one end of it, while the United States troops occupy the other. On the top of a high rock on the London heights the Secessionists formerly had a battery of rifled cannon, for the purposes of commanding the approach to Harper's Ferry, but when Johnson left the place General Banks's column says:

HEAD-QUARTERS, SANDY HOOK, MD.

Yesterday evening the freight train from Baltimore, arriving here about four o'clock, brought intelligence that a fight was progressing at Berlin. Other rumors were also circulated that several companies of the Confederates were approaching the river opposite Berlin from Leesburville. This and other information induced a battery of artillery, in effect that Point of Rocks was threatened by a strong Confederate force, and ordered the Connecticut Fifth Colonel Geary's regiment and the Rhode Island battery to Point of Rocks.

About one o'clock last night a blue rocket was thrown up by the Confederates in the rear of London heights, about two miles from our camp, which was probably a signal that our reinforcements were moving down the river.

An officer from Berlin the morning states that the force of last night consisted of about twenty-five Confederates reconnoitring the river and firing a volley into our pickets-guard on the abutment of the burned bridge, and also into the town of Berlin. Major Ledlie, of the 18th New York regiment, at once dispatched a battalion of his regiment to the aid of the pickets. The enemy, however, had disappeared. No one on our side was killed or severely wounded, nor is it known that the enemy suffered any loss.

The same authority asserts that the picket-guard at Berlin have for some days past been in the habit of firing at the Confederate pickets, separated between the shore and Lovettsville, and that the latter have been in the habit of late of shots five hundred cavalry, supported probably by a considerable infantry force.

PRINCE NAPOLEON AND HIS WIFE.

WE publish on page 573 new portraits of PRINCE NAPOLEON AND HIS WIFE, THE PRINCESS CLOTILDE, from a photograph from Fredericks. They are probably the best likenesses in existence of our distinguished visitor, and, considering the political complications grow out of the visit of the Princess, as seems not unlikely—they will possess historic interest.

MERCHANT VESSELS FOR THE NAVY.

WE devote page 564 to illustrations of vessels recently purchased by the Navy Department, and now in process of conversion into men-of-war. Among others the steamers James River, Aquatic, and Florida, each 1400 or 1500 tons, and the propeller Star of the South, all of which are being refitted at the yard of Webb & Bell; and the Harriet Lane, 700 tons; Brazelero, 600 tons; Gem of the Seas, 400 tons; and Resolute, 400 tons, all of which are at Westervelt's yard in Jersey City. Most Westervelt's are represented in our picture. The changes which are being made in these vessels are very thorough. Their upper decks are being cut away, and all ornament removed. Additional knees and timbers are being put to give strength, and extra support is given to that portion of the decks where the guns will stand. The bulwarks are bored for guns, and Resolute for port-holes. Below, the state-rooms and partitions are taken out, quarters provided for several hundred sailors, and a dozen or more guns, in true man-of-war fashion; the space for coal and engines increased, it being intended that the vessels may remain 100 days at sea. The engines are taken out and replaced by man-of-war ladders. Altogether the transformation is complete, and in the course of a few weeks the fleet will be ready for sea in a very creditable shape.

FORT LAFAYETTE.

WE publish on page 568 an illustration of FORT LAFAYETTE, in the harbor of New York, which is the present destination of the traitors who have been arrested by the General Government. Fort Lafayette is a quadrangular work, detached, standing on a shoal about an acre from the shore of Long Island. It has guns on every face, a row in barbette, and three rows in casemate. It is exactly in the Narrows, and, with Fort Hamilton on Long Island and Fort Tompkins opposite, constitutes the main defense of the principal entry to our harbor. It is usually garrisoned by part of a regiment, and when the ladies have now made way for traitors. Fort Lafayette now contains the Police Commissioners and Baltimore, Mr. Pierce Butler, Mr. Faulkner, and several other gentlemen who, in the present crisis, are much safer and more useful there than they would be at large. Fort Lafayette is not the Fort the American Bastile. Some of these sympathizers may be released before very long.

With regard to the treatment of the prisoners now in Fort Lafayette, the Herald reporter says:

The prisoners have never at any time been prohibited from getting whatever newspapers they desired, and some were more indignant than they at the falsehoods that had been published about them. In all respects the State prisoners are well treated. They are as comfortably lodged as is consistent with the safety of the fort and the Government at the own expense, and with the best material that the market affords. They have had any one, or all of them at liberty to order any luxury in the shape of food they have a mind for. Some have had wines from New York at their own expense. In a word, it has not been forgotten that traitors though they may prove to be when placed on their trial, they, or most of them, occupied the position of gentlemen, and their treatment is in all respects conformable with that position as far as is compatible with their position on the right side of the granite walls of Fort Lafayette.

The principal among these are, Charles Howard, William Gilchell, Charles Hinks, John Davis, Alexander Hamilton, Jr., Charles Smith, Robert Mill, Thomas A. Scott, Charles Kopperus, Pierce Butler, Louis De Bibian, Samuel Atlen, Colonels Charles M. Tyler, J. G. Barnes,

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

Ashleigh be a perpetual patient. The sanitary resources of youth are incalculable. And—"

"Let me stop you; I can not argue against a physician in love! I will give up that point in dispute, remaining convinced that there is a something in Lilian's constitution which will perplex, torment, and baffle you. It was so with her father, whom she resembles in face and in character. He showed no symptoms of any grave malady. His outward form was like Lilian's, a model of symmetry, except in this, that, like hers, it was too exquisitely delicate; but, when seemingly in the perfect flow of health, at any slight jar on the nerves he would become alarmingly ill. I was sure that he would die young, and he did so."

"Y, but Mrs. Ashleigh said that his death was from brain-fever, brought on by over-study. Women never so fatigue the brain. I never had a female patient who died of purely mental exertion."

"O purely mental exertion, no; but of heart emotion, many female patients, perhaps? Oh, you own that; I know nothing about nerves. But I suppose that, whether they are the brain or the heart, the result to life is much the same if the nerves be too finely strung for life's daily wear and tear. And this is what I mean, when I say you and Lilian will not suit. As yet, she is a mere child; her nature undeveloped, and her affections, therefore, small. You might suppose that you won her heart; she might believe that she gave it to you, and both be deceived. If fairies nowadays condescended to exchange their offspring with those of mortals, and if the popular tradition did not represent a fairy changeling as an ugly peevish creature, with none of the grace of its parents, I should be half inclined to suspect that Lilian was one of the elfin people. She never seems at home on earth; and I do not think she will ever be contented with a humdrum earthly lot. Now I have told you why I do not think she will wed you. I must leave it to yourself to conjecture how far you would suit her. I say this in due season, while you may yet set a guard upon impulse; while you may yet watch, and weigh, and meditate; and from this moment on that subject I say no more. I lend advice, but I never throw it away."

She came here to a dead pause, and began putting on her bonnet with a hand as lazy as the table beside her. I was a little chilled by her words, and yet more by the blunt, shrewd, cold look and manner which were the effect of their delivery. But the chill melted away on the sudden glow of my heart when she again turned toward me and said gayly:

"Of course you guess, from these preliminary cautions, that you are going into danger? Mrs. Ashleigh wishes to consult you about Lilian, and I propose to take you to her house."

"Oh, my friend, my dear friend, how can I ever repay you?" I said, in a low tone, and the white firm hand, and lifted it to my lips.

She drew it somewhat hastily away, and laying it gently on her bonnet-strings, said, in a voice, "Poor Allen, how little the world knows either of us! But how little, perhaps, do we know ourselves. Have you ever seen Mrs. Ashleigh? That is right; we must put down Dr. Jones publicly and in all our state."

In the carriage Mrs. Poynte told me the purport of that conversation with Mrs. Ashleigh to which I owed my reintroduction to Abbots' House. It seems that Mrs. Ashleigh had called early the morning after my first visit; had evinced much discomposure on hearing that I had been introduced to Lilian, and had made a curious treatment of Dr. Lloyd, whom, as distantly related to himself, and the (Mr. Vigors) distantly connected with Lilian's family, he had endeavored to fasten upon his listener as one of her husband's family, whose quarrel she was bound in honor to take up. She spoke of me as an infidel "tainted with French doctrines," and as a practitioner rash and presumptuous, showing in his own freedom from suspicion and rashness by flatly deciding that my opinion must be wrong. Previous to Mrs. Ashleigh's migration to Surrey, Mr. Vigors had interested her in the pretended phenomena of mesmerism. He had consulted one of poor Dr. Lloyd's favorite clairvoyants as to Lilian's health, and the clairvoyant had declared her to be constitutionally predisposed to consumption. Mr. Vigors persuaded Mrs. Ashleigh to come at once with him and see this clairvoyant herself, armed with a lock of Lilian's hair and a letter she had worn, as the media of mesmeric rapport.

The clairvoyant, one of those I had publicly denounced as an impostor, naturally enough denounced me in return. On being asked solemnly by Mr. Vigors "to look at Dr. Fenwick and say if his influence would be beneficial to the subject" (the sibyl had become violently agitated), said that, "when she looked at us together, we were enveloped in a black cloud; that this portended affliction and sinister consequences; that our rapport was antagonistic." Mr. Vigors then told her to dismiss my image, and conjure up that of Dr. Jones. Therewith the somnambule became more tranquil, and said, "Dr. Jones would do well if he could be guided by higher lights than his own skill, and consult herself daily as to the proper remedies. The best remedy of all would be mesmerism." But since Dr. Lloyd's death she did not know of a mesmerist, sufficiently gifted, in affinity with the patient." To this, she impressed, and ever Mrs. Ashleigh, who returned in haste, summoned Dr. Jones, and dismissed myself.

"I could not have conceived Mrs. Ashleigh to be so utterly wanting in common sense," said I.

"She talked rationally enough when I saw her."

"She has common sense in general, and plenty of the sense most common," answered Mrs. Poynte. "But she is easily led and easily frightened wherever her affections are concerned, and therefore just as easily as she had been persuaded by Mr. Vigors and terrified by the somnambule, I persuaded her against the one, and terrified her against the other. I had positive experience on my side, since it was clear that Lilian had been gutting rapidly worse under Dr. Jones's care. The main objections I had to encounter in inducing her to consult you again were, first, in Mrs. Ashleigh's reluctance to disobige Mr. Vigors, as a friend and connection of Lilian's father; and, secondly, a sentiment of shame in entertaining your opinion after having treated you with so little respect. Both these difficulties I took on myself. I bring you to her house, and, on leaving it, I shall go on to Mr. Vigors, and tell him what is done is my doing, and not to be undone by him; so that matter is settled. Lilian's health is now out of the question. I should not suffer Mr. Vigors to reintroduce all these mummeries of clairvoyance and mesmerism into the quietude of the Hill. I did not demolish a man I really liked in Dr. Lloyd, to set up a Dr. Jones, whom I despise, in his stead. Clairvoyance, on Ashby Hill, indeed! I saw enough of it before."

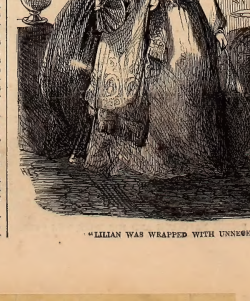
"True; your strong intellect detected at once the absurdity of the whole pretense—the falsity of mesmerism—the impossibility of clairvoyance."

"No, my strong intellect did nothing of the kind. I do not know whether mesmerism be false or clairvoyance impossible; and I don't wish to know. All I do know is, that I saw the Hill in great danger; young ladies allowing themselves to be put to sleep by gentlemen, and pretending they had no will of their own against such fascination! Improper and shocking! And Miss Brabazon beginning to prophesy, and Mrs. Leopold Smythe questioning her maid (whom Dr. Lloyd declared to be highly gifted) as to all the secrets of her friends. When I saw this, I said, 'The Hill is being demoralized; the Hill is making itself ridiculous; the Hill must be saved!' I remonstrated with Dr. Lloyd, as a friend; he remained obdurate. I annihilated him as an enemy, not to me, but to the State. I slew my best lover for the good of Rome. Now you know why I took your part; not because I have any opinion one way or the other as to the truth or falsehood of what Dr. Lloyd asserted; but I have a strong opinion that whether they be true or false, his notions were those which are not to be allowed on the Hill. And so, Allen Fenwick, that matter was settled."

Perhaps at another time I might have felt some little humiliation at learn so cynically that I had been guided by the influence of this great potentate, not from love of truth, but as an instrument of policy; and I might have owned to some twinge of conscience in having assisted to sacrifice a seeker after science—misled, no doubt, but preferring his independent belief to his worldly interest—and sacrifice him to those deities with whom science is ever at war—the Prejudices of a Clique sanctified into the Proprieties of the World. But at that moment the words I heard made no perceptible impression on my mind. The chimneys of Abbots' House were visible above the evergreens and lilacs: another moment, and the carriage stopped at the door.

CHAPTER XIV.

MRS. ASHLEIGH received us in the dining-room. Her manner to me, at first, was a little confused and shy. But my companion soon communicated something of her own happy ease to her gentler friend. After a short conversation we all three went to Lilian, who was in a little room on the ground-floor, fitted up as her study. I was glad to perceive that my interdict of the death-chamber had been respected.



"LILIAN WAS WRAPPED WITH UNNECESSARY CARE," ETC.

She reclined on a sofa near the window, which was, however, jealously closed: the light of the bright May-day obscured by blinds and curtains; a large fire on the hearth; the air of the room that of a hot-house—the ignorant, insensible, exploded system of nursing into consumption those who are confined on suspicion of it. She did not heed me as we entered noiselessly, her eyes were drooped languidly on the dull floor, and with difficulty I suppressed the exclamation that rose to my lips on seeing her. She seemed within the last few days so changed, and on the aspect of the countenance there was so profound a melancholy. But as she slowly turned at the sound of our footsteps, and her eyes were lighted up with a child's innocent playful smile. No, I had not been mistaken! That was no lymphatic nerveless temperament on which consumption fastens as its lawful prey—here there was no hectic pulse, no hurried waste of the vital flame. Quietly and gently I made my observations, addressed my questions, applied my stethoscope; and when I turned my face toward her mother's anxious, eager eyes, that face spoke for me, for her mother sprang forward, clasped my hand, and said, through her struggling tears,

"You smile! You see nothing to fear?"

"Fear—no, indeed! You will soon be again yourself, Miss Ashleigh, will you not?"

"Yes," she said, with her sweet laugh, "I shall be well now very soon. But may I not have the window open? may I not go into the garden? I so long for open air"

"No, no, darling," exclaimed Mrs. Ashleigh, "not while the east winds last. Dr. Jones said on no account. On no account, Dr. Fenwick, eh?"

"Will you take my arm, Miss Ashleigh, and walk about the room?" said I. "We will then see how far we may rebel against Dr. Jones."

She rose with some little effort, but there was no cough. At first her step was feeble, but became lighter and more elastic after a few moments.

"Let her come out," said I to Mrs. Ashleigh. "The wind is not in the east and while we are out, lower to the last bar it will fit for Christmas."

"But—"

"Ah, no buts. He is a poor doctor who is not a stern despot."

So the straw hat and mantle were sent for. Lilian was wrapped with unnecessary care, and we all went forth into the garden. Involuntarily we took the way to the Monk's Well, and at every step Lilian seemed to revive under the fresh air and temperate sun. We paused by the well.

"You do not feel fatigued, Miss Ashleigh?"

"No."

"But your face seems changed. It is grown sadder."

"Not sadder."

"Sadder than when I first saw it—saw it when you were seated here!" I said this in a whisper. I felt her hand tremble as it lay on my arm.

"You saw me seated here!"

"Yes. I will tell you how some day."

Lilian lifted her eyes to mine, and there was in them that same surprise which I had noticed on my first visit—a surprise that perplexed me, blended with no displeasure, but yet with a something of vague alarm.

We soon returned to the house.

Mrs. Ashleigh made me a sign to follow her into the drawing-room, leaving Mrs. Poyntz with Lilian.

"Well?" said she, tremblingly.

"Permit me to see Dr. Jones's prescriptions. Thank you. And I thought so. My dear Madam, the mistake here has been in depressing nature instead of strengthening; in narcotics instead of stimulants. The main stimulants which leave no reaction are air and light. Promise me that I may have my own way for a week: that all I recommend will be implicitly heeded?"

"I promise. But that could you noticed it?"

"Yes. The nervous system is terribly lowered, and nervous exhaustion is a strange imposter—it imitates all manner of complaints with which it has no connection. The cough will soon disappear! But pardon my question. Mrs. Poyntz tells me that you confess a clairvoyant about your daughter. Does Miss Ashleigh know that you did so?"

"No, I did not tell her."

"I am glad of that. And pray, for Heaven's sake, guard her against all that may—her thinking on such subjects. Above all, guard her against concentring attention on any malady that your fears or curiosity ascribe to her. It is among the phenomena of our organization that you can not closely rivet your conscious ness on any part of the frame, however healthy, but it will soon begin to exhibit morbid sensibility. Try to fix all your attention on your little finger for half an hour, and before the half hour is over the little finger will be uneasy, probably even painful. How serious, then, is the danger of a young girl at the age in which imagination is most active, most intense, if you force upon her a belief that she is in danger of a mortal disease! It is a peculiarity of youth to brood over the thought of early death much more resignedly, much more complacently, than we do in mature years. Impress on a young imaginative girl, as free from pulmonary tendencies as you and I are, the conviction that she must fade away into the grave, and though she may not actually die of consumption, you instill slow poison into her system. Hope is the natural element of youth. You impoverish nourishment where you discharge hope. As soon as this temporary illness is over, reject for your daughter the melancholy care which seems to her own mind to mark her out from others of her age. Rear her for the air—which is the kindest life—to sleep with open windows; to be out at sunrise. Nature will do more for her than all our drugs can do. You have been hitherto her mother, now trust to her."

Here Mrs. Poyntz joined us, and having, while I had been speaking, written my prescription and answered several injunctions, I closed my advice with an appeal to that powerful protectress.

"This, my dear Madam, is a case in which the need your aid, and I ask it. Miss Ashleigh should not be left with no other companion than her mother. A change of faces is often as salutary as a change of air. If you could devote an hour or two this very evening to sit with Miss Ashleigh, talk to her with your usual easy cheerfulness, and—"

"Anne," interrupted Mrs. Poyntz, "I will come and sit with you at half-past seven, and bring my knitting; and perhaps, if you ask him, Dr. Fenwick will come too! He can be tolerably entertaining when he likes it."

"It is too great a tax on his kindness, I fear," said Mrs. Ashleigh. "But," she added cordially, "I shall be grateful indeed if he would spare us an hour of his time."

I murmured an assent, which I endeavored to make not too joyous.

"So that matter is settled," said Mrs. Poyntz; "and now I shall go to Mr. Vigors and prevent his further intrusion."

"Oh! but, Margaret, pray don't offend him; a connection of my poor dear Gilbert's. And so tetchy! I am sure I do not know how you'll manage to—"

"To get rid of him? Never fear. As I manage every thing and every body," said Mrs. Poyntz, bluntly. So she kissed her friend on the forehead, gave me a gracious nod, and declining the offer of my carriage, walked with her usual brisk, decided tread down the short path toward the town.

Mrs. Ashleigh timidly approached me, and again the furtive hand bashfully insinuating the hateful fee!

"Stay," said I; "this is a case which needs the most constant watching. I wish to call so often that I should seem the most greedy of doctors if my visits were to be computed at guineas. Let me be at ease to effect my cure; my pride of science is involved in it. And when among all the young ladies of the Hill you can find me none with a fresher bloom, or a fairer promise of healthful life, than the patient you intrust to my care, why, then the fee and the dismissal. Nay, nay; I must refer you to our friend, Mrs. Poyntz. I am so settled with her before you brought me here to displace Dr. Jones." Therewith I escaped.

CHAPTER XV.

In less than a week Lilian was convalescent; in less than a fortnight she regained her usual health; nay Mrs. Ashleigh declared that she had never known her daughter appear so cheerful and look so well. I had established a familiar intimacy at Ashleigh House; most of my evenings were spent there. As horse exercise formed an important part of my advice, Mrs. Ashleigh had purchased a pretty and quiet horse for her daughter; and, except the weather was very unfavorable, Lilian now rode daily with Colonel Poyntz, who was a notable equestrian, and often accompanied by Miss Jane Poyntz, and other young ladies of the Hill. I was generally relieved from my duties in time to join her as she returned homeward. Thus we made many appointments, openly, frankly, in her mother's presence, she telling me beforehand in what direction excursions had been planned with Colonel Poyntz, and consenting to fall in with the party—if my avocations would permit. At my suggestion, Mrs. Ashleigh now opened her house occasionally for evening tea to the neighboring families. Lilian was thus habituated to the intercourse of young persons of her own age. Dancing and childish round games made the old house gay. And the Hill gratefully acknowledged to Mrs. Poyntz "that the Ashleighs were almost as nice as Poyntzes."

But my happiness was not unchecquered. In thus unselfishly surrounding Lilian with others I felt the anguish of that jealousy which is inseparable from those earlier stages of love—when the lover as yet has won no right to that self-confidence which can only spring from the assurance that he is loved.

In these social réunions I remained aloof from Lilian. I never asked her to dance. Her young admirers whom her beauty and her fortune drew around her; her soft face brightening in the excercise of the dance; the sweet gravity of my profession rather than my fear forbade me to join—and her laugh, so musically subdued, ravishing my ear, and her footfall as light as if the lady were a mockery on my sombre self and my presumptuous dreams. But no, suddenly, shyly, her eyes met mine from the dance, and then she'd steal to the corner in which I sat, as if they missed me, and, meeting my own gaze, their light softened and grew tender, and my pale cheek color on her cheek would deepen, and to her lip there came a smile different from the smile that it shed on others. FLAG-OFFICER STRINGHAM.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY LOOMIS, OF BOSTON.]

BOMBARDMENT OF FORTS HATTERAS AND CLARK BY THE UNITED STATES FLEET, UNDER FLAG-OFFICER STRINGHAM, U.S.N.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE CAPTURE OF HATTERAS FORTS.

We illustrate on pages 584 and 585 the DEPARTURE OF GENERAL BUTLER'S EXPEDITION AGAINST HATTERAS, and on the preceding page we give a View of the BOMBARDMENT, and Portraits of GENERAL BUTLER and COMMODORE STRINGHAM.

The following account of this brilliant affair is from the report of the special reporter of the Herald:

The expedition, consisting of the frigates Minnesota, Commodore Stringham; Wabash, Captain Morris; the gun-boats Pawnee, Captain Rowan; Monticello, Commander Gillis, and the Harriet Lane, Captain Faunce, with the transports Adelaide and George Peabody, conveying troops to the number of about a thousand, left Fortress Monroe last Monday, and reached the unknown fort off Hatteras Inlet, fifteen miles below Chicamacomico, on Tuesday morning, the Minnesota and Wabash coming in in the afternoon, and the Cumberland joining the fleet the same day.

Preparations were immediately made to land the troops on the Hatteras beach, at which time the transports ran near the beach, two miles north of the Inlet, and, covered by the Monticello, Harriet Lane, and Pawnee, the troops were landed men were landed through a heavy surf, under cover of the fire from Lieutenant Crosman's battery of regular artillery, Captain Jardine's company North Elk, and Colonel Weber's regiment of the Twentieth New York, with Colonel Weber and Lieutenant-Colonel Hobo: a detachment of marines from the frigates, under command of Majors Doughty and Shuttleworth, and a detachment of sailors from the Pawnee, under Lieutenant Crosby and Lieut. Smith, R. N., and Jones.

The gun-boats swept the beach and neighboring copse of scrub oaks. All the boats being swamped and hiked in the surf, no more men could be thrown ashore, meanwhile, the Minnesota and Wabash—the latter with the Commodore on board—steamed up to the front of one of the rebel batteries and took their position at long range.

At ten o'clock the Wabash fired the first gun, the twelve-inch shell striking near the battery and bursting with tremendous force. The battery, which was a circular fort with turf and mounting five long thirty-twos, instantly returned fire, the shot falling short. The Monticello and Cumberland immediately opened fire and rained nine and eleven inch shells into and about the fort. The fire was terrific, and soon the battery's responses were few and far between, when the frigates moved further in to get the range to get a new position, when the enemy's fire was most spirited.

No damage was sustained by our ships, and when they again took their position the enemy's guns were nearly silenced, the shells dropping in the enemy's works or falling on the beach, resulting in death-dealing explosions among the carrying death and destruction with them. The small swoken were seen about the fort every now and then, mingled with flying shells. At eleven o'clock the immense flagstaff was cut away and the rebel flag came down, but the fire was still continued by them. At twelve o'clock the Susquehanna neared in, and, dropping her heavy anchor, opened an effective fire. The commanding on our part was tremendous, and as we write only ten guns are seen in operation of flying shells; but the enemy did not return the fire with any regularity. The battery has for the last hour from the explosion of shells that dropped in at the rate of about half a dozen a minute.

The enemy ceased firing a little before two, and after a few more shells had been thrown in the Commodore signalized to cease firing.

The troops had meantime advanced to within a short distance of the fort, and before we ceased firing some of our men got in and hauled down the rebel flag. It was not the first flag that had been hauled down that morning, for Commodore Stringham, Captain Rowan, Captain Gillis, and some time on the ramparts waving the stars amid a shower of shells.

When the fort was ceased the fort was occupied in force, and hoisted afterward.

The Monticello had proceeded ahead of the land force to protect them, and had reached the Inlet when a number of on schooners, to the rear and right of the small battery, mounting ten thirty-twos and two rifled guns, which had been hastily thrown up, opened on her with shot and shell. The Monticello replied with her rifled guns, at short range. At the same instant the battery on the beach opened fire, the enemy pouring in a rifle and heavy, which the Monticello replied to with deadly energy. For fifty minutes she held her own, and finally getting off the ground she came out, having been shot through and through by solid shot, and her rigging hung below the water-line. She fired fifty-five shell in fifty minutes, and probably silenced the battery. She received at that fire repairs, with one or two men slightly bruised, but none killed or wounded.

The scenes of the vessel and crew was miraculous. Until this time we supposed the day was victory. We had expected opening of the large battery rather changed the aspect of affairs. Things did not look encouraging to us. We had men others who were probably in need of provisions, and in view of a night attack no information to be sent them from the Harriet Lane.

As we ran down in shore we saw the bright bronze fires on the beach with groups of men about them. The night passed without alarm. The enemy, as we have since learned, lying on their arms all night, expecting an attack.

At early daybreak on Thursday the troops were all over-ten in the fleet, and at a quarter past eight, the vessels having come to the anchorage they previously occupied in the action began, the Susquehanna opening the day's work by a shell from one of the rifled guns, when the Minnesota and Wabash joined in immediately, and again the fleet of shells and their explosions were seen. The fire fired nearly half an hour before the battery responded, when it answered briskly. Our fire was terrific, as on the previous day. The range had been obtained, and nearly every shell went into the battery, bursting in clouds of smoke and exploding with terrific effect.

At twenty minutes past ten A.M., an eleven-inch shell having pierced the bomb-proof through a ventilator and exploded inside, near the magazine, the enemy gave up the fight and raised over the ramparts a white flag.

We immediately ceased fire. General Butler went into the Inlet, and hauled in the fort, and demanded an unconditional surrender.

Commodore Barron, Assistant Secretary of the Confederate Navy, asked that the officers be allowed to march out with side-arms, and the men be permitted to return to their homes after surrendering their arms. These terms were pronounced inadmissible by General Butler, and finally the force was surrendered without condition.

Articles of capitulation were signed on the flag-ship by Commodore Stringham and General Butler on the part of the United States, and by Commodore Barron, Colonel Martin, and Major Andrews on the rebel side, and the latter swords delivered up.

OUR BROTHER!

Call him not "Brother," whose embrowned hand
Hurled even the sacrifice of our communion!
Call him not "Brother," who, with sword and brand,
Lays waste the heritage of our fathers!
Call him not "Brother," who, amid cannon's boom,
Reads doom old land-marks, shrouds in endless gloom
The hopless ones his creed hath bared and bound!
He is a Cabal. Unbidden must he be done.
The Prodigal, repentant, may return!
Repentant? Yes! Repentant—never! No!
The renegade from freedom all men spurn.

Who strikes for slavery makes the world his foe:
Who draws the sword shall by the sword be slain:
And whoso "raises cane" must reap the hurricane.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1861.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

ON Saturday, 31st August, Major-General Fremont, commanding at St. Louis, Missouri, issued a proclamation declaring the whole State of Missouri under martial law, and further stating:

"All persons who shall be taken with arms in their hands within the time limit shall be tried by court-martial, and, if found guilty, will be shot. The property, real and personal, of all persons in the State of Missouri who shall take up arms against the United States, and who shall directly process to have taken entire part with their enemies in the field, is declared to be confiscated to the public use; and their slaves, if any they have, are hereby declared free men."

It has been stated by some of the papers that in thus pronouncing the emancipation of the slaves of rebels General Fremont was only carrying out the Act known as the Confiscating Act passed by Congress at the extra Session. An examination of that act will, however, show that its provisions do not warrant the step taken by the General. The only section in which any reference is made to slaves is the following:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever hereafter, during the present rebellion existing against the government of the United States, any person claimed to be held to labor or service under the laws of any State shall be required or permitted by the person to whom such labor or service is claimed to be due, or by the lawful agent of such person, to take up arms against the United States; or shall be required or permitted by such person, or by such agent, or service is claimed to be due, or his lawful agent, to work or to be employed in any fort, navy-yard, dock, armory, ship, intrenchment, or in any military or naval service whatsoever, against the constituted and lawful authority of the United States, then, and in every such case, the person to whom such labor or service is claimed to be due shall forfeit his claim to such labor, any law of the State of or the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. And whenever thereafter the person claiming such labor or service shall seek to enforce his claim, it shall be a full and sufficient answer to such claim that the person whose service or labor is claimed has been employed in hostile service against the Government of the United States, contrary to the provisions of this act.

It thus appears that the only slaves who can be forfeited under this Act are those who have been "employed in hostile service against the United States in the present rebellion." Major-General Fremont's proclamation grants freedom to the slaves of every rebel, whether they have been employed in military service or not. The General, therefore, has not only based his action, not upon the law of Congress, but upon something else.

That something else is THE WAR POWER, which is inherent in the Government, and is exercised by its delegated officers commanding the forces of the United States. What the nature of this war power is, and how far it goes with slavery, may be gathered from the following extract from a speech delivered by ex-President John Q. Adams, in the House of Representatives, on April 14, 1842:

When your country is actually in war, whether it be war of invasion or a war of insurrection, Congress has power to carry on the war, and no power is restricting to the laws of war, and by the laws of war an invader country has all the rights and all the powers conferred by the board, and martial law takes the place of them. The power in Congress to declare war includes all incidental exercise under the present Constitution of the United States. And where the laws of war have a place, martial law is one of those laws? It is this, that when a country is invaded, and the laws of peace are no martial array, the commanders of both armies have power to emancipate all the slaves in the district where the war is this a mere theoretic statement. The history of South America shows that the doctrine has been carried into execution within the last thirty years. Slavery was abolished in Colombia, first by the Spanish General Morillo, and secondly by the American General Bolivar. It was abolished by virtue of military execution of the laws of war, and by virtue of the abolition continues to be law to this day. It was abolished by the laws of war in the revolted provinces of Mexico. I might furnish a thousand proofs to show that the practice of emancipation of slaves by the laws of municipal hostilities, under a state of actual invasion and of actual war, which I have stated to you, is founded in necessity, and that the laws of war do, in all such cases, take the place of municipal laws. But I will only add to this, that the military authority takes, for the time, the place of all municipal institutions, and slavery among the rest. So far that state of things, so far from its being true that the States where slavery exists will be the final determinant of the subject, not only the President of the United States, but the Congress of the United has no power to set the universal emancipation of the slaves.

John Quincy Adams thus held that, whenever a war exists, slavery, martial law, might be proclaimed in any part of the Union, and that such proclamation "swept by the board" all municipal and local laws establishing or recognizing slavery. It may seem superfluous to quote authorities in support of the assertions of so sound a jurist as Mr. Adams. But, as Commodore Stringham, in his report, appeals, in the speech above quoted, the views of the recognized expounders of the common law. Sir Matthew Hale (Hist. C. L. c. 2), says that "martial law is built upon no settled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in its decisions; it is in truth and reality no law, but something rather indulged than allowed as a law." Blackstone quotes this passage (Comm., I. 413) and emphatically approves it; adding that in time of war court-martials have "almost an absolute legislative power." Modern jurists confirm these views, and admit that in actual warfare the powers of the general commanding are dictatorial.

We run no risk, therefore, in stating that, in decreeing the emancipation of the slaves owned by rebels in the State of Missouri, General Fremont has neither, on the one hand, relied upon the recent Act of Congress relating to confiscation, nor, on the other, exceeded the proper limits of his authority as general commanding. Under his proclamation of martial law, all state and municipal laws were at once suspended, and he, as commanding General, was practically invested with dictatorial powers over persons and property, for the just use of which powers he tacitly undertook to render account when martial law ceased to exist in his Department.

The direct consequences of his decree, so far as slavery in Missouri is concerned, can not be of a very extensive character. Missouri does not contain 125,000 slaves, and of these considerably more than one half are believed to be held by loyal men. Moreover, under the terms of Fremont's proclamation, no slave can be emancipated until it is proved that his owner has been actually in arms, or laboring actively in aid of those who are in arms against the Government: a large number of slaves may thus be defrauded of emancipation through the want of evidence to establish the treason of their masters. It is doubtful whether 40,000 human beings will exchange slavery for freedom under the proclamation of General Fremont.

But its moral effect must be signal. It is a solemn warning to the inhabitants of the rebel States, that wherever the armies of the United States are resisted in the interests of slavery, by open enemies or by secret traitors, there is a pregnant hint that the rebels who have falsely accused us of being abolitionists may, if they choose, make themselves abolitionists. It is a notification to Kentucky, which seems to be on the eve of explosion, that open treason will necessarily involve the extirpation of slavery. This notification will be given in every case in the old adage, "Those whom the Gods wish to destroy they first render mad:" we shall now see how far the madness extends. The cost of rebellion is abolition. Those who choose may purchase.

Another important result of General Fremont's proclamation will be to convince many of the fact that the people of the North are much more solidly united on the question of slavery than was imagined. It had been generally supposed that the first entrance of the cause of emancipation would divide the North into two hostile camps. How this strange delusion came to be entertained it is difficult to discover; the least reflection should have satisfied every one that it was impossible to build up as the North a party based on protection to slavery extension. The moment the question originated, there is no doubt it did exist, and that leading men and journals in the confidence of the Administration were so thoroughly imbued with this indignant spirit as to greatly retard the imputation of being friendly to freedom under any circumstances. It seems, from the temper in which the public received General Fremont's proclamation, that they are not so tender on the subject. They seem very well satisfied with the prospect. We hear no complaints, but numerous assertions of devotion to slavery in Missouri. The respectable Democrats of this part of the country express themselves rather pleased than otherwise. Of course it is to be expected that the lottery-policy dealers and the profligate vagabonds who pretend to represent the Democracy in convention will tesselate and howl at the event, as they will do at every success of the National arms: but neither in this nor in any other particular do they express the sense of the rank and file of the Democracy.

What people want now is decided, startling, effective successes on the part of the United States forces. Let us have, without delay, one complain of what they may cost. Our Generals may emancipate every slave in the country, and lay waste every field from the Potomac to the Rio Grande—people will sustain them, provided they crush the enemy and restore the supremacy of the Government. But there will be no room for the rebel who, for the sake of breaking a law or dividing a party, suffers the rebels to progress from victory to victory, and the States and Stripes to endure defeat after defeat, and disgrace after disgrace.

A CORRECTION.

IN a notice of General MCCLELLAN, published in our paper of August 31, we did injustice to Colonel DELAFIELD, of the United States Army, by stating that he had gone over to the rebels. This erroneous statement originally appeared in a city journal, and was promptly contradicted by Governor MORGAN, who wrote as follows:

"Colonel Delafield reported to me for duty, by order of the Chief Engineer, General Totten, soon after the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and this State and Country will be largely benefited by his valuable aid. Never is not a more Union loving and supporting citizen living."

We now learn that the Colonel is still on duty with Governor MORGAN, in addition to being charged with the Defenses at the Narrows, which are at this moment in active operation, progress being made every day. He has gone to both Forts Richmond and Tompkins. We learn also that the Colonel has superintended the construction of a large supply of rifle field-artillery that have gone into service; and that he has at this time upward of three hundred mechanics at work in this city on gun-carriages, caissons, forge and battery wagons, for additional rifle field-guns that he is ordered by the Governor to have made without unnecessary delay. We also learn that the Colonel has found time to prepare Special Reports for the information of the Sanitary Commission.

We avail ourselves of this occasion to inform our readers of the recent distribution, by the Senate printer, of Colonel Delafield's report on the Art of War in Europe in 1854, '55, and '56—a work of great labor and research, and embellished by numerous graphic illustrations.

THE LOUNGER.

TALK BY THE WAY.

As all roads, according to the old proverb, lead to Rome, so all conversation now ends in the war. We all ask each other anxiously how we feel today, and the fluctuations of emotion are various in the extreme. The public mind is as sensitive as a mirror. Each breath of doubt tarnishes it. An unhappy glance makes it unhappy. A cheerful face cheers the foolish reflector. In the busiest Monday, if a man persistently carries a smile in his eye and a spring in his walk, the glorious circle of friends, which has just demonstrated the inevitability of national destruction, revives and takes heart, and suddenly sees that things are not half as bad as they were an hour before. On the other hand, a skilful array of the dismal statistics, which every man has ready at his command, will overwhelm the soul that was trying to be cheerful, and all is utterly hopeless and forlorn.

Long and constant peace for peace for two generations, we come very slowly to believe that we must really fight. In order to secure unfading gold in our breast chalice, we have the whole generally heard in advance the roar of the coming storm of popular indignation, and have hastened to postpone the gathering ære die. When they have persevered the people in overpowering numbers have taken the matter in hand. The neighborhood has cleaned up its own dirt. Mr. Davis's agents have been permitted to depart with a bliss of contempt From the people they would betray into the enemy's hands. The other day, in Middletown, New Jersey, however, one of these men was saved from any popular punishment only by the aid of the United States Marshal. The little meeting of traitors he expected to address suddenly turned into a conference of patriots. Instead of resolving that Jeff Davis, or any body else who chose, was justified in firing upon the national flag and the citizens defending it, whenever he pleased, these sons of noble sires in Monmouth, one of the most sacred of revolutionary names,

"Resolved, That we, the people of Middletown, in this great crisis of our nation do not recognize any political parties.

"Resolved, That we consider this war a traitorous rebellion against constitutional government.

"Resolved, That we are ready to support the Administration in carrying on this war, to the extent of our means in both men and money."

So say you, Gentlemen of Monmouth; so say all loyal citizens in the land.

TREASON "IN THE COUNTRY."

"A FRIEND "in the country" entreats the action of the Democratic Committee in this State, in its effort to maintain a separate party organization in the face of the enemy, on the ground that at a time like this there is a peculiar need of "watchful opposition" against the possible negligence or corruption in the management of affairs.

But party spirit in this form defeats that very end. Party organization looks only for flaws, seeks only to embarrass, and treats the defense of the Government as the affair of a party. That is precisely the political hope of "party" in this State to-day. It aims to represent the action of the Administration as a political party. That is precisely the Chicago platform. Its speakers and papers, where they are not hushed, denounce the Administration as undermining or transcending the Constitution. The "party" action in this State follows the lead of Breckinridge and Vallandigham in Congress; and compulsorily shuts its eyes to the fact of Davis, while it opens them wide with horror at what is called the unconstitutional or extra-constitutional policy of the President.

This Government is to be defended and saved by this Administration, or not at all. The whole body of loyal citizens there is practically a standing army who are most interested in detecting and denouncing the corruption or delay of the Administration. To endeavor to maintain a separate party organization for that purpose is palpably to aid the enemy.

The personal and private characters of gentlemen in the various branches of political communities are, of course, not discussed in these columns. But their political character and actions are at least in these times what the interest of public affairs absorbs all other. We have no hesitation then in saying that the action of Mr. Davis, Richmond and his sympathizers in a purely partisan and not a patriotic course; that it looks to the dominance of party spirit and not to the unconditional maintenance of the Government; nor can any sensible man forget that the leaders of the rebellion, both in the late Administration and at the South, were fellow-partisans of the managers who are now trying to manipulate the demand of unconditional, non-political, support under the rebuke.

Mr. Richmond insists, in his call, that the vigorous prosecution of the war shall be accompanied with "the most scrupulous preservation of peace." What does that mean? The Government is suppressing an insurrection. When the rebels surrender, peace is of course restored. Does Mr. Richmond mean that they are to have peace before they surrender? He insinuates that the Government have some unfair interest peace. Is that called patriotism "in the country?"

He invites all "who seek the restoration of the Union by strictly constitutional justice to all the States" to come to his convention. He means by this that the Government intends unequal justice to some States. Such a charge would be nonsense. Is that called patriotism at this time "in the country?"

He says that those who think sectionalism at the North, etc., has caused the war, may come to his convention. But is there any body in the land who does not know that this war springs from the defeat of the effort of Southern politicians to extend the dominion of slavery throughout the country? And therefore is not more absolute Southern sectionalism? Does such call tend to unite public opinion heartily, and is it also called patriotism "in the country?"

The truth is, that, next to the services of Mr. Breckinridge and Mr. Vallandigham, Mr. Davis would gratefully acknowledge those of Mr. Jackson Richmond and Company in trying to divide public sentiment at the North by inspiring distrust of the intentions of the Administration, and by keeping alive all old party jealousies. If that course is called patriotism "in the country," it is distinguished from treason, as varioloid is from small-pox, in the city. And if it be known "in the country," as it is in the city, that every secessionist in the State who votes at the next election will vote for the ticket which the partisan Democratic Convention nominates, what other proof is wanted of the real significance of that ticket?

THE IRISH AND THE WAR.

THANKS to their bravery and endurance, and thanks also to the warm Irish heart and loud Irish tongue, the "Sixty-Ninth" have justly received a full share of the laurels which fell to those who fought well, even if at last defeated, at Bull Run. The return of the regiment was a festival. The unflagging ardor of their soldiers sends almost all of them, and still other regiments of their country-men, back to the field. They have fought well. They always fought well. Washington knew it and said it in Spain. They have well served the country they have so wisely chosen, and of whose eclectic nationality their race will form a part.

They have had a festival of their own for the relief of the widows and orphans of the Sixty-Ninth, at Jones's Wood. The day was beautiful: the place was charming: the crowd was immense. There are said to have been seventy thousand persons on the ground. Captain Thomas Francis Meagher was the orator, and his words fell upon the huge mass of people like sparks upon tinder. The crowd blazed with enthusiasm. The orator was never more florid, fiery, and felicitous: and of all the speeches he has made in this country none is so truly direct and sensible as the one he poured into the open ears, and eyes, and mouths, and hearts of the great assembly of his countrymen at Jones's Wood.

Mr. Meagher, and doubtless he spoke for the vast majority of his countrymen who are American citizens, took the simple, wise, patriotic, and sure ground. He declared that the National Government has suffered more from its own passive and supine indifference to the desperate plots and preparation and ability of the conspiracy. He asserted that "the masked conspirators of the North" are more criminal than the armed rebels of the South. He avowed himself a Democrat, a man who disagreed with the political views of the present Administration, but who said, "Still, still, "the honor and glory of the National flag are of infinitely higher value than the Regency at Downing, or Tammany Hall, or Faneuil Hall, or the Democratic Mug." He said that all American citizens who hail from Ireland had taken an oath of loyalty not to New York, nor to Alabama, nor to Massachusetts, nor to Florida or Kansas, not to any State, but to the United States. He spoke upon the character of England, whose enmity to our Government he thought ought to be reason enough for every Irishman to defend it to the last; and Captain Meagher retired amidst tremendous and enthusiastic cheering.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A Scotch cattle dealer, at Closes fair, was asked by a countryman to the sale, "Is there to be a fair next week?" said he, "on the sidewalk. Well, I've offered her five pound ten shillings for her, and I'll stick. Now if you, a stranger, should offer her five pound fifteen, she would be by me would not sell her. Will you be back soon enough to take this half-crown and bid the bargain with me? I will then pay the money and take the cow." The good-natured cattle dealer effected the purchase as requested, and returned to find the countryman's bid no better was gone. He was forced to take the cow himself at the half-crown profit, and had the pleasure ever after to "thus to oblige the missing countryman. It was after this manner that the Scotch cattle dealer managed man's wife, and they had thus managed to sell their cow and get nothing.

A Frenchman, near the Canada line, in Vermont, sold a horse to his Yankee neighbor, which he recommended as "very good horse, only he whistle a little, in spite of his suppressing opponents. To every inquiry of the buyer respecting the qualities of the horse the Frenchman gave a favorable reply, but always concluded with the unpleasant with the degeneracy remark, "He's not look 'im good." Disgusted with the bargain, he sold the horse, of which he could judge for himself without the aid of the Frenchman, by the latter's testimony. In the mean examination, that the beast was worth the moderate sum originally paid for it, and he returned to claim it. A few days afterward he returned to the seller in high dudgeon, and demanded the return of his money in the quality of the horse. "Vot is de matteer?" said the Frenchman. "Matter!" said the Yankee, "enough—the horse can't see! He is as blind as a bat." "Ah," said the Frenchman, "I tell you he not look good, he not look ver good—he gar, I don't know if he look at all!"

A teacher of music was once instructing Mademoiselle Desmatins in the part of Medea; but the latter sang without expression. He asked her whether she realized the emotion it called for. In the third act of the opera enters a passage where Medea, abandoned by her lover, gives way to the expression of her anguish. After several letters upon this passage, Mademoiselle Desmatins cried, "Give way to your feelings! Put yourself in the place of the betrayed woman! If you were forsaken by a man whom you loved passionately, what would you do?" "Why, I would never leave as soon as possible." "If that is the case, we are both losing our time here," answered the teacher.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

GENERAL FREMONT'S PROCLAMATION.

THE following Proclamation was issued on 31st ult., at St. Louis:

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE WESTERN DEPARTMENT,
"ST. LOUIS, Mo., August 30, 1861.

"Circumstances, in my judgment of sufficient urgency, render it necessary that the Commanding General of this Department should assume the administrative powers of the State. Its disorganized condition, the helplessness of the civil authorities to meet the present crisis in the preservation of property by bands of murderers and marauders who infest every part of the State and avail themselves of the public misfortunes and the vicinity of a hostile force to gratify their passions and their cupidity, and who find an enemy wherever they find plunder; finally demand the severest measures to repress the daily increasing crimes and outrages which are driving off the inhabitants and ruining the State. The public safety and the success of our arms require unity of purpose, vigor, and rapidity in action, to help prompt administration of affairs.

"I do, therefore, to suppress disorders, to maintain as far as now practicable the public peace, and to give security and protection to the persons and property of loyal citizens, I do hereby extend, and declare established, martial law throughout the State of Missouri. The lines of the army of occupation in this State are for the present declared to extend as far in advance by way of the posts of Jefferson City, Rolla, and Ironton, to Cape Girardeau on the Mississippi River.

"All persons who shall be taken with arms in their hands within these lines shall be tried by court-martial, and, if found guilty, will be shot. The property, real and personal, of all persons in the State of Missouri who shall take up arms against the United States, and who shall be directly proven to have taken an active part with their enemies in the field, is declared to be confiscated to the public use, and their slaves, if any they have, are hereby declared free.

"All persons who shall be proven to have destroyed after the publication of this order, railroad tracks, bridges, or telegraphs, shall suffer the extreme penalty of the law.

"All persons engaged in treasonable correspondence, in giving or procuring intelligence to the enemy, in harboring or secreting the public treasonably by creating and contributing false reports, or in any manner aiding the enemies of the United States, will be shot, after a careful inquiry shall prove their guilt.

"All persons who have been led away from their allegiance are hereby commanded to return to their homes within twenty days from this date, or in case they conceive themselves aggrieved, and have any claim to make, they are to present themselves before the commanding officer at these head-quarters, in person or by agent, and present their claims, if any they have, which will be fully examined, and justice done to the applicant according to the circumstances of the case.

"The Commanding General will labor vigilantly for the public welfare, and in his efforts for the early restoration of peace will count upon the assistance, but the active support of his fellow-citizens.

"JOHN C. FREMONT,
"Major-General Commanding."

EXPECTED ATTACK ON HARPER'S FERRY.

It is stated positively that Ben McCulloch is marching on Jefferson City with ten thousand men, and warm work is anticipated shortly. It is believed that the Union forces are well disposed to repel such an attack as this is reported to be. The force at Rolla is said to be about five thousand; 4000 at Cape Girardeau; 6000 near Ironton; 5000 at Sainte Genevieve; 3000 at Pilot Knob, Arcadia, and Bonne City; 7000 at Rolla; and 20,000 to 30,000 at St. Louis.

TRAVEL STOPPED AT ST. LOUIS.

Following the order issued yesterday by Major-General Fremont, Provost-Marshal McKinstry has issued an order forbidding any person leaving beyond the limits of St. Louis without a special permit from his office; and railroad, telegraph, and express companies are prohibited from selling tickets to any one not holding a proper pass. Communication with the interior is thus rendered somewhat difficult.

AFFAIRS AT FORTRESS MONROE.

The neighborhood of Fortress Monroe appears to be the scene of much naval activity in the absence of important movements on land. Last week the tug Yankee, a large tugboat, mounted with rifled cannon, ran out from Norfolk the other morning and fired upon a schooner and a half of Newport News, and fired twenty-three shots at the United States frigate Susquehanna without doing any damage. As soon as the guns of the frigate were brought to bear on her she ran out of range, and the frigate went on the Sumpawin, and another in the direction of the Rip-Raps, after which she got under cover of the guns of Fortress Point.

DOSECRANS ALL RIGHT.

The War Department has received dispatches from General Rosecrans which set at rest all doubts as to his safety. He expresses his confidence in being able to hold his position against any force which the rebel leaders are likely to send against him.

EXCITEMENT AT WHEELING.

There was great excitement in Wheeling, Virginia, on Hirt. A dispatch was received from Fairmount, Marion County, to the effect that the secessionists in the back country were rising in great numbers and marching upon the town to burn it and cut up the railroad track. Wheeling was at once in a state of wild activity; drums beat, the Home Guard and volunteer citizens hastily prepared to set out to the aid of their menaced brethren, and in a short time a full train set off. It was feared that the rising would be extensive, and it was thought that it had some connection with the plans of General Lee.

HOW THE REBELS RAISE MONEY.

The Treasury Note Act passed by the late Congress for the purpose of raising funds for the prosecution of the rebellion has just been published in some of the Southern journals, and it is strongly commended by them. The first section authorizes the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of $100,000,000, redeemable six months after peace; and makes them a legal tender in the payment of Government taxes and other duties, except the export tax on cotton. The second section provides for the issue of $100,000,000 of Confederate bonds, payable in twenty years. These bonds are to be sold at either for specie or military stores or foreign bills of exchange. They bear 8 per cent. interest, and the interest is payable semi-annually. The third section gives the holders of Treasury notes the option of exchanging said notes for Confederate bonds wherever they may choose thus to invest. The fourth section provides a war tax on all persons owning more than $200, of fifty cents in the hundred dollars. The tax is for the purpose of supporting the Government and of providing for paying the principal and interest of the public debt.

SUBMISSION OF EAST TENNESSEE.

The Herald says: "East Tennessee has at last been forced to succumb to the doctrine of coercion, through the influence of threats and banishments. Thomas A. R. Nelson, who was elected by the Union men to the United States Congress, gave in just in time to save his neck from the halter in Jonesboro'. Ex-Governor Johnson, with his Knoxville Whig, stood out until the bowie-knife was brandished about his head, when he, to save his property and his family, consented to support the rebel Confederate and State Governments. Parson Brownlow, who has ever showed that there were twenty-six thousand two hundred and thirty-seven United States voters in East Tennessee in the State, being a clear majority of eleven thousand over the secessionists, is also said to think it possible that the sudden change which is reported to have taken place there has any foundation in sincerity."

THE REBEL FLEET AT MEMPHIS.

The business of impressment is carried on in Memphis, and a regular press-gang organized. In many cases, says the Memphis Appeal, acts of barbarity have been perpetrated, and not unfrequently have farmers, who were in the habit of driving their wagons to the city for the use of families whose wives and children depended entirely upon them for support, to such an extent has this barbarous practice been carried that the Council of the city have become alarmed, and appointed a committee to confer with the Archbishop, Major-General Polk, upon the subject.

SECTIONS OF THE CONFISCATION ACT.

The revenue department of this city displayed an unusual activity on 1st inst., which created no little surprise among the officials, who were unprepared to comprehend it at a given hour for immediate and mysterious service. It was found a few days ago that clearances for the port of Matamoras, in Northern Mexico, were no longer to be granted by the Collector of the port, and instructions, rules and provisions for the rebels were being transported there, and thence would be conveyed to the ports of the rebel State of Texas. In accordance with this order the Surveyor was directed to put on board revenue cutters not less than forty-five vessels at the different wharves, loaded with merchandise, and bound for the port of Matamoras, while others had obtained clearances for other ports, and were ready to sail on the same errand. Steamers were held upon that presumption.

THE SECRET SECESSION MEETING IN JERSEY.

The attempt last week to hold a meeting for Compromise and Peace, was frustrated by the spirited action of loyal communities of Middletown, Keyport, Red Bank, and the region round about, who organized a large mass meeting at Middletown and passed the most patriotic resolutions. Mr. Silas B. Dutcher, of this city, was present by invitation, and delivered a stirring speech, which was received with wonderful enthusiasm. Mr. Thomas Dunn English, who had promised to address the Peace Convention meeting, was roughly handled by the crowd, and had to be locked up by United States Deputy Marshal Dennis to save him lynching. Not less than 2000 of the most respectable citizens of Monmouth County, fell to the help of whom were of the Democratic party.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE CONFEDERACY NOT TO BE RECOGNIZED.

THE Government has received dispatches from minister Lyons, which has impressed on the Federal mind, the question of interference by the British Government in the affairs of the United States. He does not think any change of policy is intended so long as the blockade is continued.

COTTON SUPPLY.

The Secretary of the Cotton Supply Association has given the result of his interview with the Viceroy of Egypt, and his impression as to the cotton supply capacity of that country. He believes that the growth of cotton may be increased to an unlimited extent, and the English republic should liberally assist the enterprise. The Nicaraguan Government has offered to give a free grant of land in Nicaragua to settlers who propose to raise cotton.

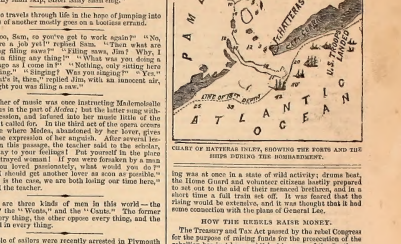
ITALY.

CHALDINI TO ENTER ROME.

The Independance Belge says that the French Government had ordered General Goyon not to oppose the entrance of General Chaldini and his troops into the Papal territory should the necessity of war require it.

MISS HOSMER AT WORK.

A letter from Rome, in the London News, says that Miss Harriet Hosmer, of whom America is justly proud, has completed her life-sized statue of General Bolivar, to be cast in bronze at St. Louis, when it shall have been carried by Count Joseph Bonaparte to which the world will soon be restored. It also says that Miss Hosmer will be no less represented in the grand exhibition in London next July represented as one of the "Captive Queens"—Zenobia.



BRIG.-GEN. ROSECRANS, U.S.A.

GENERAL WILLIAM STARKE ROSECRANS, whose portrait we give herewith, was born in the County of Delaware, State of Ohio, on the 6th of September, 1819. His ancestors on the father's side were originally from Amsterdam, and on the mother's of the family of the Pennsylvania Hopkinses, one of whom signed the Declaration of Independence. At the age of eighteen, on his own direct application to the Secretary of War (then Hon. Joel R. Poinsett), he was appointed cadet at West Point in the year 1837. He graduated among the Five, and became brevet lieutenant of engineers in 1842. His first military station was Fortress Monroe, where he remained one year first assistant to Colonel R. E. De Russy. In August, 1843, he married Miss Ann Eliza Hegeman, an accomplished and worthy representative of the old New York family of that name, and was ordered to West Point to act as Assistant Professor of Engineering and Natural Philosophy. After remaining four years at the Academy, he was transferred to Newport, Rhode Island, and made Engineer-in-chief of the fortifications at Fort Adams. During his stay there, from 1847 to 1853, he was charged with surveys of New Bedford harbor and Taunton River, Massachusetts, and plans of fortifications, which he executed to the satisfaction of the War Department. In 1853 he was made constructing engineer at the Navy-yard, Washington, District of Columbia. In November, 1853, he resigned his commission in the army, and engaged in civil engineering and architecture in the city of Cincinnati. In 1855 he accepted the superintendency of the Cannel Coal Company of Coal River, Kenawha Court House, Virginia, and Presidency of the Coal River Navigation Company, which he retained until April, 1857, when he removed to Cincinnati, and engaged in the manufacture of coal oil and prussiate of potash. This was his business when he was called by Major-General M'Clellan to act as chief engineer and aid-de-camp, and thence, shortly after, promoted to a Brigadier-Generalship in the regular army.

In all these various positions General Rosecrans has exhibited the most untiring industry, indomitable energy, and spotless integrity. None ever knew him whose respect and confidence he did not command; and the writer of this sketch could not repress a smile when, among certain papers kindly submitted to his inspection by the amiable and accomplished Mrs. Rosecrans, he lit upon a letter dated Washington, August 14, 1854, testifying to "Mr. Rosecrans's high abilities, integrity, and energy," and signed "Jefferson Davis."

Socially, the General unites to the refinement of the gentleman the frank, free-spoken manner so taking among our Western populations. In person he is little above the middle height, rather thin, and very erect, with no feature so striking as his broad forehead and clear gray eyes. General Rosecrans is a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

BRIG.-GEN. ROSECRANS, U.S.A., COMMANDING UNITED STATES FORCES IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.
[PHOTOGRAPHED FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

THE WEST POINT FOUNDRY.

THESE WORKS, which we illustrate on page 588, are situated at Cold Spring, Putnam County, and were established in 1817, by Gouverneur Kemble, Esq. They were originally intended for a cannon foundry; but, from the irregular demand for ordnance, have been from time to time greatly enlarged, and adapted to the manufacture of steam-engines and nearly all descriptions of heavy machinery. The engines of the steam-frigate Merrimac, and the pumping-engines of the Jersey City Water-works, at Bellville, and of the Dry-dock at the Brooklyn Navy-yard, are from this establishment. At present the demand for cannon and projectiles gives full employment to most of the departments of the foundry; and a great variety of these warlike appliances can be observed, as well as the moulds and other preparations and facilities for casting and finishing them.

Among the specimens of ordnance of the "smooth bore" kind, are the Columbiads and sea-coast mortars of the army, and eleven and nine inch guns of the navy, of the pattern of Captain Dahlgren. The rifled cannon, however, hold a conspicuous place at the West Point Foundry. Among them are heavy cast iron blocks for 80-pounder guns, to be finished at the Washington Navy-yard. Preparations are made for a still larger casting of the same kind, denominated a 150-pounder. These guns are from plans furnished by Captain Dahlgren, and are for the naval service of the United States.

The manufacture of the "Parrott" rifled gun and projectiles is now very extensively carried on at the West Point Foundry. They are made from the designs of Mr. R. P. Parrott, the present head of the establishment, and are the result of some years of experiment and observation. We understand that although Mr. Parrott by no means assumes to be the originator of the idea of strengthening cast iron guns by hoops or bands of wrought iron, he claims to have laid down a certain rule of proportion of the parts of the two kinds of iron, as well as of the position of the wrought iron reinforce which he employs, and particularly a new and very important mode of uniting the reinforce to the body of the gun. These guns are denominated by the weight of their respective projectiles—10, 20, and 30 pounders; and others will probably be made of larger power and dimensions.

Mr. Parrott's projectiles are of two kinds. In both, the portion which is engaged in the grooves is at the butt, or rear end of the projectile. For the 10-pounder this is of wrought iron, and the projectile so mounted is known as Read's patent. It has been perfected and fitted for service by improvements introduced and patented by Mr. Parrott. He uses, however, for the larger calibres a peculiar ring of softer metal—a plan of his own invention. This ring does not project beyond the body of the projectile in any direction, thus affording great facility in loading.

Shells or hollow projectiles are chiefly used, and can be exploded by the ordinary time or percussion fuse.

These rifled guns are now in process of manufacture both for the army and naval service. About twenty-five guns and seven thousand projectiles are made per week at this foundry.

PEACE.

PEACE with rebels? Pence with traitors?
Peace with pirates sword in hand?
Not till right and wrong change natures;
Not till God forsakes our land.

Peace there is not for the wicked,
Save upon the bended knees:
When the South is soundly "lick-ed,"
Then 'twill do to prate of "peace!"

THE TWENTY-SECOND INDIANA VOLUNTEERS AT ST. LOUIS.

We publish herewith a picture of the ARRIVAL OF THE TWENTY-SECOND INDIANA VOLUNTEERS, Colonel Jefferson C. Davis, at St. Louis, Missouri, from a sketch sent us by a member of the regiment. A letter accompanied the sketch, from which we make the following extracts (want of space alone prevents our giving more):

Our regiment, which was stationed at North Madison, Indiana, up to the 14th August, received orders on that day to proceed immediately to St. Louis, via Indianapolis, which having been made known throughout the camp was met with cheers and shoutings, all the boys being delighted at the chance of getting near to one of the seats of war. Having strapped on our knapsacks, canteens, and haversacks, we all fell in in companies, and, 1010 men strong, we left our old quarters in the highest spirits, and amidst the thousand greetings of sympathizing crowds marched to the depôt. The trains and engines were waiting for us, three in all, and "All aboard!" being the cry, we tumbled in, soon got rid of our knapsacks, etc., and started in due time.

On the morrow, about ten o'clock, Colonel Woods inspected the new volunteers, and being approved of, the oath was administered, and all cheerfully went in for "three years or the war." The next day (Friday), after dinner, we struck tents, marched to the depôt, and, with three roaring cheers, were off once more for the far West.

On our arrival at the Mississippi we disembarked, fell in ranks, and marched to the City of Alton steamboat, which was to convey us across. Tents and all camp equipage were soon aboard, and slowly we steamed across to St. Louis, and in solemn silence, save the words of command, disembarked (see engraving), and the whole regiment drew up on the sidewalk by the levee. Nothing could enforce more strongly on the mind the sad effects of this fearful war than the desolate appearance of this levee. Crowded with boats, fires out, and, with a few solitary exceptions, all idle.

At length our Colonel appeared, and four abreast "double quick" up the hill went we, and after going some distance, "right face," "quick march," soon brought us to Washington Avenue to the cheering sounds of fife and drums. Here we halted. I may here mention, en passant, that, having asked a drink of water from two respectable women who were standing at a door-way to see the troops marching past, one of them kindly brought it; and having asked us two were we not Irishmen, we said yes! "Then," answered she, "you shall take something better from a countrywoman, for I feel proud to see ye all come forward so bravely for your adopted country." So off she went, and soon appeared with a tin-cup full of "good old rye!" We drank success to the ladies and the good cause in which we were embarked, and "saith a scorching sun, and choking with dust, we once more stepped forward briskly, and in about half an hour arrived at our camping ground at "Herzinger's Cave."

A SOUTHERN FAMILY COMING NORTH.

On page 583 we illustrate one of the most cruel consequences of the war—the exile of Southern families from their homes by the march of the contending armies. For some time past the boats on the Mississippi and the rail-cars running from Tennessee into Kentucky have been crowded with loyal men driven from their homes by the brutal soldiery in the service of the rebels. Many have left property and all they possessed, glad to escape with their lives. Our illustration represents a good old country gentleman leaving his home with his family and servants—all armed for their own protection, and journeying with their own cattle in search of peace.

THE HUNDRED AND FIRST REGIMENT.

WHAT is a regiment? Every body looks upon it from his own point of view. The dictionary calls it "a body of military men." The country regards it as a faithful dog that hinders the neighbors from committing petty annoyances; orderly people pretend that it is unmanlikily; agitators will have that it is the sword of Damocles struck off in three thousand copies. Contractors consider it as an income of twelve hundred pounds per year; mathematicians, as an integral number reducible to vulgar fractions. For Bérenger it was the Sons of France; for the nursemaids of the Tuileries it is the Conservatoire of Sentiment. Mothers are sad when they see it pass; fathers are good-natured enough to fancy that it is gratuitous board and lodging which the government offers for the reception of their sons. To the school of cowards it is an enigma; to the women it is three thousand men. In all this it is possible that only the Dictionary are right.

The Hundred and First is a fine regiment. Separately, the men are not handsome; by no means. But put them together in a corps, and they are magnificent—and are they brave? Inquire of the whole army. 'Tis not along the Boulevards that you should see the Hundred and First pass; there you will think it stuck up and given to attitudinizing—two sad defects in a regiment. Here, on the high road, is the place to see it, with its cap on one side and its eye alert. It enjoys existence, laughing and singing, with its three thousand voices, at its favorite song. While it sings on its way let us have a good look at it. Take a chair. First come the supers.

To know what a super from another is a proof of remarkable perspicacity. Sappers resemble negroes in this respect, that if you know one you know all. The soldier—not to call him always by his name—with his hairy cap, his face to match, and his hatchet, reminds you of Robinson Crusoe. He wears a white gaiter, the emblem of his functions in the capacity of surenaud; you will see him soon taking out the colonel's little girl for a walk. His black and bearded head beams ineffable smiles on the little pink and white creature, who, far from being afraid of him, calls him "papa dudy dearest." If you listened to the stories which the soldier invents to amuse the child you would be highly edified. They overflow with unbridled wit. Unfortunately, the dénouement never varies. It is, to wit, the history of a little girl who, after being very well-behaved, very kind, very amiable, and very virtuous, marries at last—a general of division. Poor little thing!

Good gracious! what a handsome soldier! Pardieu! I believe so; 'tis the drum-major. I would wager my head, Sir, that you have heard that the drum-major of the Hundred and First is somewhat stupid? It is really the case; but the whole truth is, that he won't take the trouble to sharpen his wit, for he could do so when he'd they were sharp? "That sort of thing is beneath his position." Accustomed to behold humanity beneath him, he has come himself to love humanity. Envied by some, disdained by others, he remains alone—with his shoulder-belt. Even love can not regenerate him; he is loved solely for his feather and his cane. Of all the varieties of womankind he knows only the most insipid—the women who admire pay. Don't wish to step into his shoes, and stop your ears, for here are the trumpeters.

Handsome guy (three sous per day) and the certainty of making a noise in the world, render the drummer insufferably proud. In obedience to tradition, he slightly cocks his head on one side, to give himself a martial air. When he returns to his cottage, his daddy, and his pigs, he will cleverly insinuate that he renounced military honors to follow his vocation for agriculture.

The colonel is always serious and wearied out, which is perfectly comprehensible. To manage three thousand men is no trifle, and to head a regimental band play every day the same variations on Guillaume Tell is any thing but amusing. On his days of grace, with his back turned to the regiment, the colonel sees and knows every thing; what he does not know, he guesses. On returning to quarter he has enough to barracks for a couple of days number seven of the second rank, of the third company, of the second battalion, for tearing his cartridges too awkwardly; but his provincial severity will cease the moment he passes general of brigade.

The lieutenant-colonel speaks like the colonel, walks like the colonel, scolds like the colonel, laughs like the colonel, does every thing like the colonel. But he is an older man. How does this happen? Nobody knows; it lieth between Destiny and the Almanac.

The commandant of the third battalion, scarcely thirty years of age, won his epaulets and the officers' cross at the Legion of Honor in the Crimea, where he reaped glory by wagon-loads. He bears one of the most honorable names in France; he has an income of sixty thousand francs a year; and he has a young wife as fair as his fortune. Esteemed by his chiefs, beloved by the soldiers, a magnificent career is open to him. Here is more than enough to make him the happiest man in the world. Well; he is nothing of the kind. This poor commandant bears a serpent in his bosom—a chronic grief, an incurable pain. The serpent, the grief, the pain, lie in the fact that he is so much shorter than M. Thiers, the shortest of all known great men.

Among the officers of the Hundred and First is found the married officer who associates with nobody, not even with his married colleagues, because it "gives rise to gossip;" and, in the corps, half a word soon takes gigantic proportions. It is an unlucky day when Captain Michel calls on Captain Baudoin, and asks: "Captain, is it true that you said that I said my wife told me that Captain Laudry's wife had told her that her husband wore stays?" The cause of fortune has no fortune at all. The serious officer employs his time in studying theory, administration, and manœuvres. One type has all but disappeared from the French army; namely, the loud, braggart, coarse officer, finding fault with every thing in season and out of season. Every day Atticism is gaining ground. The Crimean war gave the last blow to boastfulness and insolence. Why need a man boast, when he has shown solid proofs of courage? What is the use of putting on threatening looks and staring right and left with an ever-knitted brow, when all the world knows how redoubtable you are if occasion require?

The sergeants constitute three categories: the sergent who has only seven years' service, the sergent who has fourteen, and the chargent who has one-and-twenty.

The sergent is a badly-drawn portrait, with a feeble outline of the features. He combines simperlotsism with presumptuousness. In the novelty of his relative superiority, he feels an immoderate craving to display his full authority; he worries the soldier. He is a martinet. Never does he come to the chamber without having punished his man. The French soldier never murmurs; he sings, which is his revenge. The sergent has the painter turned his heels, when the light breeze wafts to his ear the finale of the Vexed Sergeant:

> And, mmmaplan,
> To what you call
> Lieutenants two
> Are higher than you:
> So, while we can,
> Sing vivamaplan.

His looks are sombre, he bolls with rage, but he holds his tongue for fear of being taken for a vexed sergeant.

The sergent is quite a different person. A perfect trooper, serving for the love of the art, conscious of his value, nothing moves, nothing surprises, that which astonishes others only makes him roost at arms—pronounce provoo—he takes a part in every duel. In the regiment, they fight more readily than in the navy. "Ah, my dear, once again to another," "You are an awkward fellow!" it is sufficient. The proper steps are taken. Arrived on the ground, the sergent measures out the swords. Then one of them, laying his sword-guard on his heart, says, "Begin, Monsieur."

Certainly, he is the other, with courtesy.

"To oblige you," resumes the first, stretching his legs, almost wide enough to split himself.

The jacket flies over the point of crossing. The sergent advances, and gravely pronounces the following speech, which never varies:

"Gentlemen, I am about to begin you ought to know that, from the remotest times of antiquity, even as far back as the Romans, the diverse disputes of honor have always been decided by arms, notably by the foil, which is the noblest, without wishing here to humiliate the sabre in any way. But before proceeding to the use of the weapons of politeness, reflect that it is more beautiful to refrain from having to ask pardon of God. It is a pair of fault to have not committed it. It is a crime to have not committed it, and to avoid the greatest remorse in this worldly life. If you feel yourself to be in fault, humiliate yourself in the form of your adversary, that he may grant you pardon. In the other case, if your cause is good, fight till your very last drop of blood—remember, both fight till your very last drop of blood—remember, both fight till your very last drop of blood—remember, both

"I had rather have your word of honor."

"You have it, colonel; you have it."

On the day of the dinner the captain, in full uniform, presented himself at the colonel's, and bowed to every body without pronouncing a syllable. He ate like an ogre, to render silence less difficult. The third course was about to be succeeded by a dessert; the captain was eating a roasted woodcock; the colonel was congratulating himself at having escaped humiliating an old brother in arms.

All at once a horrible cry burst from the captain's lips. One of his grinders had been broken by a shot lodged in the woodcock's thigh.

"Sacré nom de millions de diables!" shouted the proguard, holding out with one hand the murderous shot, and with the other the woodcock's head. "This infernal brute didn't die of the measles!"

POLITICAL PRISON AT WASHINGTON.

We published in our last number a view of the political prison at New York. We now give THE POLITICAL PRISON AT WASHINGTON, where so many of the rebel sympathizers are confined. It is a building of no pretensions, and not very secure; but as yet we hear of no escapes from it.

THE MARINE CORPS AT WASHINGTON.

We publish herewith a picture—from a sketch by our special artist in Washington—of the marines drawn up in front of their barracks at Washington.

The Marine Corps was established in 1798, and has since participated in all the wars in which the country has been engaged. It took part in all the naval engagements of the war of 1812, was engaged under General Eaton in the war with Tripoli, defended Washington under Commodore Barney, went through the Creek and Florida wars under General Jessup, was engaged in all the Mexican battles, from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, under Gen. Scott, attacked the Sumatra forts, and the Barrier forts in China in 1859, and assisted in the capture of the Mirannon steamer on March 7, 1860.

The force stationed at the Washington barracks at present consists of four companies, under command of the following officers, viz.: Company A, Captain Taylor; Company B, Lieutenant Nicholson; Company C, Lieutenant Meiere; Company D, Lieutenant Collier. Commandant of Corps, Colonel John Harris.

The numerical strength of the Marine Corps has been doubled since the war broke out.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CAPTAIN BENHAM.

WASHINGTON, August 7, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

IN your late issue I find a picture "The Death of General Garnett." As the whole country has been under a misapprehension in regard to that affair, let me draw your attention to the following extract from Gen. Morris's report:

During all the time Captain Benham has had my full confidence in every thing relating to the conduct and management of the troops, and for a large portion of the time he has been in actual command of several regiments of the brigade, whatever separated from my immediate control. On three several occasions, when danger was anticipated at Philippi, I sent him up from Grafton to take command of those troops, and always to the great satisfaction of the colonels of the regiments there. On the march from Philippi to this place he led the advance with the skirmishers, and by his skilful management in this position the army was brought in here one or two hours earlier than could otherwise have been the case, and so as to effect a complete surprise upon the enemy. During the six days here he has had the direction under myself of all active operations, selecting positions for fortifying, in charge of scouts, reconnoissances, etc. On the march in pursuit of the enemy I gave him command of the advance column, the only troops that met the enemy, where his untiring perseverance in pursuit, and his judicious management in expelling the attack from the enemy, who made a stand in a strong position, was such as to effect the overthrow and route of the powerful army of Western Virginia, Jeff. Davis the General, taking his train and dispersing his entire force. He has during the whole of his services in my command exhibited abilities of the highest order, having never in a single instance committed an error, and showing qualifications eminently fit for a command of any grade that may be given him.

COLONEL TYLER'S CAMP, NEAR SUMMERSVILLE, VIRGINIA, SCENE OF THE FIGHT OF AUGUST 26.—[SKETCHED BY A MEMBER OF HIS REGIMENT.]

THE FIGHT AT SUMMERSVILLE.

We illustrate on this page the Camp occupied by Colonel Tyler, near Summersville, Virginia, where he was surprised by General Floyd on 26th ult. The Tribune's account of the affair was as follows:

On the 26th the Seventh Ohio Regiment, Colonel Tyler, while quietly breakfasting, their baggage train being about three miles in their rear, were suddenly surrounded, near Summerville, by a force of rebels, supposed to be commanded by General Floyd, numbering 3000 infantry, 400 cavalry, and having 10 guns. The attack on the Ohio boys was made on both flanks and in front simultaneously. After a brave fight, lasting some time, Colonel Tyler, finding the enemy too strong for him, ordered the approaching baggage train to be turned back toward Gauley Bridge. The regiment, numbering only 500 men, then fought their way out of the force that with such fearful odds hemmed them in, making terrible havoc among the rebels. The number of our killed we have not learned; the missing number 200. The loss on the side of the rebels must have been very great, as the slaughter was tremendous.

DEPARTURE OF REBEL PRISONERS FROM BALTIMORE.

We illustrate, on page 580, an occurrence which has given rise to much talk of late—we mean the RECEPTION AND DEPARTURE OF REBEL PRISONERS from Baltimore for Fortress Monroe. A Baltimore paper (the Sun) thus described the scene:

The fact having been announced that a party of Confederate soldiers, captured in Western Virginia, had reached this city, their head-quarters, the Gilmor House, was besieged early yesterday morning by persons who desired to administer to their comfort. Those of the party who were not well supplied with under-clothing were furnished, and those in more limited circumstances found plenty of gold in their pockets without knowing whence it came. They were generally well-educated and refined gentlemen, whose independence of character would forbid their acceptance of aid, but it was pressed upon them and put into their pockets without their knowledge. During the day they were visited by many belles of the city, each of whom took with her some little present for the comfort or convenience of the soldiers. Most of them visited various sections of the city, accompanied by citizens.

At four o'clock in the afternoon the vehicles were drawn up in front of the Gilmor House to convey them to the boat for Old Point, and a large crowd of persons were present to witness their departure. When they emerged from the house the people on the street cheered, and from almost every house in the neighborhood the handkerchiefs of ladies waved from every window. As they passed down Baltimore Street a large throng at the corner of South Street gave them three cheers. From every direction the people flocked to the wharf of the boat, until several thousands were assembled, covering the wharf, the sheds, and all the vessels lying near. The soldiers took their positions on the after-part of the upper saloon deck. At half past four o'clock the lines of the Louisiana were cast off, and as she left the wharf three cheers were given for the departing soldiers. Some of them have friends and relatives in Baltimore, and they expressed themselves delighted at the cordial reception that greeted them on every hand.

The public have commented with more freedom than kindness upon General Dix's conduct in this matter. It is said that such celebrations strengthen secession in Baltimore, and that General Banks would never have suffered them while he was in command there.

CHAPTER XVI.

IT was with a wrath suppressed in the presence of the fair ambassadress that Mr. Vigors had received from Mrs. Poynte the intelligence that I had explained Dr. Jones at Abbots' House, not less abruptly than Dr. Jones had previously supplanted me. As Mrs. Poynte took upon herself the whole responsibility of the change, Mr. Vigors did not venture to condemn it to her face; for his austere magistrate was in his heart as much in awe of that face as Authority, however legislative, always is afraid of the World, however erring, and declines to fly in the face of it.

To the mild Mrs. Ashleigh his anger was more decidedly manifested. He ceased from his visits; and in answer to a long and deprecatory letter, with which she endeavored to soften his resentment and win him back to the house, he replied by an elaborate consultation of writing and satire. He began by excusing himself from accepting her invitation, on the ground that his time was valuable, his habits domestic; and though ever willing to sacrifice both time and habits where he could do good, he owed it to himself and to mankind to sacrifice neither where his advice was rejected and his opinion contemned. He glanced briefly, but not hastily, at the reasons with which, for her kind heart, had deferred to his judgment, and the benefits which that deference had enabled him to bestow. He contrasted his husband's deference with the widow's contumely, and hinted at the evils which the contumely would not permit him to prevent. He could not repent to say what women of the world might think due to deceased husbands, but even women of the world generally allowed the claims of living children, and did not rest with levity where their interests were concerned. All lies where their lives were at stake. As to Dr. Jones, Mr. Vigors, had the fullest confidence in his skill. Mrs. Ashleigh must judge for herself whether Mrs. Poynte was as good an authority on medical science as he had no doubt she was upon shawls and ribbons. Dr. Jones was a man of caution and modesty; he did not indulge in the hollow boasts by which charlatans decoyed their dupes; but Dr. Jones had privately avowed him that though the case was one that admitted of no rash experiments, he had no fear of the result if his own prudent system was observed in. What might be the consequences of any other system Dr. Jones would not say, because he was too high-minded to express a sentiment of the rival who had made use of underhand arts to supplant him. But Mr. Vigors was convinced, from other sources of information (meaning, we may presume, the oracular presence of his clairvoyants), that the time would come when the poor young lady herself would insist on discarding Dr. Fenwick, and when "that person" would appear in a very different light to many who now so fondly admired and so reverentially trusted him. When that time arrived he, Mr. Vigors, might again be of use; but, meanwhile, though he declined to remove his seminary at Abbots' House, or to pay unavailing visits of mere ceremony, his interest in the daughter of his old friend remained undiminished, nay, rather increased by every passion; that he should silently keep his eye upon her; and whenever any thing to her advantage suggested itself to him, he should not be deterred by the slight with which Mrs. Ashleigh had treated his judgment from calling on her, and by that offence her conscience as a mother his ideas for her child's benefit, leaving to herself then, as now, the entire responsibility of rejecting an advice which he might say, without vanity, was deemed of some value by those who could distinguish between sterling qualities and specious pretenses.

Mrs. Ashleigh's was that thoroughly womanly nature which is compelled to lean upon others. She was a timid, trustful, meek, affectionate soul. Not quite justly had Mrs. Poyntz described her as "commonplace and weak," for though she might be so, the weak, it was not because she was commonplace; she had a goodness of heart, a sweetness of disposition, to which that disparaging definition could not apply. She could only be called commonplace, inasmuch as in the ordinary daily affairs of life she had a great deal of ordinary daily commonplace good sense. Give her a routine to follow, and no routine could be better adapted to it. In the allotted sphere of a woman's duties she never seemed at fault. No household, not even Mrs. Poyntz's, was more happily managed. The old Abbots' House had merged all its original antique gloom in the softer character of pleasing repose. All her servants loved Mrs. Ashleigh; all found a pleasure to please her; her establishment had the harmony of clock-work; comfort diffused itself round her like the quiet sunshine round a sheltered spot. To gaze on her pleasing countenance, to listen to the simple talk that lisped from her gentlest lips in even, slow, and silvery murmur, was in itself a respite from "eating cares." She was to the mind what the color of green is to the eye. She had, therefore, excellent sense in all that relates to everyday life. There, she needed not to consult another; there, the wisest might have consulted her with profit. But the moment any thing, however in itself trivial, jarred on the routine to which her mind had grown wedded, the moment an incident hurried her out of the beaten track of woman's daily life, then her confidence forsook her; then she needed a confidant, an adviser, and by that confidant or adviser she could be credulously lured or submissively controlled. Therefore, when she lost, in Mr. Vigors, the guide she had been accustomed to consult whenever she needed guidance, she turned, helplessly and piteously, first to Mrs. Poyntz, and then yet more imploringly to me, because a woman of that character is never really satisfied without the advice of a man. And where an intimacy more familiar than that of his formal visits is once established with a physician, confidence in him grows fearless and rapid, as the natural result of sympathy concentred on an object of anxiety in common between himself and the patient. Each opens its inered recess to his observant but tender eye. Thus Mrs. Ashleigh had shown me Mr. Vigors's letter, and forgotten that I might be not as amiable as herself, besought me to counsel her how to conciliate and soften her lost husband's friend and correspondent. Mrs. Poyntz was clothed him with dignity and awe in her soft forgiving eyes. So, smothering my own resentment, less perhaps at the slight of his insinuations against myself than at the arrogance with which this prejudiced intermeddler implied to a mother the necessity of his summoning a second child under her own care, I suggested a reply which seemed to me both dignified and placatory, abstaining from all allusion to my own offering the assurance that Mrs. Ashleigh would be at all times glad to hear, and disposed to respect, whatever suggestions Mr. Vigors might offer for her husband's would kindly submit to her for the welfare of her daughter.

There all communication had stopped for about a month since the date of my reintroduction to Abbots' House. One afternoon I unexpectedly met Mr. Vigors at the gate of the kitchen garden. I on my way to Abbots' House, and my first glance at his face told me that he was coming from it, for the expression of his face was more than usually sinister; the sullen scowl was lit into significant menace by a sneer of unmistakable triumph. I felt that I had what was needed in some machination against me, and with ominous misgivings quickened my steps.

I found Mrs. Ashleigh alone, seated herself in front of the House, under a large cedar-tree that formed a natural arbor in the centre of the sunny lawn. She was perceptibly embarrassed as I took my seat beside her.

"I hope," said I, forcing a smile, "that Mr. Vigors has not been giving you a fresh bill of his pet patient, or that she looks much worse than she did under Dr. Jones's care?"

"No," she said. "He spoke cheerfully that Lilian was grown quite strong, and said, without any displeasure, that he had heard how gay she had been; that change was beneficial, which is very kind in him—for he disapproves dancing, on principle."

"I can well believe it," said I, "for he has said nothing to vex or annoy you; and, to judge by his countenance when I met him in the lane, I should conclude that something was wrong between you before the confidence you so kindly repose in me."

"I assure you not; he did not mention your name, and was, as he always is, very civil when he him more friendly; quite like old times. He is a good man at heart, Mr. Vigors, very; and was much attached to my poor husband."

"Did Mr. Ashleigh profess a very high opinion of Mr. Vigors?"

"Well, I don't quite know that, because my dear Gilbert never spoke to me much about him. Gilbert was above talking of his friends, but from all trouble—all worldly affairs—and he left Vigors managed his estate, and inspected his stewards books, and I believe left him through a long lawsuit which he had inherited from his father. It killed his father. I don't know what we should have done without Mr. Vigors, and I am so glad he has forgiven me."

"Has Mr. Vigors forgiven you?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"Then I infer that he has not yet forgiven me. Where is Miss Ashleigh? Indoors?"

"No; somewhere in the grounds. But my dear Dr. Fenwick, do not leave me yet: you are so very, very kind, and I am so anxious to have you to look on you quite as an old friend. Something has happened which has put me out—quite put me out."

She said this wearily and feebly, closing her eyes as if she were indeed put out in the sense of extinguished.

"The feeling of friendship you express," said I, with earnestness, "is reciprocal. On my side it is accompanied with a profounder gratitude. I am a lonely man, by a lonely fireside—no parents, no near kindred, and in this town, since Dr. Easter left it, no cordial intimacy till I knew you. In admitting me so familiarly to your hearth, you have given me what I have never known before since I came to this town—a glimpse of the happy domestic life; the charm and relief to eye, heart, and spirit which is never known but to a household centre. Do not, then, suppose that thus my sentiment for you and yours is indeed that of an old friend; and in any private confidence you show me, I feel as if I were no longer a lonely man, without kindred, without home."

Mrs. Ashleigh seemed much moved by these words, which my heart had forced from my lips. And after replying to me with simple unaffected warmth of kindness, she rose, took my arm, and continued then as we walked slowly to and fro on the lawn:

"You know, perhaps, that my poor husband left a sister, now a widow like myself, Lady Haughton."

"I remember that Mrs. Poyntz said you had such a sister, but I never heard you mention Lady Haughton till now. Well!"

"Well, Mr. Vigors has brought me a letter from her, and it is that which has put me out. I dare say you have not heard me speak before of Lady Haughton, for I am ashamed to say I had almost forgotten her existence. She is many years older than my husband was; of a very different character. Only came once to see him after our marriage. Hurt me by ridiculing him as a book-worm. Offended him by looking a little down on me, as his sister, with spirit and fashion, which was quite true. And, except by a cold and unfeeling letter of formal condolence after I lost my dear Gilbert, I never heard from her since I have been a widow, till to-day. But, after all, she is my poor husband's sister, and Lilian's aunt; and, as Mr. Vigors says, 'Duty is duty.'"

Had Mrs. Ashleigh said "Duty is torture," she could not have uttered the maxim with more mournful and despondent a resignation.

"And what does this lady require of you, child?" Mr. Vigors desire it your duty to comply with?"

"Dear me! what penetration you have! You have guessed the exact truth. But I think you will agree with Mr. Vigors. Certainly I had no option; you shall see for yourself."

"My penetration is in fault now. Do what? Pray explain?"

"Poor Lady Haughton, six months ago, lost her only son, Sir James. Mr. Vigors says he was a very fine young man, whom any mother would have been proud of; I had heard he was wild. Mr. Vigors says, however, that he was just going to reform, and marry a young lady Lilian has mentioned to me, for whom, unluckily, he would ride a steeple-chase, not being quite sober at the time, and broke his neck. Lady Haughton has been, of course, in great grief. She has retired to Brighton; and she writes to me from thence, and Mr. Vigors brings the letter. He gave it to me to-day."

"Goes back to Lady Haughton?—has been to her? What, is he then so intimate with Lady Haughton as to be with her brother?"

"No; but there has been a long and constant correspondence. She had a settlement on the Lisbey estate, and has only just come of age during Gilbert's life; and a very small part of the property went to Sir James, which part Mr. Ashleigh thought it would be wise to buy the rest of the estate, wished Mr. Vigors, as his guardian, to buy during his minority, and as it was mixed up with Lady Haughton's settlement, her consent was necessary as well as Sir James's. So there was much negotiation, and, since then, Ashleigh House came into the Haughton property, on poor Sir James's decease; so, that complicated all affairs between Lady Haughton and my husband, and it was just been to Brighton to see her. And poor Lady Haughton, in short, wants me and Lilian to come and visit her. I don't like it. But you said the other day you thought sea air might be good for Lilian during the heat of the summer, and she seems well enough now for the change. What do you think?"

"She is well enough, certainly. But Brighton is not the place I should recommend for the summer; it wants shade, and is much hotter than I——"

"Yes, but unluckily Lady Haughton foresaw that objection, and she has a jointure-house some miles from Brighton, and near the sea. She says the air is perfumed with pine trees, and the place is proverbially cool and healthy, not far from St. Leonard's Forest. And, in short, I was a fool to say I will come. So we must, unless, indeed, you positively forbid it."

"When do you think of going?"

"Next Monday. Mr. Vigors would have me fix the day. If you know how I hate moving when I am once settled, and I do so dread Lady Haughton, she is so fine, and so satirical. But Mr. Vigors says she is very much altered, poor thing! I should like to show you her letter, but I had just sent it to Margaret—Mrs. Poyntz—a minute or two before you came. She knows something of Lady Haughton. Margaret knows every body. And we shall have to go in mourning for poor Sir James, I suppose; and Margaret will choose it, I am sure I can't guess to what extent we should be supposed to mourn. I ought to have gone in mourning before—poor Gilbert's nephew—but I am so stupid, and I have never seen him.—And—but oh, this is kind! Margaret herself—the dear Margaret!"

We had just turned away from the house, in our up and down walk; and Mrs. Poyntz stood contemplating us from the door.

"So, Anne, you have actually accepted this invitation—and for Monday next?"

"Yes, I—I—I suppose so."

"What does Dr. Fenwick say? Can Lilian go with safety?"

I could not honestly say she might not go with safety, but my heart sunk like lead as I answered:

"Miss Ashleigh does not now need merely the safety, but more than half her cure has depended on keeping her spirits free from depression. She has found in the cheerful companionship of your own daughter, and other young ladies of her own age; a very melancholy house, indeed, for a young girl convalescent, without other guests; a hostess to whom she is a stranger, and whom Mrs. Ashleigh herself appears to deem formidable. Certainly there do not make that change of scene which a physician would recommend. When I spoke of sea air as good for Miss Ashleigh, I thought of our own much frequented coasts, at a later time of the year, when I could escape myself for a few weeks, and attend her. The journey, too, would be shorter and less fatiguing; the air more invigorating."

"No doubt that would be better," said Mrs. Poyntz, dryly; "but so far as your objections to visiting Lady Haughton have been stated, they are groundless. Her house will not be melancholy: she will have other guests, and Lilian will fi ? companions young like herself—young ladies of young gentlemen too!"

There was something ominous, something overpassionate, in the look which Mrs. Poyntz cast upon me, in controlling her speech, that in itself was calculated to rouse the fears of a lover. Lilian away from me, in the house of a worldly but able—such as I judged Lady Haughton to be—surrounded by young gentlemen, as well as young ladies, by admirers, no doubt, of a higher rank and more brilliant fashion than she had yet known! I closed my eyes, and with strong effort suppressed a groan.

"My dear Anne, let me satisfy myself that Dr. Fenwick really does consent to this journey. He may say to me what he may not to you. Pardon me, then, if I take him aside for a few minutes. Let me find you here again under this cedar-tree."

Placing her arm in mine, and without waiting for Mrs. Ashleigh's answer, Mrs. Poyntz drew me into the more sequestered walk that belted the lawn; and, when we were out of Mrs. Ashleigh's sight and hearing, said:

"From what you have now seen of Lilian Ashleigh, do you still desire to gain her as your wife?"

"Still? Oh! with an intensity proportioned to the fear with which I now dread that she is about to pass away from my eyes—from my life!"

"Does your judgment confirm the choice of your heart? Reflect before you answer."

"I need reflect, my judgment as I had before! I knew her world, and confirms, but opposes it. The nobler judgment that now expands all my reasonings, approves and seconds my heart. No, no; do not smile so sarcastically. That is not the voice of a blind and egotistical passion. Let me explain. I myself, I can. I concede to you that Lilian's character is undeveloped. I concede to you that, amidst the childlike freshness that innocence gives her nature, there is at times a strangeness, a mystery, which I have not yet traced to its cause. But I am certain that the intellect is there, naturally as rich as the heart, and that intellect and heart will ultimately—if under happy auspices—blend in the felicitous union which constitutes the perfection of woman. But it is because she does, and may for years, may perhaps always, need a more delicate watchfulness care than would be either judiciously sensitive, that my judgment sanctions my choice; for whatever is best for her is best for me. And who would watch over her as I should?"

"You have never yet spoken to Lilian as lovers speak?"

"Oh no, indeed."

"And, nevertheless, you believe that your affection would be unreturned?"

"I thought so once—I doubt now—yet, in doubting, hope. But why do you alarm me with these fears? Has Lilian said or done that in this visit I may lose her forever?"

"If you fear that, tell her so, and perhaps her answer may dispel your fears."

"What, now—already, when she has scarcely known me a month! Might I not risk all if too premature?"

"There is no almanac for love. With many women love is born the moment they know they are beloved. With Lilian tells us that a moment once gone is irrevocable. Were I in your place I should feel that I approached a moment that I must not lose. I have said enough; now I shall rejoin Mrs. Ashleigh."

"Stay—tell me first what Lady Haughton's letter really contained to prompt the advice which you so transport, and yet so daunt, me when you proffer it."

"Not now—later, perhaps—not now. If you wish to see Lilian alone, she is by the old Monks' Well; I saw her seated there as I came that way to the house."

"One word more—only one. Answer this question frankly, for it is one of honor. Do you still believe that my rival in the widow's affections would not be disapproved by Mrs. Ashleigh?"

"At this moment I am sure it would not; a week hence I might not give you the same answer."

So she passed on, and, in her quick but measured tread, took through the shady walk to the open lawn, till the last glimpse of her pale gray robe disappeared under the boughs of the cedar-tree. Then, with a start, I broke the irresolute tremulous suspense in which I had vainly endeavored to analyze my own mind, solve my own doubts, concentrate my own views, and went the opposite way, skirting the circle of that haunted garden as now, on the other side of the terrace, the houses of the neighboring city came full and close into view, divided from my fairyland of life but by the trodden numerous thoroughfare winding low beneath the lofted parapets; and as now, again, the world of men abruptly vaulted behind the screening foliage of luxuriant June.

At last the enchanted glade opened out from the verdure, with its borders of sweet perhaps, and rose, and woodbine; and there, by the gray memorial of the gone Golden age, my eyes seemed to close upon the only human being resting spell-bound on that image which had become to me the incarnation of earth's bloom and youth.

She stood amidst the Past, backed by the fragments of walls which man had raised to seclude him from human passion, locking under those skies so obscure the secrets of the only knowledge I asked from the boundless Future.

Ah, what mockery there is in that grand word, the world's fierce war-cry, Freedom! Who has not known one period of life, and that so solemn that its shadows may rest over all life hereafter, when one human creature has over him a sovereignty more supreme and absolute than Orient servitude adores in the symbols of diadem and scepter? What crest so haughty that has not bowed before a hand which could exalt or humble? What heart so dauntless that has not trembled to call forth the voice at whose sound ope the gates of rapture or despair? That life alone is free which rules and suffices for itself. All life worfeit feiet when we love!

CHAPTER XVII.

How did I utter it? By what words did my heart make itself known? I remember not. All was as a dream but falls upon a restless, feverish night, and fades away as the eyes unclose on the peace of a cloudless heaven, or the bliss of a golden sun. A new morning seemed indeed upon the earth when I woke from a lifelong yesterday, her dear hand in mine, her sweet face bowed upon my breast.

And then there was that melodious silence in which there is no sound audible from without; yet within us there is heard a lulling celestial music, as if our whole being, made harmonious with the universe, joined from its happy deeps in the hymn that unites the stars.

In that silence our two hearts seemed to make each other understood, to be growing more near nearer, blending by mysterious concord into the completedness of a solemn union, never hence forth to be torn asunder.

At length I said, softly: "And it was here, on this spot, that I first saw you—here that I for the first time knew what power to change the world and to rule our future goes forth from the charm of a human face!"

And Lillian asked me timidly, and without lifting her eyes, how I had so seen her, reminding me that I promised to tell her, and never yet had done so.

And then I told her of the strange impulse that had led me into the grounds, and by what chance my steps had been directed upon the path that led to the glade; how suddenly her form had shone upon my eyes, gathering round itself the rose hues of the setting sun; and how wistfully those eyes had followed her own silent gaze into the distant heaven.

As I spoke her hand pressed mine eagerly, convulsively, and, raising her face from my breast, she looked at me with an intent, anxious expression. "That look!—twice before it had thrilled and perplexed me.

"What is there in that look, oh my Lillian, which tells me that there is something that Heaven lets you—something you wish to confide, and yet shrink from explaining? See how, already, I study in fair book from which alone the veil has been lifted, but as yet you must aid me to construe its language. "

"If I shrink from explaining, it is only because I fear that I can not explain so as to be understood or believed. But you have a right to know the secret of a life which you seem to link to your own. Turn your face aside from me: a reproving look, an incredulous smile, chill—and I shall guess not how fatally—but then—when I approach that which to me is so serious and so solemnly strange."

I turned my face aside, and her voice grew firmer as, after a brief pause, she resumed:

"As far back as I can remember in my infancy, there has been mingled with these what seems to full a soft, hazy veil between my sight and the things around it, thickening and deepening till it has the likeness of one of those white fleecy clouds which gather on the verge of the horizon when the air is yet still, but the winds are about to rise, and then this vapor or veil will suddenly open, as clouds open and let in the blue sky."

"Go on," I said, gently, for here she came to a stop.

She renewed, speaking somewhat more hurriedly

"Then, in that opening, strange appearances presented themselves to me, as in a vision. In my childhood these were chiefly landscapes of wonderful beauty. I could but faintly describe them then; I do not attempt to describe them now, for they are almost gone from my memory. My dear mother child me for telling her what I saw, so I did not impress it on my mind by repeating it. As I grew up this kind of vision—if I may so call it—became much less frequent, and was less distinct; I still saw the soft veil fall, the pale cloud form and open, but often what may there was my sacred was entirely forgotten when I recovered myself, waking as from a sleep. Sometimes, however, the recollection would be vivid and complete, sometimes it was the face of my last father; sometimes I heard his very voice, as I had seen and heard him in my early childhood, when he would lie down for hours beside him as he mused or studied, happy to be so quietly near him—for I loved him, oh, so dearly! and I remember him so distinctly, though I was but my sixth year when he died. Much more recently—only, indeed, within the last few months —the images of things to come are reflected on the space that I gaze into as clearly as in a glass. Thus, for weeks before I came hither, or knew that such a place existed, I saw distinctly the Old House, you trees, this sward, this moss-grown Gothic front, and, with the sight, an impression was conveyed to me that in the secret before me my old childlike life would pass into some solemn change. And when I came here, and recognized the picture in my vision, I took an affection for the spot; an affection not without awe; powerful, perplexing interest, as one who feels under the influence of a fate of which a prophetic glimpse has been vouchsafed. And in that evening when you first saw me, seated here—"

"Yes, Lilian, on that evening—"

"I saw you also, but in my vision—yonder, far in the deeps of space—and—and my head was stirred as it had never been before; and near where your image grew out from the cloud I saw my father's face, and I heard his voice, not in my ear, but as in my heart, whispering—"

"Yes, Lilian, whispering—what?"

"These words—only these—'Ye will need one another.' But then, suddenly, between my upward eyes and the two forms they had beheld, there rose from the earth, obscuring the skies, a vague dusky vapor, undulous, and coiling like a vast serpent, nothing, indeed, of its shape and figure definite, but of its face one irregular glare—a flash from two dread luminous eyes, and a young head, like the Medusa's, changing more rapidly than I could describe, and merged into a grinning skull. Then my terror made me bow my head, and when I raised it again all that I had seen was vanished. The dusky vapor still remained, even when I felt my mother's arm round me and heard her voice. And then, when I uttered the words that you have just spoken, the recollection of what I had seen—those eyes—that face—that skull—grew on me stronger and stronger. I trembled, and remembered no more till my eyes, opening, saw you by my side, an' in my wonder there was not terror; no, a sense of joy, peace, hope, yet still shadowed by a kind of fear or awe, in recognizing the countenance which had gleamed on me from the skies before the face of my last parent, and while my father's voice had murmured, 'Ye will need one another.' And now—and now—if you love me, if you have in your heart a secret in my being which I have told to no other—can not construe to myself?—only—only at last, do not mock me, do not scorn, do not believe me. Nay, turn from me no longer now: now I ask to meet your eyes. Now, before our hands join again, tell me that you do not despise me as untruthful, do not pity me as insane."

"Hush—hush!" I said, drawing her to my breast. "Of all you tell me we will talk hereafter. The scales of our science have no weights fine enough for the gossamer threads of a maiden's pure fancies. Enough for me—for us both —if out from all such illusions stare one truth told to you, lovely child, from the secrets I told to me, ruder man, on the earth—repeated by each pulse of this heart that woos you to hear and to trust, now and forever, through life into death—' Each has need of the other'—I of you—I of you! my Lillian—my Lilian!"

"THE LADIES' OWN DREAM-BOOK."

Of all those tempting books it is the function of thought to investigate, there are none, perhaps, possessing a more universal interest for all mankind than those which treat of the second immaterial world—the world of spirits, of omens, of superstitions, and dreams—becomes the subject of our speculations. What is not here contained of strange and inexplicable dreams? Who has not been pursued by such dreams during the day succeeding their occurrence? Who has not been guilty in such matters, on which profound dependence might be placed? Such a guide, confident, unerring, and authoritative, is "The Ladies' Own Dream-book."

In this precious volume the subjects on which we feel regulated are treated of and commented, or reflected to dream are found alphabetically arranged, so that the favored victim of nightmare, starting from his couch at midnight, has not even time to get to light a candle, and, turning to the subject of his dream, may put himself at once out of his misery, or into it, as the case may be. It would be useless to attempt to deny that, according to the opinion of "The Ladies' Own Dream-book," there are certain things which it is by no means desirable to dream about, and which augur all sorts of impending horror to the dreamer.

The very first word in the list (adders) is an instance of the kind. Let us see what we have got to expect if we should happen to dream about adders:

ADDERS.—To dream of these venomous reptiles are a bad omen: they signify you have enemies who are endeavoring to do you harm. To kill them, signifies the same thing, signifies you will experience some misfortune; but if you destroy them, you will overcome your enemies.

Under the head of "awning," let us see what we have:

AWNING.—To dream that you are sitting under an awning is a sign that you will shortly leave the country most likely for abroad. If you are walking under an awning out of the heat of the sun, that you will prosper there.

The use of a dream-book for the young person is very remarkable, and seems to imply that the dreamer will either abandon his country to be seized upon and appropriated by others, or that he will be in such a position as to bequeath his native land as a legacy to that portion of the globe. This is, indeed, giving prophecy a like an interpretation of a dream. If such results as these are to follow all dreams upon the subject of awnings, it will surely become necessary to appoint a select committee Mr. Edgington and all other tent-makers to keep their shutters up, and not expose longer to the public gaze any thing that could be made into a bale of canvas to the British dreamer. But we have not done with the letter A. Let us see what dreaming about ale-houses signifies. It is impossible, too, to name a time in the twenty-four hours when the visitation is more likely to occur than at the break of day.

We come now to a very remarkable announcement indeed, the latter part of which, especially, is environed with mystery:

ABUNDANCE.—To dream of abundance shows that you will experience great prosperity; and that your future husband will be true to you: and you will have many children, who will be a blessing to you; but if you sell any part you will be crossed in business.

Gracious Heavens! what does this mean? "If you sell any part you will be crossed in business?"

Let us approach this matter in a familiar manner. This is "The Ladies' Own Dream-book," and the lady here addressed is obviously supposed to be in business. It would be delightful to know in what branch. Is she in the clandlery line, or is it tobacco? It might be licensed victualling; but there is no end to conjecture on the subject. She is in business; she will be courted and won by an exemplary young man, who will be true to her, and by whom she will have many children; but if she sells any part she will be crossed in business. Sells any part of what? Her children obviously! "Crossed," too, in business; we have all of us heard of being crossed in love, but never, surely, in business.

Business, however, is forever in the mind of the distinguished compiler of "The Ladies' Own Dream-book," and, notwithstanding the spectacular subject of the work, is rather remarkable. The allusions, throughout, to business are continual, and of very pithy nature. We have already considered this in the case of the dream on abundance, but this is only one instance among many, as shall be presently shown.

BAKING.—To dream that you are baking bread is a good sign; if you are in business, you will most assuredly prosper: if you are not in business, the chances are the reverse; but should the bread be burned, it portends assault by enemies, perhaps loss by misfortune.

Thus we see how a dream, which commences hopefully, may, by a very small change in its course, become fatal to the dreamer—like the whole hinging on the question whether the loaf which he has engaged with in our dream should turn to the black-lead or to the brown. We find "business" again alluded to in another portion of our manual, but in this case the dream suggestion of another kind is forced upon our attention:

CROSSING.—To dream of cucumbers denotes recovery to the sick, and success to the unfortunate; but if you are in love, you will marry the present object of your affections: the same applies to melons.

Now does not a suggestion such as this open an enormous field of conjecture as to what may be done in the way of cultivating auspicious dreams? And the young man in love, for instance, who wishes to succeed in business, after reading the above, proceed straightway to get himself a gigantic cucumber. Let him, by way of contemplating it from every conceivable point of view, and, finally, let him eat the whole of it for his supper, and immediately retire to bed. Between the latent vals of indigestion the young tradesman is not unlikely to get a nap in the course of which he will the cucumber, which is reading his entrails, may dance for a moment before his mind's eye. Once this happen, and the thing is made. He wakes up dyspeptic, probably for life, but with a blissful consciousness that a "moderate success in trade" had what is termed "thrown itself upon him," and secured to him during the remainder of his career. If, however, the young tradesman could manage to introduce a melon into his little dream, there is no end to the prosperity which he might expect, for see what is said on this subject:

EGGS.—To dream you are buying eggs is a favorable omen, to denote that you are going in also lucky; you will be happy in marriage, have many children, and do well.

There are, however, some things which we should be as carefully refrain from our sleeping thoughts, as we should be to cultivate others. Let us, by all means, beware of Hares, for "to see hares is pain and agony." Hanging," again, "indicates generally misfortunes and chagrin." "Ravens denote disaster, adultery, death, and enemies;" while if "a person that you see hidden at work you may expect treachery and deceit. "Onions" denote much suffering; and as to comets:

COMETS.—To dream of comets is a sign of war, plague, famine, and sickness; but if a business man receive information of his hope; to the farmer, failure of his crop; and to the seaman, shipwreck. Advise all persons to change, if possible, your present place of residence.

This last piece of advice, given, as it appears to be, to persons on shipboard, seems somewhat crucial. There are many, doubtless, so situated, who would gladly change, provided; but where are they to go? The natural answer to the question is—overboard.

While on the subject of evil dreams, it may be well to mention that "needles are a sign of hatred; to thread a needle is loquietude;" while "to dream that you have lost a sin unlucky omen—it is a sign you will meet with many misfortunes."

Among the remarkable phenomena which strike one in perusing the pages of "The Ladies' Own Dream-book," may be classed the peculiar views held by the compiler as to the subjects which people are in the habit of dreaming of. Thus we are informed that "to dream you are sitting on the top of a church denotes vain hopes." Does any man ever dream of sitting on the top of a church? Does any one ever dream of coals, which, it seems, "is a sign of riches?" It is difficult, too, to say what is signified by a coffin, once for all, attention may be called to his peculiar grammatical idiosyncrasies, that "to dig up an iron pot a great earnest." Surely it is unnecessary to expose that any body ever dreams of digging up an iron pot. Did the reader, again, ever dream that he was a fool?

FOOLS.—To dream you are a fool is a very favorable omen, and imports much good to the dreamer; expect to be successful in your undertakings. If a maiden dreams that she is foolish, it is a certain sign that she will soon be married to the man she loves.

But perhaps, of all the outrageous things that a lady can be expected to dream about, the most unintelligibly unlikely is the one we look-done. Yet this contingency is thought by our sage to be worthy of especial notice:

To dream of the look-bees is a lucky omen—it denotes health and prosperity in all your undertakings; if you are in love, your sweet-heart will be faithful, and you are very happy; it also denotes that you will have many children, and be very happy. To dream you have swarm of bees on your back denotes that some legacy will fall to you, and that you will unexpectedly become rich; if you are in love, you will marry the object of your affections; if you are in business you will shortly see the woman who is to be your wife; and to a woman, that she will soon see the man destined to be her husband, and they will become lovers, and be very happy.

We will give a few mere quotations from our oracle for the reader's comfort and advantage, begging, in passing, to call his attention to the patriarchal manner in which this interpreter of dreams invariably connects happiness and a large family as inseparable things:

KITTENS.—To dream of kittens is a favorable dream, your marriage will be prosperous, and thus you will have many children.

DRUNKENNESS.—To dream you are drunk is loss in business; to see others in love; to a woman it denotes she will be beloved by a stranger; and to a man it denotes that he is beloved by a woman whom he does not at present think of.

FINGERS.—If you dream you have cut your fingers, if they bleed: is a good omen; you will be successful in love and get money when you least expect it; if you dream they do not bleed, then it denotes damage by a variety of accidents, and that lawsuits will attend you.

ARMY.—To dream of military prosperity: to join, unsettled life; to hear it play many tunes, that you will be happy; distinction, military honors.

RINGS.—To dream you ride with a company of men is very lucky and profitable, but with women it signifies misfortune and deceit.

SERVANTS.—To dream you are shaved denotes disappointment and crosses.

THIEF.—To dream your teeth fall out is good; to put them in, unlucky; to break them, vexation; decayed or rotten are good tidings; good teeth, troubles and sorrow; short teeth, prosperity.

ANTS.—To dream of this relation is a happy omen, provided she is not angry with you; but if she frowns on you, you must expect to be met with some misfortune.

UNCLE.—To dream you see your uncle, denotes in a great measure upon the temper you see him in; if he looks favorable upon you, it is a good dream; if on the contrary, you will have many trials to overcome.

We will now leave this portion of the interesting volume we have been considering, with one word of expostulation. Under the word "dressing," we find that "to dream you see any one beheaded" denotes, among other things, "that if you are in prison you will speedily gain your liberty." The insertion of this clause seems to have been an ill-considered proceeding, calculated to shake the readers confidence in the key, a work of research devoted to meet the exigencies of "ladies" who are committed for fourteen days to the House of Correction is scarcely calculated to find favor with the general public.

The concluding portion of "The Ladies' Own Dream-book" is devoted to matters of even greater importance than those we have been already engaged with. Arrived at his last page, the author, from having been what simply an interpreter of dreams, launches forth into a wider and deeper field, and displaying before his disciples the black mirror of destiny, bids them take courage and behold. The Book of Fate is printed on a single page, and shall be given entire, for the benefit of those who are not fond of the study of dream-truths.

Reader! On what day wert thou born? Peruse this page and tremble.

Concerning Children born on any day of the Week.

SUNDAY.—The child born on a Sunday will obtain great riches and be happy in the married state.

MONDAY.—Not very successful, irresolute, subject to be led away by others, and willing to do every thing to his power (nice fellow).

TUESDAY.—The person born on this day must guard starts of passion and be easily reconciled; and he will be in danger of dying by violence if he does not put a constant guard upon himself.

WEDNESDAY.—He will be given to study, and exist to Dorchester, during the usual day of the number of the Book of Fate.)

THURSDAY.—The child born will attain great riches and honor.

FRIDAY.—The child will be of a strong constitution and amorous.

SATURDAY.—In an unlucky day, but the child may come to good, though they are in general of an evil disposition.

Signs of a Handsome, Chill, and Ugly Person.

1. The forehead large, fleshy, plain, and smooth.
2. The hair thick, curling, and shining.
3. The countenance expressive of joy or content.
4. The voice sweet.
5. The motion of the body slow, etc.

Signs of a Churlish, Rough-hewn, and Ill-natured Person.

1. The form of the body both meagre and lean.
2. The hair thin, scanty, lanken, and wrinkled.
3. The eyes cast down and malicious.
4. The voice rough.
5. Walking a short, quick, and uneven pace.
6. Secret treachery and deceit. Equal to a wife.

The reader now knows the worst. He knows that if he were born on a Monday, a Tuesday, or a Saturday, he is not to be married at all; likewise, by close observation of himself, whether he is a civil and courteous, or a churlish and rough-hewn person, though he will know this last without much pain little. He knows that if he has "a nimble tongue" he had better hold it; that he must beware of a short, quick pace in taking his constitutional; and that he must not enliven his walk by "muttering to himself." He must cultivate, moreover, a fleshy forehead, and avoid eye, a slow motion of the body, etc., though what peculiar quality this same "etc." may indicate is less clearly shown than might be wished. Let us take our leave of this awful volume, heartily wishing the reader a fleshy forehead, a moist eye, and pleasant dreams about his or her back-bone.

THE ARMY FORGE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ARMY FORGE IN CAMP.

AMONG the many appliances necessary to a complete battery of artillery or corps of cavalry in the field, none is more interesting or picturesque than the ARMY FORGE, a drawing of which we give on the previous page. It consists of a four-wheel carriage, containing in its various compartments all the tools and implements necessary for the outfit of a blacksmith, and can be set up and made ready for operation in the time necessary to cut a block of wood large enough to answer the purpose of a base for the anvil. The front portion, or limber, is precisely the same as the limber of the caisson or caisson, being simply a box about four feet long by two in width, in which is carried the anvil, tongs, and other implements, together with a limited supply of iron, etc., necessary for immediate use. On the rear wheels is mounted a box, in which is contained, as we believe, worked by a key on the outside. In front of this, and on the same platform, is a cast-iron ash-pan for the fire, from which rises a sheet-iron apron or back. On the stock is a vice large enough and of sufficient strength for all ordinary purposes. Back of the box is a receptacle for coal, which is strapped flat, but can be removed at pleasure. The whole is arranged in a very compact form, and when on the road occupies no more space than a cannon or caisson, and is drawn by four or six horses. The men ride upon the limber-box, and are members of the corps to which they are attached, being subject to the same discipline, and recipients of the same privileges and immunities. The convenience and advantage of such an attachment is obvious. Let us suppose that on the march a cannon, in crossing a ditch or traversing a rough road, is disabled by the breaking of some portion of the iron or wood work of the carriage. It is drawn to one side, the forge drives up, is unlimbered, and in less time than it takes to describe it, a smithy is improvised, a fire kindled, and the accident remedied without delay to the balance of the battery. When in camp a shoeing forge would be selected, and here the forge is unlimbered and the smiths set at work shoeing horses and repairing damages during the intervals of drill and discipline. In case of a sudden attack or the necessity of rapid movement the tools are gathered together, the forge limbered up and ready for the march as soon as any other carriage in the battery.

THE WAY TO PUT DOWN THE REBELLION.

THE effect produced by the capture of the Hatteras forts should teach us that the expedition has been a blow struck in the right quarter. It seems to have spread consternation throughout Virginia and North Carolina. The papers are frantic with terror, and assist their readers to lose not a moment in hurrying their "portable property," i. e., slaves, to the interior. It is very easy to advise this begin, but it will be difficult to act on the advice. For the planters of the whole sea-board are to convey their "portable property" into the interior, it will be necessary to give that "property" food. Slaves can not be conveniently fed away from the plantations; and if they are idle, the agricultural system which rests on slave labor must go to the wall. Peace at any price would be better for the Southern slaveowners than such a disturbance of their homes.

But if the blow that struck is to have this salutary effect, it must be followed up. There are other inlets—north of South Carolina—which should be occupied and closed up. Two or three points on the South Carolina coast invite early attention: a sharp blow struck at the mouth of the Port Royal River would be severely felt. There is a town of the same name in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. It is not necessary that permanent landings should be effected. A point might be occupied to-day, and evacuated as soon as the enemy had gathered in force to resist the occupation. All that is necessary is that the rebels should be convinced of the inconvenience of carrying on the war; that it can be best impressed on their minds by the manœuvres of a flying squadron, here to-day, elsewhere to-morrow, every where swift, resistless, mobile, and full of danger to "portable property." A few months of this régime would convince the substantial men of the South that they had gained nothing by throwing off their allegiance to the Union.

If our leaders are guided by the principles of common sense they will attack the enemy where they are weak and not where they are strong. To march against their entrenchments and expose our infantry to the murderous fire of the guns they have stolen from us, is to attack them where they are strong. To molest their homes and jeopard their "personal property" is to attack them where they are weak. The Administration has now to choose between the two methods.

THE NATIONAL LOAN.

By the time these lines are before the public the new United States Treasury Notes, bearing 7.30 per cent. annual interest, will be offered for sale throughout the loyal region. We expect that they will be freely subscribed for.

There are several reasons why these Treasury Notes should be liberally taken.

In the first place, patriotism requires it. The present atrocious rebellion can not be put down without money. Money can not be had except by general subscriptions to these Treasury Notes. If they are not taken, the republic is gone, and all the interests of which it is the safeguard are worthless. We have no country, in fact, unless this rebellion is suppressed, or, in other words, unless the means of suppressing it are provided by the people. Every man who loves the Union, who desires to see it last, who has any property to be injured by the prevalence of anarchy among us, or who has any love for the old monarchy, the old flag, and the old nation, will best testify his regard for them by subscribing—to the extent of his means—to the United States Treasury Notes.

And, secondly, interest prompts to the general investment of money in these Treasury Notes. They offer an income of 7.30 per cent. on the sum invested. This is equivalent to 8 and 6 per cent. Such stocks as those of New York State, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York City, Boston, etc., offer only 5 or 6 per cent. The mortgage bonds (firsts) of such leading railways as the Central and Erie do not offer quite 6 per cent. First-class railway mortgages only offer 7, and if the creditor wants his money, he must wait till the bond matures, and then go through a long and expensive hawk to obtain it. There is no investment in the market which offers as large an income as 7.30 per cent., with a reasonable security.

If, therefore, the people of the United States are patriotic, or if they are thrifty, they will take the new Treasury Notes. We believe they are both, and we therefore expect that before the award of the second instalment of fifty millions the whole of the first fifty will be placed.

THE LOUNGER.

POSTING THE BOOKS.

IF Jefferson Davis is dead, it is only one of many recent facts which must make sober men who are engaged in the rebellion sadly skeptical of their future.

The first is, that with such a tremendous start they have gone no further.

The second is, that their greatest success in the field was unknown to them at the time, so dearly did it cost them, and has not been of the slightest service since.

The third is, that the division at the North, upon which they securely counted, is more hopeless every day.

The fourth is, that the eager taking of the popular loan invests every man's private interest and the welfare of his family in the success of the Government.

The fifth is, that the Government becomes daily more vigorous, and is enabled to secure the triumph of every movement.

The sixth is, that the want of various necessaries of life will pinch more sharply as the winter advances.

The seventh is, that the cotton is further from a market then ever.

The eighth is, the deep conviction of every thoughtful man who studies the facts and who has human nature, that the longer the rebellion prolongs the war the more ruinous it will become to the vanquished party.

You may push on and name as many reasons as a Puritan preacher had heads to his discourse, and a very few are enough. The good sanity of the citizens who wish and mean that their Government shall be maintained have no intention of dividing the country and will resist their constitutional rights to an armed faction. If that faction can overthrow the Government it will establish itself over the whole country. But that inevitable result becomes more and more evident, the rebels can easily understand the scope of the war they have set themselves. They can readily infer whether the loyal citizens of the North are likely to give it up because they are tired. History does not record. They can see and feel whether there are any signs of fatigue or failure upon our side. They can ask themselves if the victories are to be of the Bull Run kind, how soon they are like to succeed in ruining our system. With their cease closing—with our blockade effectual—with nations of them upon the East and West—with their best privateers gone, and no more possible—with their leader dead (if it be so)—with the whole country unanimous and fully aroused against them—with the hope of English and French interference growing daily dimmer—with the spirit of every kind constantly diminishing, their credit gone, their money spent, and winter settling upon them, they may pray for the Day of Judgment for the year upon the 20th of December—the anniversary of South Carolina secession—or they may strike the balance for the half year since the President's proclamation to October 15, and even the famous financier Cobb would tell them, if he spoke truly, that the concern was bankrupt, dishonored, and dead.

A LETTER TO ENGLAND; NOT BY AN LL.D.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I have at length succeeded in quietly making up my mind, that it is useless to expect any Englishman to understand our war. It would seem, at first blush, that people whose ancestors have always been engaged in civil war might easily see that a civil war here, of itself, neither proved nor disproved any thing. Your Jacobite troubles, the rising of '45, and the march of Prince Charlie upon Edinburgh, were not held, I believe, to prove that English system a failure, nor show that a monarchy is incompetent either to prevent or repress disaffection, treason, and rebellion. Cromwell's absolute success might have been considered tolerably strong evidence—but King Charles came back again. The landing and march of Monmouth in turn—in this country, at least—opposed to be a valid argument against monarchy; nor the expulsion of James, and happy coronation of the Dutch Prince as English King.

The nation is now, as yours has been constantly, engaged in civil war. The Government is maintaining its power by force of arms, assisted by those who dare every thing but fighting against their country. You in England tranquilly sneer, and say to us, "Why don't you give it up?" Why don't you let them have their way? Your principle is that people shall do as they want to."

No, my friend, you mistake. Your principle in England, I believe, is that every body shall do as he wants to, subject to the Constitution of England. Ours in America is precisely the same: with this advantage, that we know what our Constitution is, and you do not know what yours is, for it is only a series of precedents. The American principle is not individual license, it is Constitutional liberty; and we had always supposed that of England to be the same. But we had supposed, farther, that that community of political faith and practice was the deepest bond, with our community of race, between us. But it appears that this is no bond whatever, and there is not a thoughtful or humane man in the country who does not deeply regret it.

You say, "Why don't you give it up? For the same reason that England didn't give it up in any of her civil wars—the necessity of national unity.

You ask, "Why don't the rebels go?" For the same reason that you would not let London go, or Wales, or the County of Kent, even if a majority of them were to declare that they should seriously go. For the same reason, nationally, that would prevent you, individually, from suffering your body to be cut into pieces by a thirty-four piece.

If London or Yorkshire should defy the English Government, we should do exactly what you have done, if we were strong enough. And the rebels equally belligerents, and hold ourselves neutral, and in every way aware at the blundering crash of the impossible English monarchy, which from its beginning has been only awaiting this day. We might have sent sensation reporters to describe battles they did not see. We might have peered that, if the English Government were waging a war for the miners or the factory operatives, we should have had some sympathy, and a purely political war was perfectly decent, and futile, and stupid. If you will look at the street and most rabid reforms of every kind were dependent upon order and government, while every man's life, liberty, and property were menaced by anarchy, we might have stared at you, and said: "I dare say; but you've made your bed, and you mustn't squirm at lying in it."

These things, mutatis mutandis, you have done and do. Of course it is not every Englishman who says or writes as you do. Not every newspaper. Not your Daily News, and Star, and others have been no less eloquent in their statement than just in their appreciation of the case. But the great mass of the journals that we see in this country, and the official voice of your Government, all speak in this strain. We are constantly startled, I allow, to English criticism. Mr. Roebuck's late sneer at us is not without reason. But I think that you, or any other Englishman, will not, upon reflection, find it to be altogether an ignoble susceptibility.

This younger nation, striking for liberty under law, had a right to your sympathy. Doubtless we forgot that you might be unable at first to understand the bearings of the contest; and many of us were sure that you would see just how it was, your hesitating, deprecating, or worse tone would change. In that we have been disappointed. But the disappointment is yours. I think that you must feel very rich when you can afford to lose so lightly the treasure of a nation's sympathy and good-will. Good-by.

A NEW COMEDIAN.

IT is interesting to step out of the whirl of public affairs and look into an entirely different world, as the couple do in Mr. Boucicault's new piece at Broadway into the Winter Garden. Mr. Clarke has been playing there. You do not know the name of Mr. Burton? You had you passed an hour in the theatre you would never have forgotten it.

Mr. Clarke is a comedian fitted of unquestionable genius. He is a comic actor; but it is not genteel comedy, nor broad comedy, nor grotesque comedy, nor farce, but it has a touch of them all. It is pure nature: joyous, elegant, intellectual, and of the most delicate, sensitive, pure humor. The purity of his comedy is of the same quality as that which we find in Dickens or Irving. It is not clouded with a moral purpose: it is fun for the sake of fun; but so human and the moral will out.

Our late great comedian, Mr. Burton, was properly a farceur. His was grotesque. He was, in the good sense, a low comic. He was one of the direst men possible. No "Toodles" will ever excite so much and so continued laughter as Burton's. But he was not a comedian artist. You did not believe that rare, intellectual delight in seeing him which is the greatest charm whether of tragic or comic acting. You always knew about where he was coming. You knew about what he was going to do. There was a touch of disgust. Yet he was one of the most truly amusing actors who has ever played in New York; and he may be considered with Mr. Clarke simply to indicate a difference.

The remarkable quality of this gentleman's acting is its naturalness. Of course it is the naturalness of genius, but a genius of acute perception. No part could prove it more than that of Toodles. There are but two scenes in that sketch. The first is the interview between Mr. and Mrs. Toodles and the sailor, the other is the drunken scene. In the first you, who have been used to Burton's unctuous extravaganza, will be so surprised and delighted to find that it is possible to give an equally good and entirely new rendering of the flimsy part, will look on with sober and incredulous amusement. The famous P in Thompson passes unseen; but when Mrs. Toodles begins to tell the story "the fond a brother," and proceeds to hang him upon the forepaw of the rudder, Mr. Clarke's Toodles is unspeakably droll. The aching agony of astonishment which overpowers him—which makes him bend and double himself with his back to the audience, while every particle of his frame is as drunk with laughter as it is in the next scene with liquor, is one of the most comical scenes ever conceivable.

Then he is the best drunken man that we ever seen. There is a law even in the whim and incoherence of intoxication, and Mr. Clarke's Toodles is strictly bound by it. The deliciously funny drunkenness of Burton was directly addressed to the spectator. He poked the fun at you. Clarke's is in the nature of things. He is too drunk to have any consciousness of observation; except the glimmering light of sensibility and sense which any sober man who is not a mere sot, always has. It is not so laughable as he is true. Therefore, as a drunken man is more true to nature than any burlesquer of his conduct, altogether funny, but rather the cause of sobriety in the spectator, so you look at this man with a solid, and not a hollow, laugh, but a tear and sense of shame close behind. Burton's Toodles made believe drunk; but Clarke's is drunk indeed. It took the eloquent Gough with his own weapons. It is holding the mirror up to nature so exactly that you get just the impression which nature gives you of her weaknesses; and if the spectator can do you any good—voilà!

The same evening he played the farmer in "Speed the Plough." Supposing that he would not appear until the after-piece, we, who had no bill and had not looked on incautiously until the hearty, joyous repose and completeness of the personation showed that a most excellent artist was before us. Mr. Clarke's Dutch farmer has the play of humor, intellectual perception, and natural elegance, Mr. Clarke is a comedian of the best and truest school, and by far the most artistic that has been seen upon those boards since Rachel.

THE IRS IN THE WAY.

IF the late Democratic Convention at Syracuse had adopted as its platform the first three resolutions of its committee;

If it had not elaborately destroyed all their force by the resolutions that follow;

If it had nominated a ticket of men of all parties, who would gladly endorse those three resolutions;

If it had given no countenance to treason, and no sympathy, and moral aid to rebellion, as it did in several of its resolutions;

If Mr. Redfield had made such a speech as Mr. Ogden made;

If it had for one moment forgotten party in devotion to the country;

If the great mass of thoughtful citizens in the State had perceived no confidence in the leaders who manipulated the Convention;

If they could forget what these same leaders have used the war to play a desperate game for the aggrandizement of their party at the very moment that the existence of the Government is threatened;

If the great body of the people of the State were not resolved to repudiate all party purpose, postpone all party action, and renounce every party name and,

If those people had not made up their minds to intrust the government of this State at the next election to men whom they believe to be more or less worst of enemies, not friends in disguise, and who are therefore bent upon repressing the rebellion unconditionally and finally, why then there might be some chance that the purely partisan ticket of the late Democratic Convention would get several votes.

SELECT VARIETIES OF TREASON.

THAT Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, is a friend of Mr. Breckinridge's of the same State, is fully proved by the message the former has recently sent to the Legislature. The principle which controls the political efforts of them is the most severe the enemy in the best way that circumstances allow.

If, for instance, you are an editor in New York, you must fill your paper with the most vivid pictures of the horrors of war, omitting to mention that and who began war, and so enforced either submission or resistance. If you are a Senator in Congress, you must denounce that you are for the most energetic measures for the speedy suppression of the motives of those who are defending their Government from destruction, than you are by packing up and going to Richmond where you belong. If you are Governor of a State, you are to refuse the requisitions of the National Administration because you call them unconstitutional. You are to declare your State neutral, while you give all possible aid and comfort to the rebellion. And finally, you are to assume and state the essential absurdity of secession, that a State is sovereign against the United States.

These are the parts for traitors within our lines to play. These are the parts they are playing and have played. This is Mr. Magoffin's philosophy which assumes that the rebellion is successful, that the Union is gone, that every State may follow suit, and where it pleases, which is the absurd and undeniable consequence of the other two positions), and that Maryland, to secure the commercial supremacy to which Baltimore is entitled, ought to go with the rebels.

They are assertions which force upon every honest mind the conviction that the National Government, within its sphere, is absolutely supreme over all the citizens, or it is not. If it be so, there is no such thing as State independence and neutrality, any more than county, or town, or individual neutrality. If it be not, the laws of the United States are waste paper and its Government moonshine.

Either that Government bears authoritatively upon every individual citizen in regard to the interests of the whole country, or it operates "by your leave," and when you do not choose to obey, the Government, so far as you are concerned, is at an end.

The Kentucky and Maryland Treaty is absolutely the theory of Jeff Davis and the conspirators; and the ninth resolution of the partisan Democratic Convention in this State is like unto it. Tho war thank Heaven! will clear up all that cloud. We shall come out of it a strong, united, undisputed and indisputable nation; or we shall come out of it a loose group of States that do not know whether they compose a nation or whether they are partners at pleasure. Absolute nationality or anarchy will be the result of the war.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MRS. ROCHEFOUCAULD'S MAXIMS.

HEARTLESS youths are most prone to vanity and self-sufficiency. So we have often seen older their whickers over a great deal of their cheek.

Men should never choose a flirt for a wife, be she fair as Venus. The sagacious housewife avoids the fruit that has been blown-off.

It is difficult to hide one's vanity; but it is more difficult still to avoid a grimace.

Refinement covers a multitude of impropriettes.

Some women blush to prove true that they have a little modesty left.

When a female friend asks your advice about a lover say that he is not worthy of her, and counsel her to reject him. She will surely refuse the compliment you pay her, and the lover may fall to your lot into the bargain.

There are a variety of sad mad sighing reasons.

A looking-glass never pays compliments, but it enables us to win them.

We are "very happy to see" people whom we detest, and "very much delighted" to perform acts from force or nuisance. We return thanks for the kind inquiries of acquaintances who have not the least interest in us, and when we rather dislike them otherwise.

A woman will tell a secret to you, "because you're different"—but to nobody else.

We triumph upon our fallen sister to show the world how firm of feet we are ourselves.

There is no bitterest enemy. He makes us wear caps.

Children are mile-stones that tell the world the distance a woman has traveled from her youth.

HOW THREE FISHERS WENT SALEERING.

Three Mothers sat talking, we lived at the Week—

The West end—at that oldest sun went down,

Each thought him the farthest that she liked the best,

For the girl who had watched him all over the Town.

For men must get women will weep—

And their dress is expensive, and many to keep,

A little boy had lived for some time with a very penurious uncle, who was one day walking out, with the child at his side, when a friend accosted him, accompanied by a greyhound. The little fellow, never having seen a dog of so slim and slight a texture, clasped the creature round the neck with the impassioned cry, "Oh, doggie, doggie! and div ye live wi' your uncle, too, that you are so thin?"

A sailor who had served on board the Romans, with Sir Home Popham, after coming home from India, finding that wigs were all in fashion, bespoke a rat one, which he imported at Portsmouth, to the great surprise of its compatriots. On being asked the cause of the change of color in his hair, he said it was occasioned by his bathing in the Red Sea.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A LETTER FROM THE CLAN.

The Russian Minister, M. De Stoeckl, had an audience of the President on Saturday, and read to him the following dispatch:

"St. Petersburg, July 31, 1861.

"M. De Stoeckl.

"SIR,—From the beginning of the conflict which divides the United States, the Emperor has been desirous to make known to the Federal Government the deep interest with which our sovereign was following the development of a crisis which puts in question the prosperity and even the existence of the Union.

"The Emperor profoundly regrets to see that the hope of peaceful solution of the difficulties which the American colonies already in arms are ready to let loose upon their country is the most formidable of the enemies of political society in a civil war. For more than eighty years that it has existed the American Union owes its independence, its lowering rise and its progress to the concord of its members, always united under the auspices of its illustrious founder, by the union which have been able to reconcile the Union with every party. This Union has been faithful. It has established on the world the spectacle of a prosperity without equal in the annals of history. It would be deplorable that, after so marvelous an experience, the United States should by mutual fault of the solemn compact, which, up to this time, has made their power. In spite of the diversity of the constitutions and of their interests, and perhaps even because of their diversity. Providence seems to urge them to draw over the traditional bond which is the basis of the very condition of their political existence. In any event, in every case which they might impose upon themselves to maintain it are beyond comparison with those which dissolution would bring after it.

United, they perfect themselves; isolated, they are paralyzed.

THE EMPEROR ADVISES COMPROMISE.

"The struggle which unhappily has just arisen can neither be indefinitely prolonged nor lead to the total destruction of one of the parties. Sooner or later it will be necessary to come to some settlement. Whatever it may be which may cause the divergent interests now actually in conflict to cocrist. The American nation would then give a proof of high political wisdom in seeking in common such a settlement before a useless effusion of blood, a barren squandering of strength and of public riches, and acts of violence and reciprocal reprisals shall have come to deepen an abyss between the two parties of the confederation, to set definitely in motion the irremediable chain of the pain, perhaps irreparable, of their commercial and political power.

"Our august master can not resign himself to admit such deplorable extremities. His Imperial Majesty still places his confidence in that practical good sense of the American people, which appreciates so judiciously their true interests. His Majesty is happy to believe that the members of the Federal Government, and the individual men of the two parties, will entre all occasions and will unite on this point, to calm the effervescence of the passions. There are no interests so divergent that it may not be possible to reconcile them by observing to that end with firmness and moderation, in a spirit of justice and moderation.

HE WISHES THE UNION TO BE MAINTAINED.

"If, within the limits of your friendly relations, your language shall be conformable to the views of which I have just expressed, Sir, to the intentions of his Majesty the Emperor in developing to their fullest influence which Emperor in developing to their fullest influence which the Union is called to acquire during your long residence at Washington, and the consideration which legitimately your character as the representative of a sovereign always treated by the most friendly sentiments toward the American Union. The dislike of the Emperor, and of his government constitute the universal political equilibrium; he contributes to maintain it, and as for our august master and all Russia have pledged the most friendly interests for the two countries, and the prosperity and grandeur of the worlds, both in the ascending period of their development, appear rather as a natural necessity of their mutual and sympathies, of which they have already given mutual proofs to each other.

"I do not wish here to approach any of the questions which divide the United States. We are called upon to express ourselves in this contest. The preceding considerations have no other object than to extend the lively solicitude of the Emperor in the presence of the dangers which menace the American Union, and the sincere wish that his Majesty entertains for the maintenance of their great work in its integrity and which appeared to rich in its future.

"It is in this sense, Sir, that I desire you to express yourself, as well to the members of the General Government as to the Governors of States from you may have given them the assurance that in every event the American nation may count upon the most cordial sympathy on the part of our august master during the important crisis which it is passing through at present.

"Receive, Sir, the expression of my very deep consideration.

"(Signed) GORTSCHAKOFF."

THE EFFECT OF THE CAPTURE OF THE HATTERAS FORTS.

A dispatch from Fortress Monroe says: The rebels have abandoned their strongly fortified forts at Ocracoke Inlet. Hundreds of the inhabitants have been demonstrated their loyalty to the Government by coming to Hatteras Inlet to take the oath of allegiance. Colonel Hawkins reports that he administered the oath to between two and three hundred in one day. The steamer Fanny still lies in the Inlet and the Susquehanna outside. The Susquehanna has been to Ocracoke Inlet, and found the fortifications there completely deserted, and the white flag was everywhere exhibited.

On the following day the George Peabody arrived at the Fortress, from Hatteras Inlet, with a number of fugitive families from the mouth of Tar River, who had succeeded in escaping to the Inlet. They report that the lower counties of North Carolina are ready to hoist the National flag when assured of support. A prominent clergyman declaring that should a national force land near Beaufort, it would immediately be joined by at least two thousand North Carolina Unionists. A perfect reign of terror exists there at present. The secession of State troops have been recalled from Virginia.

SENSATION IN THE NORTH CAROLINA HOUSE.

The Hon. J. C. Ligon, Speaker pro tem Governor Clark, in a special message, announced to the Legislature the surrender of Forts Hatteras, and adds: "For the sake of the credit of the State we forbear to describe the effect which the announcement produced in the House."

HORRIBLE OUTRAGE IN MISSOURI.

The telegraph reports one of the most horrible episodes that ever disgraced modern warfare on the part of the rebels in Missouri, namely, the destruction of a railroad bridge on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad over Platt River, nine miles east of St. Joseph, by which a whole passenger train, containing ninety-one hundred inoffensive peoplemen, women, and children—was precipitated into the river, and seventeen killed and others horribly mangled. It appears that the timber supports of the bridge had been nearly burned through, and the fire then extinguished, thus leaving no suspicious appearance about the structure, so that when the train entered the bridge at night the whole track gave way, resulting in the fearful consequences above stated. It was subsequently discovered that some other bridges on the road to St. Joseph were similarly disposed, and the track obstructed with logs in order to prevent succor being conveyed from the town to the wounded victims of this cowardly outrage. The atrocities, however, were overlooked, and help dispatched by physicians and others proceeded to the scene of the disaster.

OCCUPATION OF PADUCAH, KENTUCKY.

General Grant, with his own regiments of infantry, a company of light artillery, and two gun-boats took possession of Paducah at noon o'clock on this (Friday) 30, 1861. All rebel flags flying, but they were immediately torn down by the Union Volunteers on the hypothesis of the Union to be possession of the telegraph-offices, Marine Hospital, and other public buildings, and issued a proclamation to the people. The town was in great alarm at the rumored approach of 3500 rebel troops, which were in close proximity to Paducah.

ROSECRANS CROSSES THE MOUNTAINS.

From Western Virginia we have a piece of important character. General Rosecrans is reported as having crossed the mountains in full force, and the rebels had even been fired upon by the rebels at a distance of four miles from their main camp.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN ON THE SABBATH.

The following order has been promulgated:

HEADQUARTERS, NO. 2,
HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
WASHINGTON, August 3, 1861.

The Major-General Commanding desires and requests that in future there may be a more perfect respect for the Sabbath on the part of his command. We are fighting in a holy cause, and we should endeavor to merit the favor of the Creator. Unless in the case of an attack by the enemy, or other unforeseen necessity, it is expected and recommended to commanding officers that all work shall be suspended on the Sabbath; that no unnecessary labor or movements shall be made on that day; that the men shall, as far as possible, be permitted to go to church in parties; that they shall attend Divine service after the customary morning inspections, and that officers and men shall use their influence to insure the utmost decorum and quiet on that day. The General Commanding trusts that this is not the first time that he has issued orders in the interest of the Lord of Mercy and of Battles in our sacred duty.

By command of Major-General Commanding.
S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

THE DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTION.

The Democratic State Convention met at Syracuse last week. The Committee on Officers reported Hiram J. Redfield for President, with the usual number of Vice-Presidents and Secretaries. After an address from Mr. Redfield, the Committee on Contested Seats made a majority report in favor of the admission of the Tammany delegates from the City, and the exclusion of those from Mozart Hall. A minority report was made recognizing both delegations as representing the same constituency. Finally, a resolution was adopted by the Convention to admit both delegations with power to cast half a vote each. The Tammany delegates then withdrew for consultation, and after their return to the hall presented a resolution the Convention adjourned until the following morning. The morning session was commenced, and was made to reconsider the vote of the day previous, by which both delegations were admitted, and after refusing to allow Tammany delegates to withdraw their acceptance, 114 to 87, the Convention decided by the same resolution by which both delegations were admitted, and which was adopted the day before, that the resolution by which the Tammany delegation alone was admitted, by a vote of 114 to 87, and the Mozart Hall delegation withdrew. The Committee on Resolutions reported a series, which was adopted by a vote of a majority of more than the war, though censuring the present Administration for the conduct of the war. The next business was the nomination of a ticket for State officers, which was effected in due course.

STATE OF FEELING IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Captain Welch, of the Mary Alice, captured July 29 by the privateer Jeff Davis, arrived in the city last Saturday morning, and furnishes some very interesting intelligence. After his capture, and while the vessels lay over the North Edisto, twenty-one miles south of Charleston, where he was detained for four days, numbers of vessels, and a very formidable masked battery at North Point. No trace of the Union Fleet could be seen. From Edisto City Captain Welch, with twenty-five other prisoners, was conveyed to Charleston, South Carolina, and Columbia, North Carolina, where the people had just heard of the brilliant defeat of Fort Hatteras, and where the fact of such a pitch that violence was offered to the prisoners. The authorities refused to allow the prisoners to pass through Richmond at night, with a strong military guard, to prevent mob law being administered.

GRASS GROWING IN THE STREETS OF NEW ORLEANS.

The New Orleans Bee says the heavy growth of grass in some of the streets in that city "would pay the mower for his trouble."

THE UNION VOTE IN KENTUCKY.

The following is the official vote cast at the August election for State Treasurer in Kentucky:

J. H. Garrard, Union	88,161
Two secession candidates	68,668
Union majority	67,145

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MORE TROOPS FOR CANADA.

The London Globe of the last of August has a semi-official organ of the Palmerston Cabinet, and generally well-informed—states that twenty-one thousand five hundred British troops will be dispatched to Canada during the month of September. It is also asserted that Lord Monck is to succeed Sir Edmund Head as Governor-General of that province.

Queen Victoria has been in Ireland, and was most enthusiastically received at Dublin.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR AND THE POPE.

The Independance Belge publishes the substance of an autograph letter from the Emperor to the Pope, intimating that if the Holy Father's affairs be unsalvetrade the present status quo will be maintained.

ITALY.

SETTLEMENT OF THE ROMAN QUESTION.

A pamphlet, just published, entitled "Rome," published in Paris, intimates that the people of Rome will be invited to choose a sovereign either by universal suffrage, and that if they vote for Victor Emmanuel the French troops will march from the city next day and will be replaced by Italian forces. This measure is to be accepted, as alleged, if the Pope persists in refusing the guarantee for the integrity of the Holy See proposed by Napoleon. Baron Bicasoli asserts, in an official circular, that the Brigandage now prevailing in Italy is instigated from Rome.

FIGHT BETWEEN SOLDIERS AND PEOPLE.

A terrible affair had occurred at Bombardelf. A company of Italian soldiers upon arriving there were received by the National Guard and people with applause, but while they were partaking of the refreshments offered them, the people turned upon them and massacred fifteen of them. The next day the troops surrounded the town, bombarded it, and destroyed it by fire. One hundred and fifty persons were burned or bayoneted.

CAMP AT PILOT KNOB, MO.

THE following letter, from our artist, referring to the illustration on page 596, explains itself:

On the right of the sketch is seen Pilot Knob, so named from its peculiar shape. It is, I believe, the largest known mountain of pure iron ore in the world. The rocks (not ore) which crown its summit are forty feet in perpendicular height. The perpendicular of the hill itself is rather more than five hundred feet. And the valley it overlooks is six hundred feet higher than the main street of St. Louis, which is distant by rail 56½ miles to the north. We are fifty miles west of the Mississippi River, obtainable by a road, part plank and part gravel. Pilot Knob is the terminus of the railroad. The Iron Mountain works take precedence of those at the Knob only because of their being first established. At the base of the Knob are seen the works for preparing and smelting the ore. The ore is brought down from the quarries near the summit by means of a wire cable and drum, there being cars attached constantly moving up empty and down laden. In the middle distance is a train of cars just starting from the terminus for St. Louis. The hill in the centre is called "Big Mountain." It has two peculiar rocks near the top surmounted by tall trees, which give it the appearance of a gate. The hill on the left is called the "Shepherd Mountain," and is rich in magnetic ore. It is much larger, as a hill, than the Knob. There are cannon planted on the Knob, which command the country for miles, heavy Columbiads on the different hills, and generally a force of six or eight thousand United States troops in the valley.

FORTS HATTERAS AND CLARK.

We continue this week our series of illustrations of the brilliant achievement of Com. Stringham and General Butler at Hatteras Inlet. On page 598 we give a couple of pictures of the INTERIOR OF FORTS HATTERAS AND CLARK, from drawings made on the afternoon of Thursday, 20th, by Mr. Kaufmann; and on page 597 we give AN EXTERIOR VIEW OF FORT HATTERAS, and illustrate the GALLANT ACHIEVEMENT OF LIEUTENANT FISKE, who swam through the breakers at the risk of his life to deliver General Butler's orders to the forces.

Of the fort themselves the correspondent of the Tribune wrote:

Forts Hatteras and Clark were posts of great importance to the rebels, the former being by far the strongest and most extensive work, and correspondingly the most important of the two. Their construction was commenced about three months since by the State of North Carolina, and were planned with a good deal of engineering skill, and were built at great expense of labor and money. Fort Hatteras covers an area of between one and two acres, and, like Fort Clark, was laid out by Colonel William Bensertheus Thompson, of Virginia. It is an earth-work, mounting ten barbette guns, 32-pounders, five bearing toward the sea. It was designed to mount eight and ten inch Columbiads, but these do not seem to have arrived.

In the fort was a bomb-proof, which proved, however, not to have been proof against our bombs; for a shell struck the top of the work, penetrated through the forgart of sand covering, and entered the apartment below, next to the magazine, with only a board partition between—but it did not explode, however. Had it done so, the loss of life would have been terrible, as more than three hundred men had been forced and were closely packed in the subterranean chamber at the time. The shell filled the chamber or vault with dust and smoke, and the men supposing the magazine was on fire, a terrible panic ensued. The men rushed out, and nothing that the officers could do, even their threats to bayonet and shoot them, could restrain them within the fort. Shortly after another shell exploded on the bomb-proof, and it becoming evident that to ascertain but become the range and firing of the fort, the magazine would soon be exploded, and the white flag was hastily run up.

When I entered the fort, a considerable length of time before General Butler arrived, the interior was a complete wreck, and the wonder was that hundreds were not killed. They said that for the last half hour our shells, almost without exception, fell and exploded inside the fort. Two of the guns were disabled. The tents and shanties were a wreck, and there was scarcely room for the wounded.

The Herald correspondent thus speaks of Mr. Fiske's exploit, and of its consequences:

After the smaller fort had been silenced a boat was sent ashore with Mr. Fiske, rid to General Butler who swam through the breakers to convey to Colonel Weber's command the orders of the General, and information of the intended movements of the fleet. Upon entering the re-doubt called Fort Clark, he found upon the books and papers found there, among others an official documents and the letter books of the commanding officers. Mr. Fiske plunged this package upon his shoulders and swam out again to the only boat that was left sea-worthy, and carried them to the General, who was thus informed of what was going on at the moment of the appearance of the fleet off the Inlet. When the meeting was held on the Minnesota to arrange terms of capitulation, the rebel officers were utterly astonished at the accurate information of the General, and inquired anxiously how he knew what they were doing the day before, and who was the person among them to whom signals had been made from the fleet. The General simply replied that he possessed means of accurate information.

Hatteras Inlet is thus described in the Herald:

A geographical sketch of the spot where our naval forces have been so triumphant can not fail to prove interesting to our readers. Situated about twelve miles from Cape Hatteras lighthouse is the inlet in question. It is known to the mariner by a low sand island, which was formerly a round hummock, covered with trees on the eastern side of the entrance. The breakers seldom extend entirely across the entrance to the cove or harbor, but at nearly all times make on each side, and between them lies the channel. The bar should be approached from the northward and eastward, and vessels should keep in four or five fathoms of water along the breakers until up with the opening. The least water on the bar is fourteen feet mean low water, and the rise and fall of the tide but two feet. [illegible] inside the inlet [illegible] finds good anchorage in a hard sand bottom, except a few sticky spots at the head of the channel. The anchorage affords protection from all winds except those from the south-ward and westward.

As an entrance to Pamlico, Albemarle, and Currituck Sounds, the possession of Hatteras Inlet is of vast importance to the cause of the Union. With Ocracoke and Hatteras Inlets closed, North Carolina may be said to be completely shut in from the ocean. Privateers can no long[illegible] its sea through the [illegible] Canal and Albemarle Sound to annoy our commerce.

THE BLOCKADE OF CHARLESTON.

MAJOR-GENERAL McCLELLAN, U.S.A.—[From Photographs by Brady and others.]

AMERICAN SPORTSMEN.

I FELT an anxious wish to visit America and see my brother once more. There were but two of us left out of a rather large family. I had been bred to the bar at home, but William had chosen the push his fortunes in the New World. He had hitherto chased the fickle goddess so hotly that the letters of his relatives usually reached him, and that his were seldom dated twice over from the same town or even from the same State. He had adopted the restless life of the true emigratory Yankee, whisking from Florida to Maine, speculating, mining, prospecting, land-jobbing, entering professions to abandon them half-tried, and leading that Jack-of-all-trades life so dear to our Transatlantic cousins. Yet Willy made money: he never complained, never asked assistance from the few surviving kinsfolk, and his elastic spirit swam like a cork in all waters of difficulty. When last I heard of him he was junior partner in a new bank at New Orleans: he had done well enough, and gave me a pressing invitation to visit him in the healthy season. He was housed in Broad Street, Cotton-square, and could introduce me, he said, to all the celebrities of the city compared with which even Pat Rice is tame and commonplace. Autumn came, and I went. I had written twice since I had made up my mind to the voyage, but had received no reply. This, however, disturbed me little. I made no doubt that I should find my brother in the bank parlor, safely anchored behind his ledger and cash-book. "Banking," said I to myself, "is a steady and a permanent pursuit, and I am glad that Willy has taken to so sober a mode of making a fortune. This is very different from his Californian land-jobbing, or his Texan mule trade, or his Oregon life assurance company." Well he did well my lad, and I shall find him at his post." I set off. I traveled by rail and steam, without the slightest adventure, to a certain well-known city on the Mississippi, where I embarked. The river boat I selected was a fine one, the Benjamin Franklin; she had been launched but a month before, and her cabins were radiant with tarnished and luxuriant, and dressed in garments of incongruous fashion, half dandy, half backwoodsman.

"Surely, steward," I ventured to say, "these can not be all Southern planters. Are they filibusters?"

"No, no, massa," grinned the black, very affably; "dem not Southern planters, sure, nor yet Yankee mudsellers, nowther. Massa must have heard ob de great diggins at Pike's Peak, hey?"

"Pike's Peak!" repeated I, rallying my wandering recollections.

"Iss, Sir, up 'mong de ole Rocky Mountains. Dere dem gemmen gwine to dig gold off as fast as can hurry. Pike's Peak shocking savage place, massa, not fit for Chris'en—oh dear no!"

I had heard in England of the reports of its immense wealth, varied by hideous tales of starvation, suffering, death, and cannibalism among the emigrants to Pike's Peak.

"But those gentlemen," said I, glancing toward a group of four well-dressed, well-behaved men, "can hardly be going to Pike's Peak."

"Which, massa?" said the affable negro. "Ah! I see; dem old fly-ebe white hands and de smart cravat round dere throat, and de shirt-cuff so clean and stiff, and all de bootiful rings and watch-guards. Certainly not, Sir; dem never go grubbing wid pick and spade, I'm sure, massa, sure."

"Those, then, are planters?" said I, with some interest.

"Cornelius, ye darned snow-ball, get me a julep!" bawled a fierce adventurer from among the diggers.

"Coming, Sir!" answered the steward, swishing his napkin, and then answered my query with, "He! he! he! Massa make comical mistake. Dem are great persons."

"But how—why?" I began, when the impatient digger assured Cornelius that he would "draw a head on his ugly carcass" with his revolver, unless the desired refreshment were instantly produced. The steward begged humbly to regard this threat as a mere flower of speech, for he hurried off, muttering between his teeth, but outwardly obedient.

I was left alone. Not for long, however. One of the gentlemen who had attracted my observation very closely, and whom I had set down in me as a stranger and an Englishman, to take a seat at their table.

"We may be able," said the American, "to afford you some reliable information respecting the productions and note-worthy points of the country we are sailing through. It is scarcely my duty to assist a traveler in forming a correct estimate of the South will be a pleasant task to us all."

Very civil indeed. I willingly complied, and met with a genial welcome. Two or three party were fine-looking men, of an appearance somewhat prepossessing, and evidently gentlemen. Others were with the bland suavity of citizens of the world. The others much younger, and had rather a haggard aspect, but their dress was faultless—at least, from an American point of view—and their display of jewelry and spotless linen was equal to that of their elder companions. "Well," thought I, "if all American sportsmen are as elegant in dress and deportment, it is plain that, in the New World at least, out-door amusements have a tendency to refine instead of brutalize." And I thought with a contemptuous pity of British fox-hunters, and still more of British turfites, as I surveyed these dandy Nimrods of the West. Still, I am bound to say that not one word of sport did I hear. On the contrary, my new friends conversed on politics, commerce, the cotton crop, the snags and sawyers of the river, the last revival, the last explosion, and the different routes between New York and London.

"You seem to know New Orleans well, gentlemen," said I, after listening to two or three anecdotes, the scene of which was invariably laid in the metropolis of the Western Delta.

"No place like it!" cried one of the younger men, with a sort of enthusiasm; it's right down, thorough-going, and all-k through, the cream of all creation! I'm quite at home there in all its places."

"So I have heard," said I, with a smile, but rather diffidently; "life, I understand, goes a good deal more merrily than is pleasant. In duels, I mean," added I, seeing that I was misunderstood.

"Sir," said another of the party, "you have been misinformed. Not that I insinuate that our fine citizens are slow to fight. Sir, they are not. But there is great exaggeration prevalent on the score of duels and fatal affrays, pretended to be of continual occurrence down South. We have drive, Sir! we have fire! but we air not the monsters we air depicted!"

I told him I had always understood that the State of Mississipi, in especial, was renowned for its lawless condition, and for the slight value set on human life. He smiled and shook his head. The gentlemen shook their heads with one accord.

"These air slanders," said one of the seniors of the party, "wholly unfounded slanders, I assure you, P. C. Jones—" these air slanders, I give you my sacred word of honor. We live, it is true, in a land where the bowie-knife is in use, but it is not yet wholly faded away; in a land where the luxurious beauty of airth sometimes attracts the spoiler and the rowdy; but assassination is unknown. It will you allow me to look at it? I have often wished to inspect a bowie-knife."

Mr. Alphonso P. Jones solemnly handed over the weapon in its sheepskin sheath, and I looked with great interest at the sharp and heavy blade, the strong cross-piece to increase the purchase in close conflict, and the silver-mountings of hilt and sheath. Meanwhile Mr. Jones discoursed on something about the necessity of self-preservation, and the number of Irish and Germans about.

"You must not think that this sort of thing useful in your mode of life," said I, poising the heavy dagger as I gave it back.

"What you call it, Sir, you might you mean?" Such were the questions rather fiercely propounded, and every brow was overcast. But I had spoken of assassination at the sharp and heavy ideal of surprising information on the subject of wood-craft. Suddenly my eye lit upon a remarkable object. This was the steward of the party, Cornelius, the black steward, now expressing, with its rolling eyes and open mouth, as much astonishment as the face of a negro can express, at me, gaping and glaring, first at me, and then at my companions, quite oblivious of the tray and napkin he carried. I inquired:

"What on earth is the matter, steward?" said I. The black drew me aside: "Me tell massa no lie! Yes British ask if me no free, and if gemmen wid lily-white hands and plenty gold rings—me say, sportemen. Den Cornelius come back, and find massa sit down along wid dem, as lick as thieves."

"And was not?" asked I, in bewilderment. "What possible objection could I have to such company? Or, indeed, what better company could I expect to meet with than these gentlemen, who, by your own account—"

"Carra hyar, you black-faced chatter-box!" thundered a voice from the group in front "one of the captain himself. "How's dinner to be true to time if you stand preachin' there? Free nigger or not, I'll make you jump!"

Off flew Cornelius, and I returned to my seat, puzzled but pleased with my new friends. A few more gentlemen had joined the party at the dinner, and then a game of cards was proposed, and a couple of packs seemed to appear, as if by magic, on the table. I was asked if I would take a hand at play, nor would he agree to any game, excepting for merely nominal stakes, quarter-dollar points, or the like. I have since learned that this was prudent, but I play a steady rubber at home, and I had no objection to make a fourth in a quiet way, the stakes being so small, and the other gentlemen being so disappointed at Mr. Jones's firm refusal. But scarcely had the second deal taken place before Captain Bell hurried off in high mirth and wrath on a stern countenance straight up to our table, on which he placed his clenched hand.

"Very sorry, gentlemen," said he, "but, as commander of this vessel, I am obligationed to say shut up!"

Mr. Jones remonstrated in a mild but dignified manner. "Surely, captain, we are as harmlessly employed as the chess-players yonder, or as those ladies who are making a tarnation clatter with the dominoes. I was not aware that your rules—"

"Then, Sir, you had oughter! To strutted up yonder in black and white, plain to read as a child's hornbook. Cyards air pro-hibited aboard any of our owner's kits o' hollow timber. So I say, gentlemen, shut up, or go ashore!"

There was no more card-playing, but I could not help magnifying with my new acquaintances in the oppressed indignation at this arbitrary interference with our recreations.

The evening passed fast down stream, and the bar a leven, or artificial embankments, of the Mississipi shore were visible on the left bank, while above them nodded the green crests of tall trees, not yet laid low by the woodman's axe.

"If you will do us the favor," said Alphonso P. C. Jones, after a little whispering conversation with his three friends, "to become our guest for a few days, it will please us much, and honor us excessively. We disembark at Grand Gulf, where the boat will stop some three hours hence, and where my residence is located. We can offer you but bachelor accommodation, Sir, consistent with such scholarship; but if you air not too proud—"

What could I do but accept so frank and well-meant an invitation? It was settled that I should be a short time to become the guest of my fellow-travelers. And now the metallic summons to dinner sounded, and then succeeded the usual crushing, elbowing, and pushing for places. I was swept away by the crowd, and found myself seated at the table at some distance from my new friends. On my left was a rosy clerical gentleman, an Episcopal bishop, I believe; and on my right was a gentleman in the office of literary taste, Mrs. Governor Gunn. Mrs. Governor Gunn had a husband somewhere about the ship: a small, long-haired person, whom I successively were eyed, and who had been Governor of some outlying State on Wisconsin, Florida, or Missouri—but had retired on account of his health. The consort of this puny dignitary was certainly the principal personage on board, the queen of fashion and arbitress of taste, and she had evidently set herself to converse with me in gracious and regal manner during the early part of the voyage. Now, however, the springs of Mrs. Governor Gunn's affability were frozen. She answered my remarks with icy monosyllables, frowned at me, rustled her ribbons at me, and gave me the cold shoulder. I was at a loss to know how I had given offense; but when I attributed this hostile behavior to feminine caprice, and turned to the bishop, that bishop was also cold. He became solder of visage and haskier of speech, lost his bland smile, and was no longer interested in my conversation. Religious principle, or desirous of information respecting the British hierarchy. It was very odd. What had I done? I was obliged to confine my attentions to the wild-turkey and venison-steaks, and presently the plentiful meal came to an end.

We all rose. Mrs. Governor Gunn, at the head of a bevy of flounced silks, swept off in dignified procession to the ladies' cabin, and nothing remained but to smoke and chat, to rejoin, and "liquor." The bishop edged away from me as soon as he could, and I was left among a knot of planters, overseers, and the like. But these yellow-faced gentlemen did not seem to see me in a more favorable light. They looked at me as every face and a sneer on every lip. I felt angry and uncomfortable, but I could scarcely demand an explanation. I did not even know for my new friends. I did not see them, so I went on deck. The hurricane-deck of a Mississipi boat usually presents a lively scene of promenade and stir. So it did on this occasion, but it curiously happened that wherever I joined a gossiping group, that group broke up and dispersed. The very boys leave me of the plague-stricken in a time of pestilence, so shunned was I, for no apparent reason. I felt puzzled and vexed. I was indignant, but I had suddenly become a leper. What was the reason? Never mind! My connection with the Benjamin Franklin was soon terminated, for the boat was approaching Grand Gulf; I saw the shingled roofs and the church belfries peeping over the tawny levee, and I was time for me to settle with the steward and to see about my baggage. I found black Cornelius as grim and sullen as a bear. He received payment and thanks with a dry "Tank you, Sir!" and did not permit his white teeth to shine upon me any more. I thought, too, there was a reproachful and somewhat resentful expression in his rolling eyes. But I had neither time nor patience to ask for an explanation. I was obliged to bustle off, for the shock, though a colored man with my bag and portmanteau. There I found Alphonso P. C. Jones and his company on with their effects, and I—all of a sudden—found myself left to myself.

"Good-by, Sir," said the Grand Gulf," said my hospitable inviter; "it is but a small city, but—"

Knock! The clear, sharp detonation of a rifle cut Mr. Jones short in his civilities, and then succeeded the bang, bang, of several fire-arms, and a shrill whistle, which was totally stilled. Mr. Jones looked at his friends; there was a haggard intelligence, a lurking apprehension, visible in every face. I remembered the usual calmness of mien cane back. I heard a by-stander remark, "Something amiss in Grand Gulf, I guess;" and I heard no more, for I was off like a shot.

We went on shore. A couple of lean and shabby German emigrants, with yellow hair and sunburnt skins, were coolly at work discharging from the baggage of the party; but, with the exception of these men, a couple of half-clad black children, and a few lounging idlers on the wharf was deserted. Nor was there any stir or sign of life among the timber-built stores and taverns, the tall guest house over which waved the stars and stripes, the wooden houses that stood back from the road in their plots of garden ground. It looked a mournfully desolate place. Grand Gulf; and I half regretted that Benjamin Franklin, as she sidled off from the landing-stage and anorted her course down stream.

Crack again! Bang, bang again! and a hoarse roar, inarticulate and menacing as the utterance of a wild beast's wrath, broke upon our ears, and then for a minute or two the rattle of fire-arms was continuous.

"What's going forward?" asked Mr. Jones, hastily.

The nearest of the German porters grinned humbly as he replied: "It is a pad business, mein herr, but it is only a street affair. It is not apout bolitics."

We were now in sight of a crowd of people, eddying wildly to and fro, who were gathered in front of a pretty house, whose smart verands and bright paint had an air of pretension unusual in that wretched town.

"By Jehosophat!" exclaimed one of the young men, excitedly, pointing out the scene, "it's our house they're a-pitching into!"

"Keep cool, keep cool," answered Alphonso P. C. Jones, who was pale but collected. "Stop out; good-by, Sir; we must go to our property."

On they went, still accompanied by me, though I was completely at a loss to account for the popular fury on the part of the crowd. We reached the crowd, and began to elbow through them.

"Who on airth may you be?" asked one fierce-looking woodsman as we pushed.

"More of the gang, I reckon," bawled a farmer, in homespun.

I was hanging back, but one of the party grasped my arm and urged me on, whispering, in a husky tone, "Get in-doors, stranger, if you don't want to chent the lamentablest consequences."

We were now in the garden, the gay flowers of which the mob were trampling down in a reckless way. I could see that the windows were open, but barricaded with logs and furniture, and that two or three gun-barrels were peeping through the chinks. We got close up to the door, and Mr. Jones knocked, uttering a peculiar sharp cry at the same moment. I looked round for our German with the luggage: they were not to be seen. After the lapse of a minute—the longest minute I ever spent—the door was cautiously opened, but not for its full extent. "Quick!" muttered a voice at my ear. In we went. There was a short and a rush; the people surged up to the door, fired angry shots, but the muzzles of two revolvers were thrust into the faces of the foremost, and they fell back, and we were inside the door was closed.

I was now, to all appearance, in a besieged place, and one of the beleaguered garrison. And yet I knew nothing of the quarrel, and had no share in it. Of all the strange spectacles this strange continent had hitherto afforded me this was the most inexplicable. In the midst of the hostile bustle and revelry, as bolts were shot, chains linked, and bars slipped across the door again, I asked repeatedly what was the matter, but in vain: "Thank your stars, stranger, for a whole skin," was all the reply I could elicit. And then every body went up stairs. In a front room, prettily decorated in French taste, we found five men fashionably dressed, bejeweled, and white-handed, like my inviters. But there was a similar confusion reigning there. The costly furniture had been piled up as a barricade before the windows, mixed with fire-wood, mattresses, and other impedimenta. The five occupants of the room were flushed and heated, with disordered hair, and faces already smeared with black stains from the powder. Several pairs of swords, fowling-pieces, pistols, ball-pouches, flasks, kegs, bullets, whips, and boots, all in confusion. One of the party was binding up his arm in an awkward way, as heavy gouts of blood ran trickling down his shirt-sleeve. The two gentlemen who had admitted us came in along with us, making a total of eleven, not reckoning myself.

"Fighting, Jones?" exclaimed Jolly "you brought on all this?" asked Mr. Jones, angrily.

"Keep your temper, Jones," answered the wounded man, with a faint smile. "No need to quarrel among ourselves, I guess. The Grand Gulf vagabonds will have all our scalps before sundown."

Jones shrugged his shoulders.

"How did it happen?"

Another of the group answered, "Oh, the old story: Hopkins's nigger tarnation saucy. He polished off young Edmonds, and they got to blows a few over the card-table, and Phillips gave him a Kentucky pill, and has brought the wasps about our ears."

"Young Edmonds! Do you mean the Judge's son?" asked Jones, with a long face.

"Yes," was the reply; they've taken him into the doctor's, with breath in him yet, and if he recovers—"

"It's all U. P. with us, misters!" cried another man, gazing from the window.

"Yes—I see. I was getting a terrible interest in the affair—pushed forward, and saw what haunts my memory still. Carried on a door by several strong men, I saw the dead body of a young man, quite a youth, partially wrapped in a gaudy Indian blanket. An old man, gray-haired and venerable of aspect, was weeping over the narrow form, while a crowd of angry men, with clenched fists and knotted weapons, surrounded it. Meanwhile, one tall fellow, carrying on a harangue as if it were some ganatly banner, the bloody shirt of the murdered man, and her haranguing a mass of human beings, above whose dark heads we saw the ominous glancing of axe-heads and rifle-barrels.

"See what we've brought on us, Jones!" cried Phillips, sullenly; "better keep your breath to try and chent the bungaran!"

There was a yell from the mob beneath, "Kill 'em! Burn the house over their heads! Forward, boys!" And twenty shots were fired, splintering the Venetian blinds and crashing into ceiling and wainscot.

Stand to it!" cried one of the boldest of the besieged. "Don't be cowards, gentlemen, or we shall beat 'em yet." The speaker fired a rifle at the broad mark of the crowd; a cry of pain succeeded, and then a more savage one.

In a moment there was firing enough on both sides. The reports were deafening, doors and windows rattled again, the room was full of smoke, and the sulphurous steam of the gunpowder hid choked me as I got my back against the wall in a recess between the windows, and awaited in comparative security the issue of the affray. I knew nothing of the quarrel. Texan and Yerian were alike to me, only I wished with all my heart that Mr. Jones had been less hospitable, or I less complying. The besieged fought hard, keeping incessantly with revolver and gun, while I heard Mr.

Jones encouraging them. But four were already down, wounded, on the floor; one of them mortally hurt, to judge by the blood that bubbled from his lips as he gasped for breath. I knelt beside the poor wretch, to offer such unskilful help as I could afford, when there was a crash, a whoop, and a rush, and the barricade was scaled or forced, and the citizens came pouring in, furious as a storming party. Borne down, trampled, sick, and giddy, I was dragged from the scuffle, and found myself in the street, pinioned, and a prisoner. Beside me were the majority of my new acquaintances, tattered, bruised, and their faces hardly to be seen through their masks of blood and gunpowder. They were all bound and captive.

"Drag 'em forward. Up to the big oak. The court sits there!" bawled fifty voices; and we were roughly hauled or pushed to a grassy space, where a huge solitary tree spread its branches, while under its shade stood a score of farmers and boatmen, well armed, and I saw with horror a rope and running noose to every branch strong enough to serve as an impromptu gallows.

"Silence for Judge Lynch!" bawled an amateur crier.

A gaunt farmer represented the redoubtable Judge, and addressed the assembly.

"Fellow-citizens, I'm no forky-tongued lawyer, nor yet no stump speaker, but it's easy to clap the saddle on the right hoss. We've had our hosses stole, our niggers 'ticed away, our liquor hocussed, and our dollars spirted out of our pouches. That's bad enough, but when it kem's to blood—"

Here a roar drowned the orator's voice. Next the crier shouted that the jury had been impanelled, and the prisoners must be put to the bar. I was thrust forward with the rest.

"Guilty, or not?" was the stern demand.

Some of them trembled very much. Jones and Phillips were calm, but it was the calm of desperation.

"Guilty, or not guilty?"

"Bring the farce to an end," cried Jones. "You've got us; more ass I to run back into the trap. Do your worst!"

"Are there ropes ready alott there?" Judge Lynch called out.

"All ready, Judge," was the rejoinder.

"Then, gentlemen of the jury, your verdict."

"Guilty! All guilty!"

The Judge exclaimed, "I kin pass but one sentence. Death! A halter apiece, and a good riddance to the city and State!"

A yell of approval broke forth: we were hustled beneath the tree, and a halter soon encircled every neck. Then I found my voice, and loudly appealed: protesting my entire innocence, and that I was a harmless traveler, an Englishman, and so forth. A peal of incredulous laughter decided my appeal.

"Britishers ain't licensed to rob and murder, ye'll larn to your cost," said an old farmer, who held me.

"Smother the hypocrite!" exclaimed a boatman.

"Did ye hear the cautin', cowardly skunk," cried another fellow.

"Can't ye take pattern by your captain, Jones there, and die like a man?"

My eyes following the man's pointed finger, I beheld the blackened face and staring eyeballs of my late acquaintance, as his struggling body dangled some yards above.

"Now for Phillips," was the cry; and I closed my eyes, not to see the wretch's execution.

"Morgan third; the Britisher fourth!" announced Judge Lynch. "Up with Phillips! Haul and holt."

"Tchick!" cried somebody, with an unfeeling laugh.

"Whisht! bawld your sneaking tongue, not to mock the dyin'y" sternly replied some honest Patlander hard by.

"Now, Morgan!" was the next summons.

"Hyur's the deputy-sheriff!" cried a voice, as a horse was heard galloping.

"What o' that?" replied another; "the sovereign people ain't to be cheated out o' their revenge. Besides, Willy Hudson's a good fellow."

Willy Hudson! All the blood rushed from my head to my heart, and back again, and I tingled from head to foot. My name was Hudson—my brother's name was William! One glance was enough, as a sun-browned horseman dashed into the crowd. It was Willy—the brother I had come to visit—just in time! I forgot exactly what was done and said. I only know that in about two minutes I was unbound, safe, free, arm in arm with my brother, and that the rough fellows who had been about to hang me were nearly wringing my hand off as they shook it, begging pardon for an awkward mistake. It was not only to me that Willy rendered service: I watched his sleeve, and begged him to do what he could for the miserable men, whatever their faults, still under sentence. He pushed me into a tavern parlor, shut the door, went out, and left me. I heard shouts, laughter, groans, the applause, the mutterings of a mob. After a long time Willy returned, wiping his face with a handkerchief, very much flushed and disheveled.

"Wagh!" he exclaimed, "what a tough job! But it's done now, though my tongue aches with the talking. I did it for you, George, my boy, and luckily I'm in favor here. Tar and feathers, instead of hanging, and nine-and-thirty with a cowhide, well laid on, will spoil their beauty for one while. But how came you to be with them?"

"First, Willy, tell me what brought you here? I thought the bank at New Orleans—"

"Pooh!" interrupted my Americanized brother; "an old story that! It broke down, paying assets and no more. I'm here, agent for a goods insurance company. I'm doing well, and I'm deputy-sheriff. Didn't you get my letter at New York? But how about your being with those rascals, of whom two have been hanged and four shot, I hear, eh?"

"Why, they told me they were sportsmen, Willy, and—"

"You green-horn!" said my brother, good-humoredly; "were you thinking of fox-hunting or partridge-popping? 'Sportsman,' in America, means sharper, gambler, thief, swindler, gallows-bird!"

I did not stay long at Grand Gulf.

IOWA VOLUNTEERS.

PAGE 604 we devote to illustrations of the IOWA VOLUNTEERS. Our first picture, from a sketch by Mr. H. O. Ford, of Davenport, represents the RETURN TO DAVENPORT OF THE MEN OF THE FIRST IOWA VOLUNTEERS, who staid beyond their time in order to share the fortunes of the brave fellows who fought under Lyon at Springfield. A Davenport correspondent writes us as follows about their reception:

A procession was immediately formed, consisting of the 1200 soldiers then in Camp McClellan (the number has since been increased), the Fire Companies, Turners, and other associations, with many citizens, and thousands in attendance. They passed under the "Triumphal Arch," of which I send a hasty pen-and-ink sketch, which was erected at the corner of Main and Second streets, and through all the principal streets of the city; finally proceeding to the court-house yard, where they were addressed by Judge Dillon, and then partook of a splendid dinner prepared by the ladies.

Our other picture, from a daguerreotype by Mr. T. P. Sharman, of Des Moines, represents the DES MOINES CAVALRY COMPANY leaving for the war. They are to form part of the Second Iowa Regiment, and are a gallant body of men.

FREMONT'S BODY-GUARD.

ON page 596 we illustrate the CAMP OF FREMONT'S BODY-GUARD, from an illustration sent us by a Volunteer correspondent from St. Louis, who writes:

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, August 20, 1861.

Inclosed please find sketch of Fremont's Head-quarters, Zagonyi's Camp. Fremont's Body-Guard is composed of three hundred picked men, under the control of Captain Zagonyi, a distinguished Hungarian officer, chosen by General Fremont as one of his aids. The camp is situated on the corner of St. Ange and Fourteenth streets—a prominent point, overlooking the entire city. Among the body-guard there is one company of one hundred men from Covington, Kentucky, commanded by Captain James L. Fetey, of Covington, a graduate of the Military Academy of Frankfort, Kentucky. The company is made up of the very best material Kentucky could afford; average height, 5 feet 11½ inches, and measuring 46½ inches around the breast. Perhaps a greater variety of talent can not be found in any regiment in the entire army. They have a number of lawyers, physicians, musicians, prominent merchants, school-teachers, ministers, State superintendents of Sunday-schools, a noted theatrical performer, and nearly every variety of the mechanical department. Among the notable features of this company is, that a chaplain is selected for each tent, and religious services are held every night, immediately after tattoo is called. The early part of the evening is spent in music from the whole company.

A STRANGE STORY.

By SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XVIII.

IN spite of the previous assurance of Mrs. Poyntz, it was not without an uneasy apprehension that I approached the cedar-tree, under which Mrs. Ashleigh still sat, her friend beside her. I looked on the fair creature whose arm was linked in mine. So young, so singularly lovely, and with all the gifts of birth and fortune which bend avarice and ambition the more submissively to youth and beauty, I felt as if I had wronged what a parent might justly deem her natural lot.

"Oh, if your mother should disapprove," said I, falteringly.

Lilian leaned on my arm less lightly. "If I had thought so," she said, with her soft blush, "should I be thus by your side?"

So we passed under the boughs of the dark tree, and Lilian left me, and kissed Mrs. Ashleigh's cheek, then seating herself on the turf, laid her head quietly on her mother's lap. I looked on the Queen of the Hill, whose keen eye shot over me. I thought there was a momentary expression of pain or displeasure on her countenance; but it passed. Still there seemed to me something of irony, as well as of triumph or congratulation, in the half smile with which she quieted her seat, and in the tone with which she whispered me to go to the house or open sward, "So, then, it is settled."

She walked lightly and quickly down the lawn. When she was out of sight I breathed more freely. I took the seat which she had quitted, by Mrs. Ashleigh's side, and said, "A little while ago I spoke of myself as a man without kindred, without home, and now I come to you and ask for both."

Mrs. Ashleigh looked at me benignly, then raised her daughter's face from her lap, and whispered, "Lilian," and Lilian's lips moved, but I did not hear her answer. Her mother did. She took Lilian's hand, simply placed it in mine, and said, "As she chooses, I choose; whom she loves, I love."

CHAPTER XIX.

FROM that evening till the day Mrs. Ashleigh and Lilian went on the dreaded visit, I was always at their house when my avocations allowed me to steal to it; and during those few days the happiest I had ever known, it seemed to me that years could not have more deepened my harmony with Lilian's exquisite nature, made me more reverential of its purity, or more enamored of its sweetness. I could detect in her but one fault, and I rebuked myself for believing that fault it was. To see many who neglect the minor duties of life, who lack watchful forethought and considerate care for others, and we recognize the cause of this failing in levity or egotism. Certainly neither of those tendencies of character could be ascribed to Lilian. Yet still in daily trifles there was something of that neglect, some lack of that care and forethought. She loved her mother with fondness and devotion, yet it never occurred to her to aid in those petty household cares in which her mother centred so much of habitual interest. She was full of tenderness and pity to all want and suffering, yet many a young lady on the Hill was more actively beneficent—visiting the poor in their sickness, or instructing their children in the Infant Schools. I was persuaded that her love for myself was deep and truthful; it was clearly void of all ambition; doubtless she would have borne unflinching and contented whatever the world calls sacrifice and privation—yet I should never have expected her to take her share in the troubles of ordinary life. I could never have applied to her the homely but significant name of helpmate. I reproach myself while I write for noticing such defect—if defect it were—in what may be called the practical routine of our positive, trivial, human existence. No doubt this it was that had caused Mrs. Poyntz's harsh judgment against the wisdom of my choice. But this chiller shade upon her charming nature was reflected from my most unmixable selflove. It was but the consequence of that self-absorption which the habit of reverie had fostered. To the confidence she had won as to those visionary deceptions, in which she believed as the truthful impressions of spirit, if not of sense, I cautiously abstained from allusion. To me any approach to what I termed superstition was displeasing; any indulgence of phantasies not within the measured and beaten tracks of healthful imagination, more than displeased me in her—it alarmed. I would not by a word encourage her in persuasions that I felt it would be at present premature to reason against, and cruel indeed to ridicule. I was convinced that of themselves these mists round her native intelligence, formed by a solitary and musing childhood, would subside in the fuller daylight of wedded life. She seemed pained when she saw by my reticence that I shunned a subject still in her thoughts. She made one or two timid attempts to renew it, but my grave looks sufficed to check her. Once or twice, indeed, on such occasions she would turn away and leave me, but she soon came back—that gentle heart could not bear one unkindly shade between itself and whom it loved. It was agreed that our engagement should be for the present confided only to Mrs. Poyntz. When Mrs. Ashleigh and Lilian returned, which would be in a few weeks at furthest, it would be proclaimed; and our marriage would take place in the autumn, when I should be more free for one brief holiday from professional toils.

So we parted—as lovers part. I felt none of the jealous wish which had before so often accompanied, I had trembled at the thought of our separation, and conjured up irresistible rivals. But it was with a settled heavy gloom that I saw her depart. From earth was gone a glory; from life a blessing.

CHAPTER XX.

DURING the busy year of my professional career I had snatched intervals from professional treatises, which had made more or less sensation, and one of them, entitled "The Vital Principle; its Waste and Supply," had given me some speculation among the general public. This last treatise contained the results of certain experiments, then new and startling, which were adduced in support of a theory I entertained as to the reinvigoration of the human system by principles similar to those which, during its repose, to the replenishment of an exhausted soil, viz.: the giving back to the frame those essentials to its nutrition which the same has lost by the action or accident of time; or supplying the special pabulum or energy in which the individual organism is constitutionally deficient; and neutralizing or counterbalancing that in which it superabounds—a theory upon which some eminent physicians have more recently improved with signal success. But as the theory, slight and suggestive rather than dogmatic, I set no store. I had been for the last two years engaged on a work of much more ambitious design, and one by a much bolder ambition—a work on which I fondly hoped to found an enduring reputation as a writer and original thinker. This work is "An Inquiry into Organic Life," similar in comprehensiveness of survey to that by which the illustrious Müller, in Germany, has established the science of our age; however inferior, alas, to that august combination of thought and learning, in the judgment which that presumptuous title is the premise which adorns speculation. But at that day I was carried away by the ardor of composition, and I admired my work because I loved my labor. This book had been entirely laid aside for the last agitated month. Now that Lilian was gone, I set myself down to it as the sole occupation that had power and charm enough to rouse me from the aching sense of void and loss.

The very night of the day she went I reopened my MS. I had left off at the commencement of a chapter "Upon Knowledge as derived from our Senses." As my convictions on this head were founded on the well-known arguments of Locke and Condillac against innate ideas, and the reasonings by which Hume had resolved the combination of sensations into a general idea, to an impulse arising merely out of habit, so I set myself to oppose, as a dangerous concession to the sentimentalities or mysticism of a modish philosophy, the doctrine favored by most of our recent physiologists, and of which some of the most eminent of German metaphysicians have accepted the substance, though refining into a subtlety its positive form—I mean the doctrine which Müller himself has expressed in these words:

"That innate ideas may exist, can not in the slightest degree be denied; it is, indeed, a fact. All the ideas of animals, which are induced by instinct, are innate and immediate. Something presented to the mind, a desire to obtain which is at the same time given. The new-born lamb and foal have such innate ideas, which lead them to follow their mother and suck the teats. Is it not in some measure the same with the intellectual ideas of man?"

To this question I answered with an indignant "no." A "yes" would have shaken my creed of materialism to the dust. I wrote on rapidly, warmly. I defined the properties and meted the limits of natural laws, which I would not admit that a Deity himself could alter. I clumped and soldered dogma to dogma in the links of my trinkered logic, till out from my page, to my own complacency, grew Intellectual Man, as the pure formation of his material senses; mind, or what is called soul, born from and nurtured by them alone; through them to act, and with the machines they moored to perish. Strange, that at the very time my love for Lilian might have taught me that there are mysteries in the core of the feeling which, by my analysis of ideas could not solve, I should so stubbornly have opposed as moral all that could be referred to the spiritual! Strange, that at the very time when the thought that I might lose from this life the fellow-being I had known scarce a month had just before so appalled me, I should thus complacently sit down to prove that, according to the laws of the nature which my passion obeyed, I must lose for eternity the blessing I now hoped I had won to my life! But how distinctly dissimilar is man in his conduct from man in his systems! See the poet reclining under forest-boughs, confessing odes to his mistress; follow him out into the world; no mistress ever lived for him there!* See the hard man of science, so austere in his passionless problems; follow him now where the brain rests from its toil, where the heart finds its Sabbath—what child is so tender, so yielding and soft?

But I had proved to my own satisfaction that scent and sight are dead to us more, when the pulse beats no longer. And at that consolatory conclusion my pen stopped.

Suddenly beside me I heard distinctly a sigh—a compassionate, mournful sigh. The sound was unmistakable. I started from my seat; looked round, amazed to discover no one—no living thing! The windows were shut, the night was still. That sigh was not the wail of the wind. But there, in the darker angle of the room, what was that? A silvery whiteness—vaguely shaped as a human form—receding, fading, gone! Why I know not—for no face was visible, no form, if form it were, more distinct than the colorless outline—why I know not, but I cried aloud, "Lilian! Lilian!" My voice came strangely back to my own ear. I smiled and blushed at my folly. "So I, too, have learned what is superstition?" I muttered to myself. "And here is a succubus at my own expense (as Müller frankly tells us anecdotes of the illusions which would haunt his eyes, shut and open), an amorous fancy-piece when I come to my Chapter on the Cheats of the Senses and Spectral Phantoms." I went on with my book, and said what still the ghost waned in the gray of the dawn. And I said then, in the triumph of my pride, as I laid down to rest, "I have written that which silots with precision man's place in the region of nature; written that which will found a school—form disciples; and race after race of those who cultivate truth through pure reason shall accept my basis if they enlarge my building." And again I heard the sigh, but this time it caused no surprise. "Certainly," I murmured, "a very strange thing is the nervous system!" So I turned on my pillow, and, wearied out, fell asleep.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE next day the last of the visiting patients to whom my forenoons were devoted had just quitted me when I was summoned in haste to attend the steward of a Sir Philip Derval, not residing at his family seat, which was about five miles from L——. It was rarely indeed that persons so far from the town, when of no higher rank than this applicant, invoked my services. But it was my principle to go wherever I was summoned; my profession was not gain, my profession was healing, to which gain was an incident, not the essential. This case the messenger reported as urgent. I went on horseback, and rode fast; but swiftly as I cantered through the village that skirted the approach to Sir Philip Derval's park the evident care bestowed on the accommodation of the cottagers forcibly struck me. I felt that I was on the lands of a rich, intelligent, and beneficent proprietor. Entering the park, and passing before the manor-house, the contrast between the neglect and decay of the absentee's stately hall and the smiling homes of his villagers was diconsolately mournful.

An imposing pile, built apparently by Vanbrugh, decorated with pilasters, supporting a portico, with grand perron (or double flight of stairs to the entrance), enriched with urns and statues, but discolored, mildewed, stripped, half hid with unpruned creepers and ivy. Most of the windows were closed with shutters, rotting for want of paint; in some of the casements the panes were broken; the peacock perched on the shattered balustrade that fenced a garden overgrown with weeds. The sun glared hot on the place, and made its ruinous condition still more painfully apparent. I was glad when a winding in the park road shut the house from my sight. Suddenly, I emerged through a copse of ancient yew-trees, and before me there gleamed, in abrupt whiteness, a building evidently designed for the family mausoleum. Classical in its outline, with the blind iron door niched into stone walls of massive thickness, surrounded by a funereal garden of cocs and evergreens, fenced with an iron rail, parti-gilt.

The suddenness with which this House of the Dead came upon me heightened almost into pain, if not into awe, the dismal impression which the aspect of the deserted home, with its neighborhood, had made. I spurred my horse and soon arrived at the door of my patient, who lived in a fair brick house at the other extremity of the park.

I found my patient, a man somewhat advanced in years, but of a robust conformation, in bed; he had been seized with a fit, which was supposed to be apoplectic, a few hours before; but was already sensible, and out of immediate danger. After I had prescribed a few simple remedies, I took aside the patient's wife, and went with her to the parlor below stairs, to make some inquiry as to her husband's ordinary regimen and habits of life. These seemed sufficiently regular; I could discover no apparent cause for the fit, which presented symptoms not familiar to my experience. "Has your husband never had such fits before?"

"Never."

"Had he experienced any sudden emotion? Had he heard any unexpected news? or had any thing, happened to put him out?"

The woman looked much disturbed at these inquiries. I pressed them more urgently. At last she burst into tears, and, clasping my hand, said, "Oh! doctor, I ought to tell you—I sent for you on purpose—yet I fear you will not believe me—my good man has seen a ghost!"

"A ghost!" said I, repressing a smile. "Well, tell me all that I may prevent the ghost coming again."

The woman's story was prolix. Its substance was this: Her husband, habitually an early riser, had left his bed that morning still earlier than usual, to give directions about some cattle that were to be sent for sale to a neighboring fair. An hour afterward he had been found by a shepherd near the mausoleum apparently lifeless. On being removed to his own house he had recovered speech, and bidding all except his wife leave the room, he then told her that on walking across the park toward the cattle-sheds he had seen what appeared to him at first a pale light by the iron door of the mausoleum. On approaching nearer, this light changed into the distinct and visible form of his master, Sir Philip Derval, who was then abroad—supposed to be in the East—where he had resided for many years. The impression on the steward's mind was so strong that he called out, "Oh! Sir Philip!" when, looking still more intently, he perceived that the face was that of a corpse. As he continued to gaze the apparition seemed gradually to recede, as if vanishing into the sepulchre itself. He knew no more; he became unconscious. It was the excess of the poor woman's alarm, on hearing this strange tale, that had made her so anxious to send for me instead of the parish apothecary? She fancied so astounding a cause for her husband's seizure could only be properly dealt with by some medical man reputed to have more than ordinary learning. And the steward himself objected to the apothecary in the immediate neighborhood as more likely to annoy him by gossip than a physician from a comparative distance.

I took care to lose the confidence of the good wife by parading too quickly my disbelief in the phantom her husband declared that he had seen; but as the story itself seemed at once to decide the nature of the fit to be epileptic, I began to tell her of similar delusions which, in my experience, occurred to those subjected to epilepsy, and finally soothed her into the conviction that the apparition was clearly reducible to natural causes. Afterward I led her on to talk about Sir Philip Derval, less from my curiosity, I felt in myself as to the absent proprietor than from my desire to re-familiarize her own mind to his image as a living man. The steward had been in the service of Sir Philip's father, and had known Sir Philip himself from a child. He was warmly attached to his master, whose splendid woman described as a man of rare benevolence and great eccentricity, which last she imputed to his studious habits. He had succeeded to the title and estates as a minor. For the first few years after attaining his majority he had mixed much in the world. But of late years Court his house had been filled with gay companions, and the scene of lavish hospitality. But this life was not in proportion to the grandeur of the mansion, still less to the expenditure of the owner. He had become greatly embarrassed. Some love disappointment (so it was rumored) occurring simultaneously with pecuniary difficulties, he had suddenly changed his way of life, shut himself up from his old friends, lived in absolute solitude, taken to book and scientific pursuits, and, as the old woman said, vaguely but expressively, "to odd ways." He had gradually, in economy both as to time and money, sold off his horses, his dogs, his guns, and finally quitted the country, and taken to a life of travel. He was now about forty-eight years old, and had been absent many years abroad. He wrote frequently to his steward, giving him minute and thoughtful instructions as to the employment, comforts, and houses of the peasantry, but apparently ordering him to spend no money on the grounds and mansion, and stating, as a reason why the latter ought to be allowed to fall to decay, his intention to pull it down whenever he returned to England.

I staid much longer than my engagements well warranted at my patient's house, not leaving till the sufficer, after a quiet sleep, had removed from her husband all his arm-chair, taken food, and seemed perfectly recovered from his attack.

Riding homeward I mused on the difference that education makes, even pathologically, between man and man. Here was a brawny habitant of rural fields, leading the healthiest of lives, not surrounded, as the family we call indignation, stricken down almost to death's door by his fright at an optical illusion, explicable, if examined, by the same obvious causes which had impressed me the night before with a moment's belief in a sound and a spectre—me, who, thanks to divine education, was utterly proof to any such few minutes after, convinced that no phantom, the ghoulliest that ear ever heard or eye ever saw, can be any thing else but a nervous phenomenon.

FAMISHING WOLVES.

I HAD been living for some months in a town on the Volga, in the centre of European Russia, forty versts from Jaroslav, the government-county town. To reach that town I must traverse a wild and uninhabited track, where there were only two small hamlets, at one of which the twenty-verst post-station was to be found, if not buried in snow, the team of three horses, commonly called in Russia "a troika," had been carefully selected from the various stabling establishments in the place, the cost for driver and horses to be three and a half roubles (or about half a guinea), the route of a hundred epecks being worth a half-penny or even more than three shillings), which was no great price for such a journey in such weather. Two wolves had been killed in our principal street only in a week. One I had shot in my own court-yard the day before I started, and many reports were current of their hunger and unusual boldness. It was even said that a small village, about thirty versts distant, had been attacked by them in force. These facts and stories made me careful about requisite defenses. My six-barrel traveling companion was carefully loaded, and placed in my left ready for use; a magnificent nine-inch bear-knife in a sheath, and a formidable black-thorn cudgel heavily weighted at the handle, belonged also to my armament. The family flask, bag of provisions, bottle of water, matches, cigars, and portmanteau having been stowed away, I was about to step into the open sledge, when a Russian neighbor came up and asked leave to join in the journey to Jaroslav. My neighbor, though a gentleman for whom I had much respect, was the last man I should have chosen as a traveling companion in a narrow sledge, for he weighed over twenty stone, had great difficulty in getting in, and, when once he was seated, almost required horse-power to get him up again. He was a phlegmatic, lazy, good-natured, muscular, and apparently fat gentleman who was not to be refused; so, his request granted, he rolled in on the right side and filled three parts of the sledge. My own three servants crossed themselves, whereby they meant, "God give you a safe journey!" The members of my own family cried out to the driver, "Now, sir!" and the driver having gathered up the rope reins, I jumped in, and with a noo-noo to the cattle, off we went dead against the setting sun.

Fat-sides having observed my weapons, grunted in his own Russian, of which he made the least possible use. "Pistols! Wolves. Shoot. Good."

"Have you any weapons?" I asked.

"No."

"Well, take this bear-knife."

"Good," he said again, and relapsed into his corner.

Daylight came struggling through the heavy morning clouds, and disclosed a cheerless waste of ridges and valleys of snow. The trees, which at wide intervals bordered the track, did not prevent us from often plunging into great pits of soft snow the moment our driver turned but a few feet from the track. This occurred so frequently, and gave us so much trouble in digging ourselves out, that it was noon before we had made sixteen versts—hardly ten miles—having been six hours on the way.

At this point in our journey the driver sent the blood dancing through my veins by the alarming cry of "Volki! Volki!" (Wolves! Wolves!) as I sprang from my seat, and, looking ahead, saw six great, gaunt, and no doubt hungry wolves, sitting exactly in our way, at the distance of about a hundred yards or less. Our horses had huddled themselves together, trembling in every limb, and refused to stir. I shouted and fired at them. The wolves also refused to stir. My fat friend, gathering a large handful of hay from the sledge bottom, rolled it into a ball, and was just handing it to me, saying, "Match," I understood him at once. The driver managed, by awful lashing and shouting, to get his horses forward, and we came within a short distance of our enemies. By this time I had succeeded in setting fire to the ball of hay, and threw it as far as I could, and then threw it in among them. It worked like a charm. Instantly the wretches parted, three on each side, and skulked off in the bright sagles, their tails dragging as if they were beaten curs. On dashed our brave team—lash, lash—noo, noo.

"Hurrah!" I shouted, with a frightened heart; "we are safe this time, thank God!"

"Wait. Look back," said Fat-sides.

I did so, and I saw the wolves, who had joined each other in council, evidently debating, or at least to deliberate. Our horses were going at their utmost speed, the driver standing up and using lash and voice with all his might to urge them on to the station, then only about a mile and a half ahead. Luckily the road or track, as far as we could see, was straight before us, so that no fear that we could gain the station before the wolves, should they pursue us. Looking back just as we passed a knoll in the track, I saw the whole pack in swift pursuit.

I had often been told that wolves will not attack a party unless they are driven by hunger, or in no large pack, yet here they were, coming up to attack us; there was now no doubt about that. Hunger therefore must be the only motive that could have made them daring. With the consciousness of an impending death-struggle, I prepared for the worst. My fat companion was equally on my side. "Keep your wife and children; for another, to the Great Dispeser of events. Then, throwing off my sheepskin coat, so as not to encumber the free action of my arms and legs, I sprang on the front seat beside the driver, but with my back to the horses, and my face to the enemy. I said to the driver, "They are coming, brother; drive fast, but steadily. I have six bullets in this pistol. Don't move from your seat, but drive right in the centre of the track." My fat companion sat still in his corner, and under-stood nor spoke; but I saw the blade of my bear-knife gleaming in his hand.

The track had become worse, so that the horses could not maintain their pace. In a short time the wolves ran beside the sledge, the horses strained and shot on, keeping their distance, but in forcing our way through a drift, we came to a walking pace, and the first wolf on my side made a dash at the horse next to me. I fired, and within a foot and a half of his head when I fired, and the ball went through his brain. I shouted my triumph in English; my companion echoed it with a "Bravo!" The second wolf received my second fire in the leg, which must have shattered the bone, for he dropped behind instantly. The driver, who had cried from the corner. But the same moment was the moment of our greatest peril. My pistol fell into the sledge, as I was dragged violently

CAPTAIN STRONG'S ADVENTURE.

THE scene depicted in the spirited illustration on the preceding page is described in the following letter:

WASHINGTON, September 10, 1861.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

I herewith forward you an excellent photograph of Captain William E. Strong, Company F (Belle City Rifles), Second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, taken by Mr. John Golden, Whitehurst's Gallery, this city.

While on duty extending our line of pickets, three miles northwest of Chain Bridge, on Wednesday last, Captain Strong was taken prisoner. As he neared the river he left three men while, according to the orders of Major Lawrence, he reconnoitred, preparatory to assigning them positions. Having proceeded but a short distance, and when without discovering the slightest trace of the enemy, he returned by a slight diagonal course to avoid the ravine he had just passed over, when he suddenly was surrounded by six rebel pickets, secreted in a ravine and four behind. The Captain surrendered; and while they marched him about twenty-five yards themselves by ripping off the colored epithets, and grinning themselves the pleasure of a hanging bee. The Captain wondered their old not always have, but still did not see any way of escape until one of them, noticing the splendid gold of revolver, said they would relieve him of them. "Certainly, gentlemen," said the Captain, drawing them from his belt behind him, and seeking them silently: "here they are!" As he said this he struck his field each, and two men fell dead at his feet, while he wheeled and secured cover in some thick bushes, eluding the immediate pursuit of all except two who were of sufficient fleetness to threaten, the other, a small round pistol ball, gnarling through his left cheek and coming out of his mouth, without injuring a tooth, words, his slightly setting his tongue!

Emerging from the cover of the thicket, he was headed off by one of the mounted men, who presented his carbine close to the Captain's breast. Here the young man's presence of mind (or natural shrinking) saved him; for as the horseman fired he suddenly sheared, and the ball passing by his coat, vest, and shirt close along the bottom, and slightly grazing his back. The Captain will be remembered forward at this moment, Captain Strong returned the compliment, putting a bullet in the rebel's shoulder, and had the satisfaction of seeing him fall from his horse, one foot remaining in the stirrup, and striking the ground with a stump every time the affrighted horse jumped. In a moment more the Captain was by some of his pickets, who heard the firing, completely exhausted from the unusual exercise and the loss of blood from his wound.

I have been to-day using particulars of Captain Strong. He was born in Janesville, New York, and was but twenty years old on the 15th day of last June. For many years he has resided at Racine, Wisconsin, where his father and mother still reside. Two years ago since he was spending a few days at Andover with his uncle before going to Amherst to study Latin and Greek, while walking a rope at the gymnasium, he fell, breaking all his ribs on the left side, and his right arm near the wrist. From this he has never fully recovered. Without entering at Cambridge, he returned to Racine on crutches, prosecuting his law studies in the office of Messrs. Strong & Fuller, and at the succeeding bar of which he was admitted to the bar of Racine County. On the 15th, hearing of the first call, he opened a law-studying office, and on the same day his company—the "Belle City Rifles"—was full. At Bull Run he fought bravely, and narrowly escaped from being killed. One bullet carrying off his cap, another cutting his sword-belt; and though remaining in the battle to the last, still the retreat, from some apparent confusion, and pain from his old internal injuries, he had to be carried from the field to have dead men's shoes.

Captain Strong is reckoned one of the best shots in the West—at least one of the "Chicago Mechanics' Light" will show, and so many of his regiment who saw him shoot while in camp. He is a splendid rifle shot—for day and a fully laid his double-barreled gun on the ground about ten paces in front of him, three tow pigeons up in the air, turned a "hand-spring," seized his piece, and brought down both pigeons.

I can not close this narrative without paying a tribute due to the virtue of temperance. Like our lamented Ellsworth, Captain Strong never drinks intoxicating liquors.

Truly yours, S. WHITELEY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1861.

THE PLAN OF THE CAMPAIGN.

WE believe we may say that the Plan of the autumn and winter campaign has been determined, and that the leading generals are apprised of the parts they are to play in it. It involves operations of so extensive a character as to be without parallel in history, and to be morally certain of effecting their object—namely, the suppression of the rebellion before next spring.

The Plan presumes that the rebels will remain inactive at their present posts. Should General Beauregard attack Washington, a change in the programme might be the result, as it is confidently anticipated that he would meet with an overwhelming defeat, which would probably precipitate matters. Again, should General Johnston undertake an aggressive movement against Cairo, the Mississippi Expedition might proceed to work more speedily than is now intended. It is not believed, however, that either of these contingencies will occur. At Washington as at Cairo, an attacking force would fight at such enormous disadvantage that it is not supposed the experienced leaders of the rebel army would wantonly run the risk of a forward movement.

Assuming, then, that the rebels pursue the wisest course, and wait to be attacked in their intrenchments, we have reason to believe that, in the first or second week of October, the campaign will be simultaneously commenced on the coast, in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe, at Manassas, at Harper's Ferry, in Kentucky, on the Mississippi, and in the western portion of Missouri.

We believe that three naval expeditions are being fitted out in New England and New York. The camps at Hempstead and Sandy Hook are to furnish men for two of them; the third will recruit 10,000 volunteers in New England. We presume we shall not be far wrong if we predict that these expeditions will be commanded by Generals Butler, Burnside, and Lander. Two of them will probably operate on different points of the Southern coast, with a view of distracting the attention of the enemy from the line of the Potomac: one, for instance, may effect a landing at or near Port Royal, South Carolina, while the other, reinforced by the garrison of Fort Pickens, may reopen the excellent harbor of Pensacola to the commerce of the world. It is likely that the third, which will consist of at least 10,000 men, and will be commanded by General Burnside, will operate in the Chesapeake, landing so as, on one side, to flank the rebel army on the Potomac; and, on the other, to take Norfolk in the rear, in case the rebels should fall back from Manassas. All of these expeditions will be provided with ample artillery, and the landings will be effected under cover of heavy naval batteries. Ships, steamers, gun-boats, and launches are, we believe, being actively prepared for this service.

Simultaneously with the departure of these expeditions, we look for a forward movement on the part of General Banks. A glance at the map will show how General M'Clellan will operate with him. If the enemy resist him in force, M'Clellan will naturally attack Manassas at once. If he moves on without opposition, the attack will be deferred until he is in a position to take part in it by flanking the enemy. We have an intimation that simultaneously with General Banks's movement, General Sickles will cross the Potomac some twenty miles below Washington, with a view to gain a position between Manassas and Richmond. These details, however, are of course as yet undetermined; and the intimation is merely a shrewd guess. The main object—that Manassas shall be threatened on three sides simultaneously, while a column under General Burnside advances to cut off the retreat of the enemy—may be regarded as pretty certain.

Meanwhile, further West, General Anderson may be expected, by 10th October, to have raised such an army of the Mississippi as will, if necessaries as to keep Tennessee effectually in check, and to co-operate efficiently with General Fremont who by that time will probably have reduced Hattiesburg and driven all the rebels in the neighborhood of Springfield, Missouri, and to man a powerful expedition for the descent of the Mississippi. We do not look for naval operations on the Mississippi proper at first. The fortified points on that river will naturally be assailed by land. Corps d'armée will converge upon them from either shore, and reduce Island Hattiesburg—the key to which the thing is practicable, with the bayonet. The gun-boats will be useful in reconnoissance, and the river will prove valuable for the transportation of supplies; but after the fighting is done, it will be done on land. If the campaign in that region is to keep pace with that in the East, the rebel forces under Price, or M'Culloch, or whoever has succeeded them, must be driven from possession of Springfield, Missouri, and the vicinity, must be defeated and driven into Arkansas, or scattered altogether, before October 15. Whether this can be achieved, we have no means of estimations which are only known to Major-General Fremont.

Thus, if our information be correct, the battle will have begun along the whole line, from the Atlantic to Kansas, by the middle of October, and at least two points on the coast will be in the possession of or under bombardment by our forces. It is believed that the whole force employed will be not less than 350,000 men, exclusive of reserves and of home guards in Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri. On that at every point attacked we shall probably outnumber the enemy. Our armies will be well supplied, well provisioned, well drilled, well equipped, and well commanded. Under such circumstances, it is not extravagant to expect success.

It is not reasonable to believe that the rebel troops from the Gulf will be sent forward unsupplied under arms in Virginia, while their homes are being assailed by expeditions from the North. Nor is it probable that troops deficient in equipment, clothing, shoes, arms, medicines, and supplies of all kinds—as the rebel troops are—will contend on equal terms with a force provided with those necessaries in profusion. Lastly, as it was proved at Bull Run, that whenever Northerners and Southerners met in a fair field, the former were the better men, it is not likely that an inferior Southern force will any where stand against a superior Northern force.

We therefore say that the Plan of the campaign evidently contemplates operations that must be remembered we are not fighting to subjugate the South, to abolish Slavery, or to conquer territory. Our object is merely to defeat and disperse the rebel armies engaged in overrunning the Southern States. This done, our work is achieved. Wherever we defeat and disperse the rebel armies the people will be invited to exercise their privileges as loyal members of Congress; the postal facilities will be restored to them; they will be protected from further spoliation by the rebel banditti, and restored to all the privileges of sovereign citizens of the United States. The recent elections in Maryland and Kentucky, and the late demonstrations in North Carolina, show how gladly the change will be welcomed. There will not be a Southern State in which a rebel ticket will stand any chance at the polls after Jeff Davis's armies are defeated in the field.

THE LOUNGER.

BLIND GUIDES.

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS, in his message of the 29th April, says, that by the treaty with Great Britain after the Revolution "the several States were each by name recognized to be independent." The famous ninth resolution of the New York Democratic Convention is the popular version by way of aiding and comforting the eminent traitor. "In the treaty of peace which the States conquered from Great Britain, they were recognized as a separate nation, but of each separate State was acknowledged." In like manner, a newspaper which supports that convention and patriotic doctrine undertakes to rap the Evening Post over the knuckles for saying that the Constitution was not adopted by the States but by the people of United States. The Evening Post is quite able to fight its own battles, but the question involved is interesting to all of us.

Mr. Everett and Mr. Motley, among the later authorities upon this subject, are quite sufficient to satisfy the most persistent skeptic.

The first point remarks that the States were enumerated in the treaty for convenience; to designate what colonies upon this continent were acknowledged to be independent. He then proceeds to show that the Declaration of Independence calls the people of the colonies "one people," and quotes Charles Lowell, who says that "the act separate independence and individual sovereignty of the several States were never thought of" by the men in whose hands it was.

But even conceding to Mr. Davis and his friends of the Democratic Convention that the several States were recognized as so many separate sovereign powers, what then? How does that help secession? Granting that they were absolutely sovereign until the Constitution was adopted, by the terms of that instrument the people of the States abdicated the sovereignty of the State so far as it was delegated to the general government. The question, as Mr. Everett most cogently says, is not what was the form of a government in any State before the Constitution was adopted, but what are the provisions of the Constitution in regard to its own supremacy.

The whole subject is so admirably treated in Mr. Everett's address that no one should fail to make himself familiar with it.

But "the Federal Constitution was adopted by the States themselves, and by no other," that is accepted it," says the ninth resolution; and the newspaper defends the statement by quoting the seventh article of the Constitution: "The ratification of the Convention of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

But it is matter of history that it was not adopted by the States, as such, but by the people of the States, who in their sovereign capacity called the General Government. Moreover, to destroy the State theory completely, the Constitution was not binding upon the people of any State, however unanimous the ratification, until the consent of the people of nine had been obtained. That constituted a sufficient majority of the people of all the States to warrant the organization and operation of the national Government.

"It appears," Mr. Everett says of the Constitution, "not to have emanated into by the States, but to have been ordained and established by the people of the United States, for themselves and posterity." The States are not named in it, nearly all the characteristic powers of sovereignty are expressly granted to the General Government, and expressly withheld to the States," etc., etc.

Mr. Motley still more pointedly declares: "The Constitution was not drawn up by the States: it was not proposed by the States: it was not adopted by the States: it was not ratified by the States. The States never acceded to it, and possess no power to secede from it. It was established, and ordained, and ever since by a power superior to the States—by the people of the whole land in their aggregate capacity, acting through Congress. Most of delegates were chosen for the purpose within each State, independently of the State Governments, after the project had been framed."

The point is, that the Constitution of the United States was framed by a Convention of the people from all the States, and submitted to the people of the people of all the States: and it was declared operative only when the people of nine States had accepted it. But when they had accepted it, it was not a compact between State and State, but the old Confederation—it was a supreme Government, which ignored States, and acted directly upon the people. The expression "between the States" is interpreted by the words of the instrument itself. It does not and can not express a dissoluble compact. It expresses that the people living in so many States have established a supreme law, and when you explore the terms of that law, you find that they have and can have no States, no power over it whatsoever.

The object of Mr. Davis, of the ninth resolution, and of the newspapers that support it, is to inoculate the idea that the Constitution is a compact between States, and not a supreme law of the people living in different States, and to be modified only as itself provides. This is the question which the war will forever settle. When that is over, we shall either be a nation or something less than a nation. The latter will be our fate if Jefferson Davis and the ninth resolution carry the day.

"HAPPY AS A SLAVE OF GALLIFET."

Two or three weeks ago we were speaking of slave insurrections as one of the natural "Consequences" of the rebellion of the masters, and alluded to the proverb "Happy as a slave of Gallifet," which occurs in the history of the San Domingo revolt, and is generally used to show that, while slavery may smother for a time the outbreak of the manhood it degrades, yet, when the pressure is removed, the revenge of that degradation is frightful.

This, indeed, furnishes one of the most hopeless and heart-sickening arguments to those who insist that slavery is irremediable. "If you free them they will rise and cut every body's throat. Look at San Domingo!" Yes; but why not look at Jamaica? In San Domingo it was the effort to enslave those already freed which occasioned the outbreak. In Jamaica, where eight hundred thousand were freed, the change was effected more peacefully than that of a ward election in New York; as tranquilly, in fact, as an act of worship, which indeed to most of them it was. For the African blood is not fierce. It is a mild, loving race, although like all men they may be stung to vengeance.

But is it I who am guilty when I strike the hand that would sell my child or dishonor my wife? The difficulty in emancipation was never yet the slave, but always the master. You may say that Jamaica does not grow so much cotton as she did with slavery. But if that mere fact were any argument, which of course it is not, how may set it off with the other fact that Barbadoes grows twice as much sugar without slavery. In Jamaica it was not the slaves, but the masters, who would not adapt themselves in good faith to the new system.

If servile insurrections are really so frightful as we are used to say and believe, there is always an easier way than the halter and powder and shot to repress them. And that is emancipation. If any body prefers the San Domingo method to the Jamaica method, let him hold fast to the system. It is only because the black is a human being, a broken race that it has not risen behind the rebellions army, and swept the land with fiery wrath from the Gulf to the Potomac. That is a good and patient as it is, when it does rise, it rises with deliberation. And then it is likely to flow as the charity which pays a pair of shoes and sends away every right of human nature. Why should we not? How God made them men; and our calling them things does not make them so. The very fear of their frightful revenge of wrongs should make us feel them to be men, and know what we would do if we were slaves.

This is a long introduction to the remark that the usual acceptation of the proverb "Happy as a slave of Gallifet" is entirely incorrect. The argument based upon it is therefore false. I know how kindly you treat them, even to a proverb of kindness, they will roast you alive, for all that. Therefore, at any rate, emancipation is the line the use made of it by the Lounger was to refute the inference of the contentment of slaves from their affection for their masters. But the fact is, as was pointed out to him by a friend who refers to a communication of Mr. C. K. Whipple to the Boston Liberator and Commonwealth, in the form of a speech of Mr. Everett's, who had also referred to the proverb as usually understood, Mr. Whipple shows from a history of the "Island of Hayti, formerly Saint Unveiled," printed at Cape Henry, San Domingo, in October, 1814, and written by the Baron de Vastey, that the treatment of slaves upon the Gallifet plantation was so atrocious that the proverb was only a terrible sarcasm, as a hanging father in child's necklace; so that to say that a man was "as happy as a slave of Gallifet" was to call him the most miserable of men. Mr. Whipple quotes some of the sickening details which gave rise to the saying.

It is a curious and most interesting correction of a very serious misapprehension.

LOUNGING ELSEWHERE.

DURING the last fortnight there have been a great many loungers at Syracuse, if one might judge from the crowds hanging around hotel doors and swarming through the streets—especially if he looked into that handsome hall, which has seldom been so thronged with such eager and earnest people. At one time, moreover, almost as if one lounger from Albany might hang out of the window. For in a Union Patriotic Convention, while the ex-governor Albany lounger was getting person was trying to speak, some one quietly said: "This Mr. Murphy spoke a fortnight ago at a peace meeting in my neighborhood, and tried to raise a white flag."

That was an extremely doubtful moment for Mr. Murphy. A Conventionist rose instantly, like an angry man. Mr. Murphy stepped from the floor upon a seat, while the excited crowd pressed upon him. He stood erect in the midst of storm unhammered. He came to the front of the platform, and raised both hands imploringly and menacingly. But as Mr. Lincoln remarks of Mr. Douglas, "The sea of people rose around Mr. Murphy. Mr. Murphy, after shaking his finger at the one who had mentioned the white flag, as if he would whip him the lie, stood quietly up, occasionally bending to try to make somebody hear. For full five minutes there was such a howling confusion, enough that no harm would befall the man. The Convention was not composed of the kind that throw riots or duels to fight in them; and after the excitement—one of the best possible officers—had skillfully suggested that he had heard no motion that the gentleman should not be allowed to speak, such was the common sense of two hundred lips, and the gentleman had leave to retire.

There was another gentleman who had walked straight out of Dickens. When the motion was made or resolution offered, this gentleman rose and gravely moved that it lie upon the table. His idea of a deliberative body evidently was that it was a body which laid things away to keep. He was incessantly running with a stone to block the wheels, but he dropped his block in front and stopped all progress. The Convention at length grew tired of his layings upon the table. But his courage and tenacity were equal to the task, and he would move that it lie upon the table.

There had been a Committee sent out. Anothe er of two delegates was dispatched to find them. Suddenly an inspired member moved that our friend of the table should be sent for the two. It was a vote. He went and sought them in vain, and the Convention had peace. Suddenly he returned. At the first opening he rose and shouted "Mr. President." The President and the Convention heard, and sighed within. He stated that the Committee asked leave to report that it had been unable to discharge its duty, and asked to be relieved from further service. He sat gravely down, and another member jumped up and moved that the Committee be discharged with the thanks of the Convention: when from quite another part of the hall came a clear voice. "I move you, Sir, that the motion lie upon the table." There was a cheers of laughter, and the motion was put and unanimously carried. After which there were no more motions to lie upon the table.

There was a Lounger in the gallery who remembered that Emerson used to call Mrs. Abby Folsom "the fun of Conventions," and he could not help smiling to see that all Conventions might be troubled with fleas.

THE EVENT OF THE HOUR.

THERE is general expectation of a battle upon the Potomac. Before this paper is printed it may have taken place. It is even said that on Saturday last several persons went from New York to see the fighting. If it be so, let us hope that they each took a rifle, and meant to see the fight from the ranks and not from the rear.

If there be a battle, has every man considered the effect of its result? The Rebel beat, or we shall be beaten. In July we did not put the case so. In July we were to beat, and we had Bull Run. At this time, if there be an engagement it is along the line of the Potomac, it will be the greatest of the war. The rebels, at least, are not likely to assemble so strong an army again. Suppose we fight, and they beat us—beaten.

In that case they will doubtless withdraw from Virginia, and the campaign will close by the advance of our army to the occupation of the Rebel State that permitted itself to be made the battlefield. Meanwhile naval expeditions will have given us the occupation of a long reach of coast. The occupation of Virginia will strengthen and secure Kentucky, and Frémont's task in Missouri will be easier. With our advance the tone of England, which loves success, will be modified. The rebels will feel pinched by a thousand discontinuances: and they will cast up the year's accounts, and try in vain to find a balance in their favor.

But suppose we fight and that we are beaten. Are we likely to give up? In a strong Southern party likely to be developed at the North? Will England and France at once recognize the rebel Government?

For France and England none of us can speak very confidently: but we may assume that we know ourselves. And we know that, in giving it up, disastrous as the defeat may be, we shall rather nerve ourselves for the remaining struggle. We are by no means accustomed as yet to be, or are not yet as grimly in earnest as we shall be if defeated. Unquestionably we believe that we shall finally conquer; but we have come for it too easily. We feel that the time has come for him to go. If we are beaten upon the Potomac every man will feel that the time for one; he will see that this Government is gone unless he and all his friends hasten to its rescue. He will agree that self-defense knows no law, and that every weapon that can harm the foe may be hurled at him. We do not have no more squeamishness about the military necessity of emancipation, nor will the people suffer their Government to protect and further the system from which treason springs, and has always sprung in this country. No will the responsibility rest upon us. The rebels have abused the sword; they can not complain if they fall by it.

As for the strong rebel party among ourselves, it is less likely to be developed by our defeat than by our success. A defeated man or body is dangerous, but success makes us eager to protect our own. Mr. Ben Wood has not suspected his power. He would have been in a hundred-fold greater personal danger after a defeat than the Potomac. People are in the humor to hold their hero as fools and in the wrong when their kindred are lying dead upon the field. Maryland, of course, would try to rise. Baltimore would wrestle with Fort McHenry. But the line of Pennsylvania would be a line of fame, and New York would move as a giant to the battle.

If not, if this surmise is wrong, then we ought not to risk another battle. If we are so light of faith in our cause and ultimate victory that, with all our conditions and advantages known to us, we are willing to put our Government, and constitutional liberty, and civilization to the test of a single battle only, we are poltroons and murderers, and the sooner we shout aloud the surrender that is in our hearts the clearer will be our conscience hereafter.

THIEVES UPON "TREACHERY."

BRIGADE-GENERAL FLOYD and his friends began their exploits, as history relates, and will relate forever, by stealing. They stole guns, money, forts, arsenals, navy-yards, hospitals, ships, mints, postage-stamps; whatever, in fine, they could lay their hands on, they stole. But if the Government, that they stole now or the property, proceeded to take it or to try to take it, without informing the thieves, how, when, and where the effort was to be made, those virtuous gentlemen made the welkin ring with their cries of Treachery! treachery!

If the upright Floyd, in the intervals of pilfering, could find time to recreate his mind with light reading, we should recommend to his attention that pleasant passage of Gil Blas, in which the Brigadier-General Rolando tells his experience of treacherous interference.

"Meanwhile I committed all kinds of debauchery, in the company of other young men of the same disposition; and as our parents did not supply us with money sufficient to support such a delicious life, every one pilfered what he could at his own home; but that being also insufficient, we began to rob in the dark; when, unfortunately, the corregidor got notice of it, and would have caused us to be apprehended, had we not been informed of his treacherous design. Upon which we consulted our safety in flight, and resolved to conceal from our exploits to the highway. Since which time, gentlemen, God has given me grace to grow old in my profession, in spite of the dangers to which it is exposed."

HERMANN.

ALTHOUGH Clarke, the comedian, has gone, Hermann, the prestidigitateur, remains. If any intelligent man or woman wishes to know what that means, he or she should go to Mozart to learn. Mr. Hermann is a magician, a conjurer, a medicine-man, a professor of sleight-of-hand, a wonder-worker. He brings no testimonial which certify his great excellence in his way, and as there is always a peculiar interest in really admirable conjuring, and as he is the only man who has had a manner of magic, Mr. Hermann will probably find crowds who are anxious to forget for a moment the harassing cares of the times.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

DISTINGUISHED ADDICTS TO LADIES OF A LITERARY TURN. Never suppose that you are idle. He is never time or other to put you in his books, and the consequence is, you will remain one of the most unnoticed specimens unlikely to preserved, as far and as dead as possible. Not a fraction of color will there be left in you, and you will only be known to the unlearned reader, by which you will be able to trace your original beauty. In fact, a wise to an author is not much book-maudlin to enable him to dress up characters with. To clothe others the wretch does not scruple to cut up his own coat.

A HOPEFUL SCHOOL.—"Eh? by Jove, Sir, a new lane?" Such was the exclamation of a sanguine old buck, who, being his toilet, was looking out of window with a double eye-glass, one black hair among his white whiskers.

AS AFFECTIONATE FACT.—Most will not keep in this hot weather, and even if they could, would not. Though we have seen the meat mis overnight, and were pleased to think it was still all right, upon breakfasting with it for the morrow's dinner, yet the next day every scrap would be found to have gone, and gone, too, beyond all hope of recovery. Meat never goes off by halves, but goes wholly. In fact, it goes infinitely quicker than it comes. Husbands who are fond of hot dinners, and cannot bear to see the cold joint for they will never see there by any chance a bit of cold meat for weeks on any occasion.

AS Edwin lounged on the pier to get a relish for his dinner after swallowing two monstrous bloaters for his breakfast, he said to his companion, "Tell me now, Caroline, my dearest, and so excite the exclamatory muscles of my disposition, for I have been deprived of them by the excitement of appetite."

"You fellow, as in duty bound, the wife of his fond bosom pierced for a brief moment to the seaward of the pier, and received information from the passing breeze that blew there, whispered, "Cand say, love, why the pleasant island of Ceylon is so favorite a one for mammoths and monkeys?"

Edwin, thus appealed to, scratched his nose and struck his whiskers, and then, with his wife sharpened by either of these processes, was forced to let his wife explain that it was because they were the only animals that ever grew to was full of Cingalese. Observing his blank looks, she added in answer to his look, "Because, dear, don't be stupid; can't you put an 'h' in, and pronounce it 'Single hee'?" Feeling it expedient to look as if he knew it before, but, alas! he could do little more than put up a faint giggle. Whereupon he immediately made another daring effort to excite his risibility, by asking, "Who is the most dangerous animal to be met with in the Zoological Gardens?" and he burst, "Why, of course, dear, a Lucinda."

Conscious of his error, Edwin, with his best to look as though he understood her, but, struggle as he might to look it, the picture of his ignorance was too plain for the hand his wisely puzzled brow, said Angelina, "You are indeed dull, dear boy. Can you not see? They divide this Christian name, and call it a four-cinder?"

THE HEIGHT OF A WARM IMAGINATION.—Throwing open the windows, lying generally at full length on the sofa, leaving perpendicular, and fanning yourself for half an hour you—and intending to the gentle tickling of the waterspout—as it is called—to do the rest, down the street: with the happy combination of so many luxuries, it becomes as easy as lying to believe that you are sitting pebbles into the sea, to fancy that one is doing the color far niente at the seaside. We do not believe that any other thing of a tropical imagination, to put on only a suitable costume, and to try it in place of a four-poster.

THE PERSIST OF JOKING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.—The Painters inside the house and the Paviors hammering away distinctly outside, and the Plumber solder and tinning away being attacked, beyond all power of stoppage, outrageously at the same time. On our word, it is enough to make a Knight cross!

C. Y. P. "Well, then, the heat is perfectly right."

C. O. G. "Right, Sir! I don't understand you, Sir. What do you mean by saying it is right, Sir?"

C. Y. P. "I mean that the glass is quite right to be as much in the Shade as it is, for it is warm weather."

CHEERFUL OLD GENTLEMAN collapses.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE REBELS FALLING BACK.

A RALLYING PROCLAMATION was issued on 14th at Washington developed the fact that not only had the rebels who made the dash up to the Union pickets near the Chain Bridge fallen back, but that also a very large portion of their main force had done likewise from the positions formerly occupied by them.

RECONNOISSANCE AT LEWINSVILLE.

A reconnoissance party started from the Chain Bridge on 13th at seven o'clock a. m. under the charge of Colonel Stevens, of the Seventy-ninth New York State Militia. As the skirmishers approached the rebel pickets retired behind Lewinsville, which is situated at about seven miles from the starting point. The object of the party having been accomplished, they began to retrace their steps, but the rebels were determined they should not do this without some suffering. They therefore sent a far superior force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, to cut them off, while a line of battle was formed by the remainder of their forces. This was accomplished with skill, to which Captain Grilin replied. Several rounds were fired on either side, when a masked battery ceased fire, as to allow the rebels to advance out of the woods in which they were concealed. Before doing so, they threw on open order right. But to this the rebels would not agree, therefore a thirty-two pounder was put into action, the shot from which soon silenced the rebel battery. Captain Grilin again gave the order to charge, which had made their appearance on the road to Pell's Church, a specimen of his skill, and soon sent them flying, some with empty saddles, as the shells burst in their midst. The command then withdrew, and reached the Chain Bridge in good order.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

Governor Curtin presented colors to the Pennsylvania Regiments last week at Washington, in presence of the President and a number of officers. The Herald correspondent thus describes an incident of the affair:

"The rear ranks of each of the troops were allowed to gratify their desire to shake hands with General M'Clellan, while the General and his staff remained mounted on his men, and to have them know him, gratified them, and the feeling of confidence was restored. The President, Cabinet, Governors, and even the ladies, were lost sight of. General M'Clellan was the observed of all observers for the expanse of a private. He talked little, bowed to each man, and looked pleased all the time. Each man had the satisfaction of electing to say to the General. One man said, 'General, we're going to lick them rebels.' Another, 'You will allow us to do it soon.' 'Very soon, if the enemy stand long enough,' was the General's reply.

"At last Captain Barker, of the Chicago cavalry corps, stepped up to the General and said, 'Sir, we have come to the General to back, or shake his hand too much, as he has to ride all day.' The hand was freely, and much to the pig to do with the hand they were shaking. He promised that they would have their chance, and in only a few weeks to them. They instantly complied, when the General, removing his hat, rode through the ranks.

"'S SOLDIERS!—We have had our last retreat. We have seen our last defeat. You stand by me, and I will stand by you, and together we will win our efforts."

THE EMANCIPATION QUESTION IN MISSOURI.

The following letter from the President to General Frémont needs but little comment:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 11, 1861.

Major-General John C. Frémont, St. Louis, Mo.

GENERAL: Yours of the 8th, in answer to mine of the 2d instant, is received. I learned that you, upon the ground, could better judge of the necessities of your position than I could, and hence I wrote you that I would not order the modification of your proclamation of August 30 I perceived no general objection to it; the particular clause in relation to the confiscation of property and the liberation of slaves appeared to me to be objectionable, in that it forestalled the action of Congress, passed the 6th of last August, upon the same subject, and which, in my opinion, would operate better. The degree of said proclamation be so modified, held, and construed as to conform to the said act of Congress, and the instructions on the same subject contained in the act of Congress passed July 17, and now pending your vote for instructions, Congress proposes, approved August 6, 1861, and that said act be published by you for the information of all concerned.

"Your obedient servant, A. LINCOLN."

KENTUCKY THOROUGHLY LOYAL.

On September 9 the Kentucky Legislature met. Governor Magoffin issued the following proclamation:

"Fellow-citizens, Kentucky's peace and neutrality have been wantonly violated, her soil has been invaded, the rights of her citizens have been grossly infringed by the armed forces of the United States. This has not been done without cause; therefore—

"I, Beriah Magoffin, Governor Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the Governor be requested to call out the militia of the State to repel said invasion, and the invaders.

"Resolved, That the United States be invoked to give aid and assistance, that protection to invasion which is secured to the States by the 4th section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States.

"Resolved, That the United States Senators be, and he is hereby requested to cause immediately upon the active meeting of the Congress to the military district.

"Resolved, That we appeal to the people of Kentucky and to the people of the United States, by the ties of common interest and common defense, by the remembrances of the past, by the love of liberty, by our historical existence, to unite in repelling and driving out the wanton violators of our peace and security, all others connected with them.

MAGOFFIN TRIES TO BETRAY THE STATE, BUT IS FOILED.

On 13th' Governor Magoffin vetoed the resolutions. They were, however, immediately passed over his veto, and the Governor was ordered to require the withdrawal of the Confederates from Kentucky. Accordingly Governor Magoffin issued the following proclamation, in obedience to the resolutions:

"The Government of the Confederate States, the State of Tennessee, and all others connected, are hereby informed that Kentucky expects the Confederate or Tennessee troops to be withdrawn from her soil unconditionally."

REBELLION TO BE PUNISHED.

On 14th Mr. Hunton reported a bill to punish rebellion in the State. It was made a special order for Monday.

The bill will make it felony to aid the war by collecting troops for the purpose of levying war, or to do so, or by joining or patriating with any company with the intent to join the rebellion. The punishment proposed is death by any citizen as a Confederate soldier is punishable by death. This bill will not affect the rank and file but will be applicable to those who return to their allegiance within sixty days.

THE REBELS DEFEATED IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

General Rosecrans succeeded in engaging the rebel forces under General Floyd, Wise, Heth, and other rebels, and after more than twelve hours of battle, the rebels began to retreat, and after dark they were driven from their position. They did under the cover of darkness. The engagement was a hard fought one, the rebels having the advantage of position, and also of greater numbers both of men and artillery. The Union loss is reported at about a rapid fifteen hundred. The rebel loss of men can not be ascertained, as they removed their dead and wounded. The great loss of material and baggage was heavy, all of which fell into the hands of General Rosecrans's brigade. Twenty-five of the prisoners, taken at the time that Colonel Tyler's force was attacked at Cross Lane, have been released. Floyd's force are said to be entirely driven from their stronghold and routed.

REPORTED WRECK OF THE "SUMTER."

Another pirate, the notorious Semmes, is reported to have been wrecked on the island of Trinidad, near Port of Spain, on or about the 29th of August. No further particulars have been received, and it is not known whether any of the crew were drowned or not.

PLAN OF THE HARBOR OF BEAUFORT, NORTH CAROLINA.

As naval expeditions are now leaving every few days to operate on the Southern Coast, we present above a Plan of a harbor which will certainly receive some attention—Beaufort, North Carolina. This is one of the best harbors on the coast; there are fifteen feet water on the bar. At the latest dates we were, it is said, four United States men-of-war off the mouth of the harbor. For Beaufort protects it, is very strong, and a large force of North Carolinians have been assigned to its defense.

ANOTHER BATTLE AT BOONVILLE.

Intelligence has been received at St. Louis of a battle fought at Boonville, resulting in a victory for the Union. The rebels, 1800 strong, were driven back by the Home Guard, with a loss of twelve killed and thirty wounded. The Union loss was only one killed and four wounded. Among the killed on the rebel side were Colonel Brown and Captain Brown, both reluctant secessionists.

AFFAIRS AT HATTERAS.

We learn from Fortress Monroe that all was quiet at Hatteras on 12th inst. The Susquehanna and Pawnee were still there. The schooner had been put in complete order, and the guns spiked by the rebels were ready for service. Four schooners, with provisions for the Union, had run into the inlet with merchandise for the rebels, not knowing of the change of sovereignty. They were, of course, captured.

DISORGANIZATION OF THE REBEL ARMY.

There seems to be a little trouble among the rebel troops. A whole Mississippi regiment is reported to have revolted on Saturday last, broken their muskets to pieces, and started for home. A complete demoralization of the army is apparent. The rebel Congress assembled with for their homes since the capture of the forts at Hatteras.

THE UNION AND REPUBLICAN STATE TICKET.

The Twenty-first Assembly District has adopted a brief declaration in favor of sustaining the Government in its efforts to quell the rebellion, and nominated the following ticket for the Legislature:

Assembly—Daniel S. Dickinson, of Broome.
Secretary of State—Norman Seaver, of Cortland.
Comptroller—Lucius Robinson, of Chemung.
Treasurer—W. B. Lee, of Kings.
Canal Commissioners—F. A. Aburger, of Erie, long term; F. A. Talmadge, of New York, short term.
State Prison Inspector—A. B. Tappen, of Westchester.
State Engineer—W. B. Taylor, of Oneida.
Judge of the Court of Appeals—W. B. Wright, of Ulster.

The Republican State Convention met at Syracuse the same day, and nominated the ticket for State officers, with the exception of their candidate for Canal Commissioner Talmadge, of Onondaga. The name of Benjamin F. Bruce, of Madison, was substituted for that of Mr. Talmadge.

PERSONAL.

Jefferson Davis is not dead. The silence of the Rebel organs on this subject has been broken by positive assertions of the reports of his decease.

Mr. Andrew Ellis, and his son, of Knoxville, Tennessee, are still under arrest, by order of General Zollicoffer.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MORE TROOPS FOR CANADA.

THE announcement is made that fifteen more regiments are ordered to Canada. They start about the middle of September, and will make the total of troops which have gone to New York, as advertised.

The Times, in an editorial, says that the Government may have private reasons for the movement, but that there are none apparent. If it is purely a defensive movement and a sense of cordiality between England and Canada, it hopes that Canada will not take it for more than it means, but that the military force should be needful, to protect herself. It is regarded as a wise guarantee against all complications, and calculated to strengthen her frontier.

FRANCE.

A FORTHCOMING SPEECH FROM THE EMPEROR.

Among other on dits in Paris, was one to the effect that, on the opening of the Emperor's approaching visit to Rochefort, a speech may be expected from him calculated to excite the most extraordinary and warlike intentions on the part of his Majesty.

ITALY

PROGRESS OF EVENTS.

The resignation of Minghetti, Minister of the Interior, had been accepted. Farini had been nominated to the vacancy with the charge ad interim of Foreign Affairs. Victor Emanuel had informally received the Prussian and the new French Minister. Additional successes were reported over the Neapolitan brigands. It was also reported that other successes had occurred between the Piedmontese troops and the Papal gens d'armes.

SPAIN.

SPAIN WILL NOT RECOGNIZE THE REBELS.

Mr. Tassara, the Spanish Minister, has called to assure the Secretary of State that the report from Charleston that the Captain-General of Cuba had issued a proclamation recognizing the rebel flag is untrue. What has happened is, that vessels from any port of the United States in possession of the rebels, coming into a port with irregular papers, are admitted ex necessitate, without notice of their irregularity, just as they have been admitted in all other ports since the rebels obtained possession of the custom-houses in the insurgent States. It is needless to say that no such vessels can be abroad without escaping the blockading force. There is no recognition of a rebel flag in Spanish ports or in any other ports.

THE REBEL GENERAL A. S. JOHNSTON.

THE telegraph announces that ALBERT SYDNEY JOHNSTON, late Colonel United States Army, and commander-in-chief of the army of Utah, has been appointed by Jeff Davis to command the rebel forces on the Mississippi. We publish his portrait herewith.

Albert S. Johnston was born in Macon County, Kentucky, in 1803, and is consequently fifty-eight years of age. After the usual school training young Johnston was adopted by the United States, and educated at their expense at their Military Academy at West Point. On graduating he entered the 6th Infantry, and was ordered to the West. During the Black Hawk war he acted as Adjutant General, President Lincoln being at the time a captain of volunteers. At the close of the war he resigned his commission, and resided first in Missouri, next in Texas. War breaking out in the latter State, he entered the Texan army as a private, and rose to high distinction. He afterward filled the post of Secretary of War. On the annexation of Texas to the United States Johnston raised a partisan troop, which he commanded, and accompanied General Taylor to Monterey. At the close of the Mexican war he returned to his plantation; but being in embarrassed circumstances, was glad to accept from the United States the post of Paymaster, which was generously bestowed upon him by the Government. Under Pierce, Mr. Jefferson Davis, then Secretary of War, made Johnston Colonel of the 2d Cavalry, and he subsequently received the command of the Southwestern Military District. At the outbreak of the war with Utah he was chosen, over many more skilled officers, to command the expedition which crossed the plains. He continued to fill that post—being, in fact, dictator in the country which he occupied—until the rebellion took place, when he traitorously abandoned his flag. He is believed to have made energetic attempts to induce California and Oregon to join the rebels, but to have been foiled by the common sense of our Pacific brethren and the sagacious measures adopted by Government. He is now, as we stated, in command of the rebels on the Mississippi, and will have to deal with General Frémont.

THE "WINONA."

THE United States Screw Steam Gun-boat Winona, built by C. & R. POILLON, of which we publish a portrait on page 613, was launched—fully spurred and rigged, and with the propeller and main shafting fitted up in her—from their yard, foot of Bridge Street, Brooklyn, on Saturday, 14th inst., at 5 o'clock P.M. Her dimensions are, Length over all, 165 feet; breadth, 28 feet; hold, 10 feet; tonnage, 598 tons measurement. She is built of white and live oak, yellow pine and locust, and fastened in conformity to the Government system of building. By the terms of contract she was to be launched in seventy-five days, but was ready in forty-six working days from the signing of the contract. She is of good model, and in all her details exhibits excellence of workmanship and beauty of finish. After launching she was towed to the Atlantic Works Dock, where she will receive her boilers and other machinery, which consists of two back-acting engines with 36-inch cylinders and 18-inch stroke, and two tubular boilers of Martin variety. The screw propeller is of composition, nine feet in diameter. The engines will develop about 350-horse power, and the consumption of coal will be about eight tons per day. The total weight of machinery will be about 130 tons.

Four gun-boats like the Winona have been launched, viz.: Ottawa, Pembina, Seneca, and Chippewa, all of New York.

Eighteen are in the course of construction, and are more or less advanced, viz.: Tahoma, Wilmington, Del.; Wanalancha, Sciota, and Iroca, Philadelphia; Unadilla, New York; Owasco, Mystic River, Ct.; Kaaseba, East Haddam; Cayuga, Portland; Huron, Chocura, and Sagamore, Boston; Marblehead, Newburyport; Kenaelee, Thomaston, Me.; Aroostook, Kennebunk, Me.; Kineo, Portland, Me.; Katahdin, Bath, Me.; Penobscot, Belfast, Me.; and Pinola, Baltimore, Md.

THE "JAMESTOWN" AT FERNANDINA.

WE are indebted to Mr. James Hoovere, of the United States sloop of war Jamestown, for the sketch which we reproduce herewith. The affair depicted is thus described by our correspondent:

FERNANDINA, FLORIDA, August 5, 1861.

—Early on the morning of the 5th inst. we saw a bark bearing in toward land, and under a heavy press of sail. Although the wind was light, we were going at the rate of some six knots per hour, and were evidently gaining rapidly on the strange vessel. As soon as we were perceived by those on board the bark they tried to run her on shore, and in this they succeeded, stranding her in three fathoms of water. They then took to their boats, taking with them all valuables worth the trouble, and made the best train and his wife prisoners. By the time the boats of the vessel had reached the shore we got near enough to fire, and accordingly fired a round shot at her. By means of our glasses we could not perceive any one on the vessel's decks; but on looking toward land we found that the alarm had been given, and that crowds of people were flocking to the shore, anxiously waiting to see what we would do with the stranded ship. By this time bodies of armed men were seen defiling through an opening in the sand-hills; and shortly afterward horses drawing some pieces of ordnance, and accompanied by artillerymen, were noticed. The confusion on shore now became general; men marching in columns, horses with their riders dying hither and thither, and spectators to the number of some 200 or 300 lined the beach. The pieces of cannon were now placed in position on shore, so as to rake the boats if they were sent to take the bark, and every thing denoted the intention on the part of the Floridians of making a determined resistance. Our ship was distant some two miles from the prize; and as the sea shoals very suddenly here, we were afraid to venture in any nearer land. Our captain then tried to destroy her by shelling her with our batteries, but none of the shot reached the vessel. At this time the shore batteries opened, with the intention of shelling us that they could destroy any thing that approached for the purpose of boarding the bark. Finding that the only way of destroying the vessel was by means of boats, the launch, first and fourth cutters were called and manned. The first boat was officered by Lieutenant Flusser (who commanded the expedition); Lieutenant Haseltine, of the Mariner; and Assistant-Surgeon Cleborne. The first cutter was commanded by Lieutenant R. Phythian, accompanied by Mr. Chisolm, Master; and the other boat was in charge of Midshipman Tyson. All being ready the boats shoved off, and as they approached the vessel were received by a sharp fire from the shore batteries; some heavy shot was fired, which we afterward understood came from a masked battery near the light-house; and the field-pieces were fired in rapid succession—the cannon balls came whizzing over our heads and around us rather unpleasantly, I assure you. At last we reached the vessel, just in time to save our boat from a round shot which came whizzing over the vessel, and fell only a few feet behind us. Had we been struck by it, the boat must have instantly sunk. The other boats came on in good order, and fortunately unscathed; and as the launch touched the ship a dozen boarders clambered up her sides, headed by our second lieutenant, and followed by the other officers of the boat; but luckily no one had remained on board to contest the day, and we soon made ourselves masters of the contents of the vessel, which proved to be hemp, wool, and oil. While we were trying, without success, to get the vessel off, the surgeon and others were busied in securing the ship's papers, and securing every thing of importance which in the hurry had been left behind. The result was now hoisted on board the Jamestown, and a gun fired to warn us of an armed steamer which was seen approaching. It was then decided to burn the vessel; the stars and stripes were hoisted; and she was accordingly set fire to in three places so effectually that we had scarcely time to leave the ship's side when the flames burst out on every side. As we pulled for our ship the steamer neared us with the intention of running us down, but those on board the man-of-war had seen the design, and were bearing toward us broadside on, when the Secession steamer concluded not to come within range of our guns, and turned her head toward Fernandina again. The sight of the burning vessel was truly grand, and the scene was made more striking by the occasional firing of the batteries on our retreating boats; none of their shots were effective, though their line firing was excellent.

The bark was the Adorado, of Boston, commanded by Captain Whiting, and her cargo, I hear, was worth nearly $100,000. This is the true state of the case; so that the Secessionists did not make any thing of the prize but a burned-down hulk.

THREE STORIES.

ALL three shall be told exactly as I, the present narrator, have received them. They are all derived from credible sources; and the first—the most extraordinary of the three—is well known at first hand to individuals still living.

Some few years ago a well-known English artist received a commission from Lady F——— to paint a portrait of her husband. It was settled that he should execute the commission at F——— Hall, in the country, because his engagements were too many to permit his entering upon a heavy work till the London season should be over. As he happened to be on terms of intimate acquaintance with his employers, the arrangement was satisfactory to all concerned, and on the 13th of September he set out in good heart to perform his engagement.

He took the train for the station nearest to F——— Hall, and found himself, when first starting, alone in a carriage. His solitude did not, however, continue long. At the first station out of London a young lady entered the carriage, and took the corner opposite to him. She was very delicate looking, with a remarkable blending of sweetness and sadness in her countenance, which did not fail to attract the notice of a man of observation and sensibility. For some time neither uttered a syllable. But at length the gentleman made the remarks usual under such circumstances, on the weather and the country, and the ice being broken, they entered into conversation. They spoke of painting. The artist was much surprised by the intimate knowledge the young lady seemed to have of himself and his works. She was quite certain that he had never seen her before. His surprise was by no means lessened when she suddenly inquired whether he could make, from recollection, the likeness of a person whom he had seen only once, or at most twice? He was hesitating what to reply, when she added, "Do you think, for example, that you could paint me from recollection?"

He replied that he was not quite sure, but that perhaps he might try.

"Well," she said, "look at me again. You may have to take a likeness of me."

He complied with this odd request, and she asked, rather eagerly,

"Now, do you think you could?"

"I think so," he replied; "but I can not say for certain."

At this moment the train stopped. The young lady rose from her seat, smiled in a friendly manner on the artist, and bade him good-by: adding, as she quitted the carriage, "We shall meet again soon." The train rattled off, and Mr. H——— (the artist) was left to his own reflections.

The station was reached in due time, and Lady F——'s carriage was there, to meet the expected guest. It was long to the place of his destination, one of "the stately homes of England," after a pleasant drive, and deposited him at the hall door, where his host and hostess were standing to receive him. A kind greeting passed, and he was shown to his room: for the dinner-hour was close at hand.

Having arrayed himself, he toiled and descended to the drawing-room, Mr. H——— was much surprised, and much pleased, to see, seated on one of the ottomans, his young companion of the railway carriage. She greeted him with a smile and a bow of recognition. She sat by his side at dinner, spoke to him two or three times, and in the general conversation, and seemed perfectly at home. Mr. H——— had no doubt of her being an intimate friend of his hostess. The evening passed off very pleasantly. The conversation turned a good deal upon the fine arts in general, and on painting in particular, and Mr. H——— was entreated to have some of his sketches. He had brought down with him from London. He readily produced them, and the young lady was much interested in them.

At a late hour the party broke up, and retired to their several apartments.

Next morning, early, Mr. H——— was tempted by the bright sunshine to leave his room and stroll out into the park. The drawing-room opened into the garden; passing through it, he inquired of a servant who was busy arranging the furniture whether the young lady had come down yet?

"What young lady, Sir?" asked the man, with an appearance of surprise.

"The young lady who dined here last night."

"No young lady dined here last night, Sir," replied the attendant, briefly and at him.

The painter said no more: thinking within himself that the servant was either very stupid or had a very bad memory. So, leaving the room, he sauntered out into the Park.

He was returning to the house when his host met him and the usual morning salutations passed between them.

"Your fair young friend has left you?" observed the host.

"What young friend?" inquired the lord of the manor.

"The young lady who dined here last night," returned Mr. H———.

"I can not imagine to whom you refer," replied the gentleman, quite gravely and seriously.

"Did not a young lady dine and spend the evening here yesterday?" persisted Mr. H———, who in his turn began to wonder at his friend.

"No," replied his host; "most certainly not. There was no one at table but yourself, my lady, and I."

The subject was never reverted to after this occasion, yet our artist could not bring himself to believe that he was laboring under a delusion. On the whole were a dream, it was a dream in two parts. As surely as the young lady had been his companion in the railway carriage, so surely she had sat beside him at the dinner-table. Yet she did not come again; and every body in the house, except himself, appeared to be ignorant of her existence. He finished the portrait on which he was engaged, and returned to London.

For two whole years he followed up his profession, growing in reputation, and working hard. Yet he never all the while forgot a single lineament in the fair young face of his fellow-traveler. He had no clew by which to discover where she had come from, or who she was. He often thought of her, but spoke to no one about her. There was a mystery about the matter which imposed silence on him. It was wild, strange, utterly unaccountable.

Mr. H——— was called by business to Canterbury. An old friend of his—whom I will call Mr. Wylde—resided there. Mr. Wylde was a bachelor, as to him, and having only a few hours at his disposal, wrote as soon as he reached the hotel, begging Mr. Wylde to call and see him. Mr. Wylde came up, pointed the door of his room opened, and Mr. Wylde was announced. He was a complete stranger to the artist; and the latter saw at once that he was a little awkward. It appeared, on explanation, that Mr. H——'s friend had left Canterbury some time; that the gentleman who had taken his place in the set was another Mr. Wylde; that the note intended for the absentee had been given to him; and that he had obeyed the summons, supposing some business matter to be the cause of it.

The first coldness and surprise dispelled, the two gentlemen entered into a friendly, pleasant conversation; for Mr. H——— had mentioned his name, and it was not a strange one to his visitor. When they had conversed a little while, Mr. Wylde asked Mr. H——— whether he had ever painted, or could undertake to paint, a portrait from mere description?

Mr. H——— replied, never.

"I ask you this strange question," said Mr. Wylde, "because, about two years ago, I lost a dear daughter. She was my only child, and I would have given half my property to have any affliction to me, and my regrets are the deeper that I have no likeness of her. You are a man of unusual genius. Is it possible that from a portrait of my child I should be very grateful."

Mr. Wylde then described the features and appearance of his daughter, the color of her eyes and hair, and tried to give an idea of the expression of her face. Mr. H——— listened attentively, and, feeling great sympathy with his friend, took a sketch. He had no thought of its being like, but hoped the bereaved father might possibly think it so. But the latter gave a cry on the sight of the sketch, and said, "No, it was not at all like." Again the artist tried, and again he failed. The features were not right, the color of her eyes and of her hair, and tried to give an idea of the expression of her face. either by a night-breeze, or some ship with which we might act in concert, and so beat off this scoundrel, our doom must, in all human probability, be indeed a fearful one. But it was of no use to give way to despair; and darkness having now closed in, we extinguished every light on board, even in the binnacle, and enforced the strictest silence fore and aft in the ship. I need not say there was no sleep for any of us that night. Anxiety had "murdered sleep," and none even attempted to "turn in." Long and drearily passed the feverish hours of that terrible night; and by the first faint streak of dawning light every eye was strained to see if the pirate was still in sight. Alas! a glance was sufficient. Not only was the pirate there, but another vessel with him, evidently the prize he had captured the night before.

Our nerves had been so overstrained for many hours, that some now began to show signs of wavering and despair; under the circumstances, therefore, I thought it better to order a good allowance of grog to be served out to the poor fellows, and keep them employed in exercising the guns, etc., as much as our small stock of powder would admit. Thus passed another wretched day of suspense and misery.

As evening was approaching, we saw the pirate again making use of her sweeps, and she advanced this time so close to us, that with the naked eye we could see her decks swarming with men, and a "long Tom" (or large swivel-gun) amid-ships. I at once ordered every man to his station, as we all anticipated an immediate attack; but, to our astonishment, after a deliberate survey, she went about, and swept back again to her prize. She evidently thought we were too well armed and prepared for an easy prey during daylight, so we once more set ourselves for our long and anxious night-watch.

The lights were once more extinguished, and I was pacing the poop with silent and sorrowful steps, when suddenly I felt a cool air fanning my cheek. Yes, truly, it was no delusion; a breeze had sprung up at last! Thank God! Instantly springing down upon deck, I gave orders to set every stitch upon her "below and aloft," and to trim the yards so as to feel the full benefit of the breeze. All was now bustle and activity; and after altering our course, by the skipper's good advice, we once more heard the joyful ripple of the waters as they danced by the good ship's bows.

But our joy was short-lived, for just as we were congratulating ourselves on our deliverance, our destruction was almost accomplished.

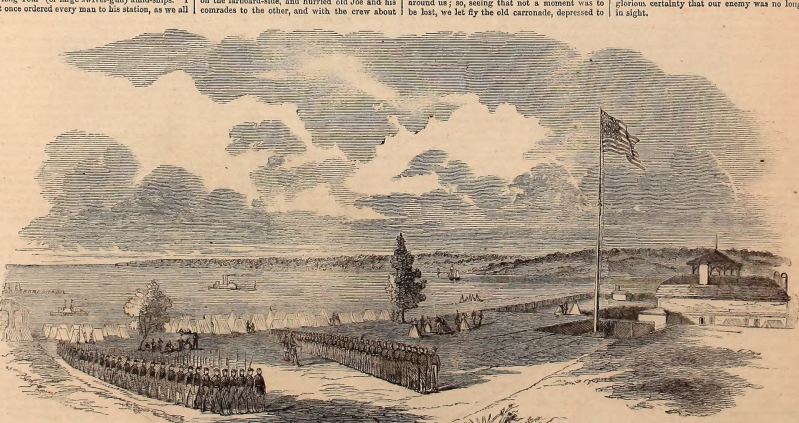
I was standing on the lee-quarter, watching what progress our ship was making, when I distinctly heard a sound that sent my blood tingling to my very extremities, and almost paralyzed me. Muffled oars! from one, two, three different points! Merciful God protect us! Silence was useless now, so I sprung among the crew, and shouting at the top of my voice, "Men, to your stations; the enemy's boats are alongside!" I rushed to the gun on the larboard-side, and hurried old Joe and his comrades to the other, and with the crew about equally divided between us, we silently awaited the attack, each of us being armed with a couple of cannon-balls in our hands. We had not long to wait, for, finding by the bustle on board that they were discovered, the pirates, with a yell, pulled boldly under the main channels, and in an instant were swarming up the ship's side. In another moment the savages would have been among us, but shouting to my men, "Let them have it, boys!" I hurled the heavy balls with all my strength into the boat, and prepared to defend myself with my sword. But the avalanche of cold iron had done its work, and the boat alongside was a mass of shattered timbers, with her ruffian crew already beaten down and struggling with the waters for their lives, except two fellows who were now in the rigging; a blow from my trusty sword disposed of one wretch, while a shot from one of our crew gave his quietus to the other.

Hearing a struggle on the starboard-side of the deck, I rushed over with my division, and I soon found we had enough and to spare still on our hands.

Old Joe and his party had given the other two boats much the same reception that our enemy had received, but not with such complete and smashing effect, for one of them appeared to have escaped damage altogether, and the other was only partially submerged, though fast sinking. The din of battle and the flash of small-arms were raging around us; so, seeing that not a moment was to be lost, we let fly the old carronade, depressed to the utmost, at the uninjured boat, which, from the cries and yells that succeeded the report, appeared to be so no longer. But in the mean time several of the pirates had succeeded in gaining the deck, and the darkness prevented our seeing the full extent of our danger; so retreating to the undischarged gun, we ran it in as quickly as possible, and slewed it round on to the ship's deck; we then threw a ball of blazing tow among the panic-stricken pirates, and gave them the contents of the old gun at only a few yards' distance, tearing our own bulwarks to pieces, but effectually exterminating the savages who had gained the deck.

Finding, on examination, that we were completely victorious, and sole masters of the deck, we had once more leisure to look around; and great was our joy and gratitude to God when we found that the brigantine had not herself followed up the attack; trusting, I suppose, to the number in the boats, and confident of success, she still remained in the same position as when darkness closed in, for I could distinguish her lights from her mast-head and main peak, intended as signals for the guidance of the pirates doomed never to return to her.

We dared not yet congratulate ourselves on being in safety, but squaring the yards we ran dead before the rapidly-increasing breeze for the rest of the night; but the morning broke dull and squally, and after one rapid glance around we came to the glorious certainty that our enemy was no longer in sight.



FORT PORTER, NEW YORK, WHERE THE SECOND BUFFALO REGIMENT IS QUARTERED.—SKETCHED BY A. R. BARTON.—[SEE PAGE 623.]

THE FISHERIES OF ALBEMARLE AND PAMLICO SOUNDS, NORTH CAROLINA.

ILLUSTRATED BY PORTE CRAYON.

GOING OUT.

"THE principal productions of North Carolina are tar, pitch, and turpentine," say the Geographies. The products of the immense "Piny Woods" of the Old North State amount to no inconsiderable sum. According to the Cyclopædia of Commerce they amount to 4,000,000 barrels of turpentine, worth—when distilled, rectified, and converted into naval stores and oils—nearly $40,000,000. Of this amount very little is consumed at home, nine-tenths finding a market in the Commercial States. Now that North Carolina, unwillingly dragged into rebellion, finds her coast blockaded and her ports locked up by the occupation of HATTERAS and other forts commanding the inlets to Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds, and by gun-boats cruising in these waters, we apprehend that the turpentine trade must be at a stand-still, for who will make an article which can not be eaten, worn, or sold? North Carolina has every thing to lose and nothing to gain by rebellion.

Among the minor resources of the State the shad and herring fisheries, carried on in the numerous bays and inlets of Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, occupy no inconsiderable place. Every estate on these waters has its fishing shore, located where a line of smooth sand beach affords facilities for landing the fish, and fitted up with windlasses for hauling the seines, salting-houses, cooperings-sheds, and offices. The movable outfit consists of a pair of heavy boats and the seine, with its corks and lines of almost incredible extent. At one of the beaches the seine used was twenty-seven hundred yards in length and twenty-four feet deep. This enormous length of netting is packed upon the stern platforms of two ten-oared boats, which are rowed out together to a point opposite the landing, about a mile distant. Here the boats separate, moving in opposite directions, and the seine is payed out as they row slowly toward their destined points—the seaward boat following a course down the stream and parallel to the beach; the landward boat curving in toward the upper end of the landing, thus heading the shoals of fish as they journey upward to their spawning grounds. The top line of the seine is buoyed with numerous corks; while the bottom, which is attached to the lead-line, sinks with its weight. When the seine is all payed out, heavy ropes, made fast to the staves securing either end, are carried in to the great four-mule windlasses at the extremities of the beach, from eight to twelve hundred yards apart. The aggregate length of the seine, with these ropes, is about two miles and a half. As the circumference of this vast sweep is diminished, lines are attached to inner windlasses of less power, until the centre pair, of one-mule power and not more than a hundred yards apart, are put in motion. The circle of the net has now become so small that the inclosed shoals may be seen leaping, swimming with their back fins out, and churning the water in their affrighted movements. Presently the mules are discharged, and all hands called to handle the ropes. Fifty stalwart men rush into the water, waist-deep. The captains shout and swear, the gulls and eagles scream, and dashing into the melée, audaciously snatch their share of the spoil.

A few minutes of heavy dragging and the flashing, wriggling mass is rolled upon the beach; a line of wide planks is hastily staked up behind, the net withdrawn, and the boatmen again put off cheerily to repeat the haul.

The women and boys now rush knee-deep into the gasping heap. The shad are first counted into baskets and carried to the packing-house; while the herring are headed, cleaned, and thrown into tubs, ready for the salters—all of which is transacted with merciless coolness and the most wonderful celerity.

It requires from five to seven hours to complete a haul; and as there is no respite by day or night, three and four hauls are made within the twenty-four hours. The only time allowed for eating and sleeping is during the odd hours snatched by the different classes of workers when their especial branch of service is suspended. When the hauls are not heavy the cleaners and salters have an easy time between landings. The boatmen sleep while the mules wind in the net; the mules browse and bray while the boats are out.

A first-class fishery employs from eighty to a hundred hands, and a dozen or twenty quadru-peds, and the labor during an active season of six weeks or two months is equal to that of a brisk military campaign in face of an enemy. Yet the free negroes of Chowan and the neighboring counties engage in it in preference to any other business; and although utterly indolent and worthless for other occupations, resort to the fishing beach as to an annual festival. The season on the Albemarle Sound lasts from about the 15th of March to the middle of May; and during that time the public mind is occupied with the subject to the exclusion even of politics.

It costs from five to ten thousand dollars to establish a fishery, and formerly the investment would often return cent. per cent., without counting the incidental advantages of salt-fish provision for an estate, and the enrichment of the land from the offal at the beaches. It was not uncommon to take a hundred thousand herrings, and sometimes as many as half a million, at a haul; at present a few hundred shad and five thousand herring are considered a good average. Thirty thousand was the largest number I saw taken at once.

Among the refuse fish the most common are sturgeon, rock-cats, trout, perch, mullet, gar, gizzard, shad, hog-fish, hog-choke (or flounder), lampreys, and common eels. The four first-mentioned species are good for the table; the rest fit for nothing but manure.

The rock-fish (striped bass) taken here are very fine and very numerous. It is not uncommon to see them of over a hundred pounds' weight; and I was credibly informed that, some years ago, a fishery near Edenton took twenty thousand rock, of large average size, at a single haul. It was impossible to land such a mass at once; but after drawing the great seine as near shore as could be done safely, it was swept by smaller nets until the miraculous draft was landed.

Of all the striking views of this exciting and picturesque business the night-haul is pre-eminent in interest. Here the lively scenes of the day are re-enacted amidst the glare of pine torches, which exhibits the wild figures of the fishermen and the death-struggles of the finny captives in the most dramatic light possible.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER XXII.

THAT evening I went to Mrs. Poyntz's; it was one of her ordinary "reception nights," and I felt that she would naturally expect my attendance as "a proper attention."

I joined a group engaged in general conversation, of which Mrs. Poyntz herself made the centre, knitting, as usual, rapidly while she talked, slowly when she listened.

Without mentioning the visit I had paid that morning, I turned the conversation on the different country places in the neighborhood, and then incidentally asked, "What sort of a man is Sir Philip Derval? Is it not strange that he should suffer so fine a place to fall into decay?" The answers I received added little to the information I had already obtained. Mrs. Poyntz knew nothing of Sir Philip Derval, except as a man of large estates, whose rental had been greatly increased by a rise in the value of property he possessed in the town of L——, and which lay contiguous to that of her husband. Two or three of the older inhabitants of the Hill had remembered him in his early days, when he was gay, high-spirited, hospitable, lavish. One observed that the only person in L—— whom he had admitted to his subsequent seclusion was Dr. Lloyd, who was then without practice, and whom he had employed as an assistant in certain chemical experiments.

Here a gentleman struck into the conversation. He was a stranger to me and to L——, a visitor to one of the dwellers on the Hill, who had asked leave to present him to its Queen as a great traveler and an accomplished antiquarian.

Said this gentleman: "Sir Philip Derval? I know him. I met him in the East. He was then still, I believe, very fond of chemical science; a clever, odd, philanthropical man; had studied medicine, or at least practiced it; was said to have made many marvelous cures. I became acquainted with him in Aleppo. He had come to that town, not much frequented by English travelers, in order to inquire into the murder of two men, of whom one was his friend and the other his countryman."

"This is interesting," said Mrs. Poyntz, dryly. "We who live on this innocent Hill all love stories of crime—murder is the pleasantest subject you could have hit on. Pray give us the details."

"So encouraged," said the traveler, goodhumouredly, "I will not hesitate to communicate the little I know. In Aleppo there had lived for some years a man who was held by the natives in great reverence. He had the reputation of extraordinary wisdom, but was difficult of access; the lively imagination of the Orientals invested his character with the fascinations of fable; in short, Haroun of Aleppo was popularly considered a magician. Wild stories were told of his powers, of his preternatural age, of his hoarded treasures. Apart from such disputable titles to homage, there seemed no question, from all I heard, that his learning was considerable, his charities extensive, his manner of life irreproachably ascetic. He appears to have resembled those Arabian sages of the Gothic age to whom modern science is largely indebted—a mystic enthusiast but an earnest scholar. A wealthy but singular Englishman, long resident in another part of the East, afflicted by some languishing disease, took a journey to Aleppo to consult this sage, who, among his other acquirements, was held to have discovered some secrets in medicine—his countrymen said in 'charms.' One morning, not long after the Englishman's arrival, Haroun was found dead in his bed, apparently strangled, and the Englishman, who lodged in another part of the town, had disappeared; but some of his clothes, and a crutch on which he habitually supported himself, were found a few miles distant from Aleppo near the roadside. There appeared to be no doubt that he, too, had been murdered, but his corpse could not be discovered. Sir Philip Derval had been a loving disciple of this sage of Aleppo, to whom he assured me he owed not only that knowledge of medicine which, by report, Sir Philip possessed, but the insight into various truths of nature, on the promulgation of which it was evident Sir Philip cherished the ambition to found a philosophical reputation for himself."

"Of what description were those truths of nature?" I asked, somewhat sarcastically.

"Sir, I am unable to tell you, for Sir Philip did not inform me, nor did I much care to ask, for what may be revered as truths in Asia are usually despised as dreams in Europe. To return to my story. Sir Philip had been in Aleppo a little time before the murder; had left the Englishman under the care of Haroun; he returned to Aleppo on hearing the tragic event I have related, and was busied in collecting such evidence as could be gleaned, and instituting inquiries after our missing countryman at the time that I myself chanced to arrive in the city. I assisted in his researches, but without avail. The assassins remained undiscovered. I do not myself doubt that they were mere vulgar robbers. Sir Philip had a darker suspicion, of which he made me secret to no one. I confess that I thought the suspicion groundless, you will pardon me if I do not repeat it. Whether, since I left the East, the English guest remains have been discovered, I know not. Very probably; for I understand that his heirs have got hold of what formed the bulk of his wealth—a generally supposed, but it was reported that he had buried great treasures, a rumor, however absurd, not altogether inconsistent with his reputed character."

"What was his character, and what was his name?" asked Mrs. Poyntz.

"His character was of a sinister repute. He was regarded with terror by the attendants who had accompanied him to Aleppo. But he had lived in a very remote part of the East, well known to Europeans, and, from all I could learn, had there established an extraordinary power, strengthened by superstitious fears. He was said to have studied deeply that knowledge which the philosophers of old called 'occult,' not like the sage of Aleppo, for philanthropic ends, but for malignant ends. He was accused of conferring with evil spirits, and filling his barbaric court (for he lived in a kind of semi-royalty) with charmers and sorcerers. I suspect, after all, that he was only like myself, a passionate antiquarian, and consequently made no scruple to call up spirit in order to secure his authority, and prosecute, in safety, researches into ancient sepulchres or temples. His great passion was, indeed, to discourage such researches in his neighborhood, with what result I know not, never having penetrated so far into regions infested by robbers and murderous tribes. His name, as I have said, was Derval, and always carried jewels about him. I came to the conclusion that for the sake of these jewels he was murdered, perhaps by some of his own servants, who then at once buried his body, and kept their own secret. He was old, very infirm; could not have got far from the town without assistance."

"You have not yet told us his name," said Mrs. Poyntz.

"His name was Grayle."

"Grayle!" exclaimed Mrs. Poyntz, dropping her work, "Louis Grayle?"

"Yes; Louis Grayle. You could not have known him?"

"Known him! No. But I have often heard my father speak of him. Such, then, was the tragic end of that strong dark creature, for whom, as a young girl, I was fanciful, I used to feel a kind of fearful admiring interest!"

"It is your turn to narrate now," said the traveler.

And we all drew closer round our hostess, who remained silent some moments, her brow thoughtful, her work suspended.

"Well," said she, at last, looking round us with a lofty air, which seemed half defying; "force and courage are always fascinating, even when they are quite in the wrong. I go with the world, because the world goes with me; if it did not—" Here she stopped abruptly, clenched the firm white hand, and then scornfully waved it, left the sentence unfinished, and broke into another.

"Going with the world, of course we must march over those who stand against it. But when one man stands single-handed against our march we do not despise him; it is enough to crush. I am very glad I did not see Louis Grayle when I was a girl of sixteen." Again she paused a moment, and resumed: "Louis Grayle was the only son of a usurer, infamous for the rapacity with which he had acquired an enormous wealth. Old Grayle desired to rear his heir as a gentleman; sent him to Eton; boys are always aristocratic. His birth was soon thrown in his teeth; he was fierce; he struck boys bigger than himself—fought till he was half killed. My father was at school with him; described him as a tiger whelp. One day he—still a fag—struck a sixth-form boy. Sixth-form boys do not fight fags—they punish them. Louis Grayle was ordered to hold out his hand to the cane; he received the blow, drew forth his school-boy knife, and stabbed the punisher. After that he left Eton. I don't think he was publicly expelled—too mere a child for that honor—but he was taken or sent away; educated with great care under the first masters at home; when he was of age to enter the University of Cambridge, he was dead. He was sent by his guardians to Cambridge, with acquirements far exceeding the average of young men, and with unlimited command of money. My father was at the same college, and described him again —haughty, quarrelsome, reckless, handsome, aspiring, but without any kind of creature interest you, my dears?" (appealing to the ladies.)

"I a!" said Miss Brabazon; "a horrid usurer's son!"

"Ay, true; the vulgar proverb says it is good to be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth; so it is when one has one's own family crest on it; but when it is a spoon on which people recognize their family crest, and cry out, 'Stolen from our plate!' it is a heritage that outlives a babe in its cradle. However, young men at college who want money are less scrupulous about decent than boys at Eton are. Louis Grayle found, while at college, plenty of well-born acquaintances willing to recover from him some of the plunder his father had extorted from them. He was too wild to distinguish himself by academical honors, but my father said that the tutors of the college declared there were not six undergraduates in the university who knew as much hard and dry science as will Louis Grayle. He went into the world, no doubt, hoping to shine; but his father's name was too notorious to admit the son into good society. The polite world is not very fastidious, and is very indulgent to wealth; still, when the polite world looks out of its club windows, and sees the son of a man who has pillaged its purse and seized its acres stalk by with an insolent crest, the polite world is revolted. In short, Louis Grayle claimed the right to be courted—he was shunned; to be admired—he was loathed. Even his old college acquaintances were shamed out of knowing him. Perhaps he could have lived through all this had he sought to glide quietly into position; but he wanted the tact of the well-bred, and strove to storm his way, not to wheedle it. Reduced for companions to needy parasites, he braved and he shocked all decorous opinion by that ostentation of excess which made Richelieus and Luxuzus the rage. But then Richelieus and Luxuzus were dukes! He now very naturally took the polite world into hate—gave it scorn for scorn. He would ally himself with Democracy; his wealth could not get him into a club, but it would buy him into parliament; he could not be a Luxuzus, nor, perhaps, a Mirabeau, but he might be a Denton. He had plenty of knowledge and audacity, and with knowledge and audacity a good hater is sure to be eloquent. Possibly, then, this poor Louis Grayle might have made a great figure, left his mark on his age and his name in history, but unfortunately the borough which he was sure to carry, he had to face an opponent in a real fine gentleman whom his father had ruined, cool and high-bred, with a tongue like a rapier, a sneer like an adder. A quarrel, of course; Louis Grayle sent a challenge. The fine gentleman, known to be no coward (fine gentlemen never are), was at first disposed to refuse with contempt. But Grayle had made himself the idol of the mob; and at a word from Grayle the fine gentleman might have been ducked at a pump, or tossed in a blanket—that would have made him ridiculous—to be shot as is a trifle, to be laughed at is serious. He therefore condescended to accept the challenge, and my father was his second.

"It was settled, of course, according to English custom, that both combatants should fire at the same time, and by signal. The antagonist fired at the right moment, his ball grazed Louis Grayle's temple. Louis Grayle had not fired. He now seemed to the seconds to take slow and deliberate aim. They called out to him not to fire—they were rushing to prevent him—when the trigger was pulled and his opponent fell dead on the field. The fight was, therefore, considered unfair; Louis Grayle was tried for his life; he did not stand the trial in person. He escaped to the Continent; hurried on to some distant uncivilized lands; could not be traced; reappeared in England no more. The lawyer who conducted his defense pleaded skillfully. He argued that the delay in firing was not intentional, therefore not criminal—the effect of the sun which the wound in the temple had occasioned. The judge was a gentleman, and summed up the evidence so as to direct the jury to a verdict against the man who had murdered a gentleman. But the jurors were not composed of gentlemen, and Grayle's advocate had of course excited their sympathy for a son of the people whom a gentleman had wantonly insulted—the verdict was manslaughter. But the sentence emphatically marked the aggravated nature of the homicide—three years' imprisonment. Grayle eluded the prison, but he was a man disgraced and an exile; his ambition blasted, his career an outlaw's, and his age not yet twenty-three. My father said that he was supposed to have changed his name; none knew what had become of him. And so in his old age this creature, brilliant and daring, whom if born under better auspices we might now be all fawning on, crapping to—after living out his age, no one knows how—dies, murdered at Aleppo, no one, you say, knows by whom."

"I saw some account of the death in the papers, about three years ago," said one of the party, "but the name was misspelled, and I had no idea that it was the same man who had fought the duel which Mrs. Colonel Poyntz had so graphically described. I have a vague recollection of the trial; it took place when I was a boy, more than forty years since. The affair made a stir at the time, but was soon forgotten."

"Soon forgotten," said Mrs. Poyntz; "ay, what is not? Leave your place in the world for ten minutes, and when you come back somebody else has taken it; but when you leave the world for good who remembers that you had ever a place even in the parish register?"

"Nevertheless," said I, "a great poet has said, finely and truly,

"'The sun of Homer shines upon us still.'"

"But it does not shine upon Homer; and learned folks tell me that we know no more who and what Homer was, if there was ever a single Homer at all, or rather a whole herd of Homers, than we know about the man in the moon—if there be one man there, or a million. Now, my dear Miss Brabazon, it will be very kind in you to divert our thoughts into channels less gloomy. Some pretty French air— Dr. Fenwick, I have something to say to you." She drew me toward the window. "So, Anne Ashleigh writes me word that I am not to mention your engagement. Do you think it quite prudent to keep it a secret?"

"I do not see how prudence is concerned in keeping it secret one way or the other—it is a mere matter of feeling. Many people wish to shridge, as far as they can, the time in which their private arrangements are the topic of public gossip."

"Public gossip is sometimes the best security for the due completion of private arrangements. As long as a girl is not betrothed she is engaged, her betrothed must be prepared for rivals. Announce the engagement and rivals are warned off."

"HE WAS RESTING ONE HAND CARELESSLY ON THE GOLDEN LOCKS OF A CHILD." ETC.

"I fear no rivals."

"Do you not? Bold man! I suppose you will write to Lilian?"

"Certainly."

"Do so, and constantly. By-the-way, Mrs. Ashleigh, before she went, asked me to send her back Lady Haughton's letter of invitation. What for? to show to you?"

"Very likely. Have you the letter still? May I see it?"

"Not just at present. When Lilian or Mrs. Ashleigh write to you, come and tell me how they like their visit, and what other guests form the party."

Therewith she turned away and conversed apart with the traveler.

Her words had pleased me, and I felt that they were meant to do so. Wherefore, I could not guess. But there is no language on earth which has more words with a double meaning than that spoken by the clever woman, who is never so guarded as when she appears to be frank.

As I walked home thoughtfully I was accosted by a young man, the son of one of the wealthiest merchants in the town. I had attended him with success, some months before, in a rheumatic fever; he and his family were much attached to me.

"Ah, my dear Fenwick, I am so glad to see you; I owe you an obligation of which you are not aware—an exceedingly pleasant traveling companion. I came with him to-day from London, where I have been sight-seeing and holiday-making for the last fortnight."

"I suppose you mean that you kindly bring me a patient?"

"No, only an admirer. I was staying at Fenton's Hotel. It so happened one day that I had left in the room over my last week's copy of the Vital Principle, which, by-the-by, the bookseller assured me was selling immensely among readers as non-professional as myself. So I sent into the coffee-room again I found a gentleman reading it. I claimed it politely; he as politely tendered his excuse for taking it. We made acquaintance on the spot. The next day we were intimate. He expressed great interest and curiosity about your theory and your experiments. I told him I knew you. You may guess if I described you as less clever in your practice than you are in your writings. And, in short, he came with me to I——, partly to see our flourishing town, principally on my promise to introduce him to you. My mother, you know, has what she calls a déjeûner dinatoire; déjeûner and dance. You will be there?"

"Thank you for reminding me of her invitation. I will myself of it if I can. Your new friend will be present? Who and what is he? A medical student?"

"No, a gentleman at ease; but seems to have a good deal of general information. Very young; apparently very rich; wonderfully good-looking. I am sure you will like him; every body must."

"It is quite enough to prepare me to like him, that he is a friend of yours." And so we shook hands and parted.

CHAPTER XVII.

It was late in the afternoon of the following day before I was able to join the party assembled at the merchant's house; it was a villa about two miles out of the town, pleasantly situated, where the guests gathered into a dance on the smooth lawn; some seated under shady awnings; others gliding amidst parterres, in which all the glory of the year's glory yet more vivid under the flush of a brilliant sunshine, and the ripple of a soft western breeze. Music, loud and lively, issued from the drawing-room, where children, who formed much the larger number of the party.

Standing at the entrance of an arched trellis, that led from the harder flowers of the lawn to a rare collection of tropical plants under a lofty glass dome communicating, as it were, the familiar vegetation of the North with that of the remotest East), was a form that instantaneously caught and held my gaze. It was the entrance of the arcade was covered with parasite creepers in prodigal luxuriance, of variegated gorgeous tints—convolvulus, jessamine, and the fresh, idealized picture of man's youth fresh from the hand of Nature, stood literally in a frame of blooms. Such a form! Such human face so radiant as that young man's.

There was in the aspect an indescribable something that literally dazzled. As one continued to gaze, it was with surprise one was forced to acknowledge that in the features themselves there was no flagrant regularity; nor was the young man's stature imposing—about the middle height. But the effect of the whole was not less transcendent. Large eyes, unspeakably lustrous; a bright harmonious coloring; an expression of contagious animation and joyousness; and the form itself so critically fine that the welded strength of its sinews was best shown in the lightness and grace of its movements.

He was resting one hand carelessly on the golden head of a child that had nestled itself against his knees, and was looking up in his face in that silent loving wonder with which children regard something too strangely beautiful for noisy admiration; he himself was conversing with the host, an old gray-haired, gouty man, propped on his crutch-stick, and listening with a look of mournful envy. To the wealth of the old man all the flowers in that garden owed their renewed delight in the summer air and sun. Oh that his wealth could renew to himself one hour of the youth that stood beside him, lord, indeed, of Creation; its splendor woven into his crown of beauty, its enjoyments subject to his sceptre of hope and gladness!

I was startled by the hearty voice of the merchant's son: "Ah, my dear Fenwick, I was afraid you would not come—you are late. There is the new friend of whom I spoke to you last night; let me now make you acquainted with him." He drew my arm in his and led me up to the young man, who turned from the attracting flowers, and whom he then introduced to me by the name of Margrave.

Nothing could be more kindly cordial than Mr. Margrave's manner. In a few minutes I found myself conversing with him with familiar ease, as if we had been seated in the same home, and sported together in the same play-ground. His vein of talk was peculiar, off hand, careless, shifting from topic to topic, with a bright ripple.

He said that he liked the place; proposed to stay in it some weeks; asked my address, which I gave him, and promised a visit at an early hour, while my time was yet free from professional visits. I endeavored, when I went away, to analyze to myself the charm which this handsome young stranger so notably exercised over all who approached him; and it seemed to me, ever seeking to find out natural causes for natural effects, that it arose from the contagious vitality of that rarest of all rare gifts in highly civilized circles—perfect health. Perfect health is in itself the most exquisite luxury, which, finding happiness in the mere sense of existence, diffuses round it, by the simplest and most harmless hilarity of its bright animal being. Health, to the utmost perfection, is seldom known after childhood; health in its fullest sense can be enjoyed by those who overwork the brain, or admit the sure wear and tear of the passions. The physician of fashion, the student, the victim of youth in the golden age of the poets—the youth of the careless Arcadian, before nymph or shepherdess had vexed his heart with a sigh.

BEAT! BEAT! DRUMS!

BY WALT WHITMAN.

Beat! beat! drums!—Blow! bugles! blow!
Through the windows—through doors—burst like a fierce of armed men,
Into the school where the scholar is studying;
Leave not the bridegroom quiet—no passage nor space
have your with his bride;
Nor the peaceful farmer any peace plowing his field or gathering his grain;
So fierce you whirr and pound, you drums—so shrill you bugles blow.

Beat! beat! drums! Blow! bugles! blow!
Over the roofs of cities—over the rumble of wheels in the streets;
Are beds prepared for sleepers at night in the houses?
No sleepers must sleep in those beds;
No bargainer bargains by day—no brokers or speculators
Would they continue?
Would the talkers be talking? would the singer attempt to sing?
Would the lawyer rise in the court to state his case before the judge?
Then rattle quicker, heavier drums—and bugles wilder blow.

Beat! beat! drums! Blow! bugles! blow!
Make no parleys—stop for no expostulation;
Mind not the timid—mind not the weeper or prayer;
Mind not the old man beseeching the young man;
Let not the child's voice be heard, nor the mother's entreaties. Recruit recruit!
Make the recruits sign—make mark upon the dead, where they lie in their shrouds awaiting the hearses.
So strong you thump, O terrible drums—so loud you bugles blow.

FORT PETER.

ON pag. 619 we publish, from a sketch by Mr. H. R. Rocher, a view of Fort Peter, on the point of Lake Erie on the left, Niagara River, and the Canada shore. The following description of the work we quote from the London Times:

About the year 1839 surveys were begun for barracks and defensive works at this point.

In 1839, by order of Colonel Engineer Colonel J. G. Totten, now Brevet Brigadier-General and Colonel of Engineers, preparations were made for the progress upon which the fort is constructed were published, and in the following year the site was fixed upon, the contracts for the stone were issued, and the work began in 1841.

The work, in its general contologie, is set down as a block-house, or redoubt, and occupied three years in construction, being finished in 1844. The original plans intended the construction of a fortification on the south side of the creek, and the foundations for one curve some thirty-five yards of that, near the gate, for the purpose. The fort is formed by a quick and breast-work, the latter 260 feet in diameter, in which is the block-house, and the officers' quarters.

The exterior battery is arranged with traverse circles and pintle blocks complete for 28 guns, and the term plane upon the latter is sufficiently capacious for the heaviest pintle guns. The armament has a sweep of fire of about 110 degrees.

The block-house is situated in a square excavation, or ditch as it is called, between the outer palisades, and is 60 feet square and about 70 feet in height. It is bomb-proof, with the floor of one story above the ground and barrack, above which is an earth-work many feet in depth, with one platform of 100 feet square, and another platform of 60 feet at a breast-work, about five feet high, on to the term plane, to present the guns of the armament at the height of the external breast-work from pintle block to crest of glacis is five feet nine inches. The distance of the gun platform of the block-house to the crest of the glacis is 34 feet, with a plane inside of the parapet, and a slope outside to the crest of the counterscarp, about 30 feet in width.

The armament of the fort includes two kinds of gun-carriage, one for the heavy guns, which are intended to receive a part of the carriages when traversed. Those are upon the land side only. The others differ only in that there are no embrasures in the wall of the breast-work. The total armament of the fort consists of 28 guns for the exterior works, and four barbette guns. The latter are intended to be of the largest class.

The number of men required for an actual garrison is only 300, although about 1000 men could be employed within the breast-works for defense. At present the fort is without any armament, though there are a number of guns belonging to the Naval Department stored on the grounds.

Some guns were mounted on the fort years ago. They number twenty 32-pounders, and ten 64-pound Columbiads, for either shot or shell. There is also stored at the fort 143 64-pound shells, 100 64-pound solid shot, and 2473 32-pound solid shot.

Fort Porter is now one of the recruiting stations in the northern part of the State. Some 700 men are encamped there, mostly of the 2d Buffalo regiment.

SHOCKING OCCURRENCE AT PHILADELPHIA.

WE illustrate on page 612 one of the most shocking occurrences we ever heard of,—the burning of several ladies and girls at the Continental Theatre, in Walnut Street, Philadelphia. The Herald correspondent thus tells the story:

PHILADELPHIA, September 18, 1861.

An unfortunate accident occurred at the Continental Theatre, in Walnut Street, on Saturday night, by which the building was for a time inspected, and a number of dancing girls so badly burned that some have since died. The theatre has been leased by William Wheatley, an old Philadelphia actor, whose long association with John Drew and J. S. Clarke at the Arch Street Theatre, made him known among the profession throughout the country. He opened Saturday night in imitation of the Arch by Mrs. Drew, Wheatley leased and refitted the "Continental" formerly Cassidy's, Wemyss' National Theatre, and produced the "Tempest" on Monday night in splendid style. Ravel, Leon, formerly of Niblo's Garden, London, prepared the machinery, and an immense ballet corps was engaged to represent the shade of Ariel and other show-scenes.

On Saturday night the theatre was crowded people were present. The first act had gone forward uninterruptedly, and the ballet girls were busily preparing for the dress-rooms to appear in the ballet at the opening of act second. Preparatory to the disappearance of the Arch by Mrs. Drew, Wheatley leased and refitted the "Continental" formerly Cassidy's, Wemyss' National Theatre, and produced the "Tempest" on Monday night in splendid style. Ravel, Leon, formerly of Niblo's Garden, London, prepared the machinery, and an immense ballet corps was engaged to represent the shade of Ariel and other show-scenes.

On Saturday night the theatre was crowded people were present. The first act had gone forward uninterruptedly, and the ballet girls were busily preparing for the dress-rooms to appear in the ballet at the opening of act second. Preparatory to the disappearance of the Arch by the stage when the audience perceived several men, apparently stage carpenters, running backward and forward in their shirt-sleeves. Directly Leon adjourned to the stage was a young lady, all of an fire, was hurriedly to the side scenes, and at the same time a succession of piercing shrieks from the dressing-room localities distracted the repose of the audiences, and brought half the people to their feet. The cry of "Fire!" was heard from the galleries, and the fighting fight and confusion upon the stage left no doubt in the minds of the audience as to the reality of the danger. Wheatley directed the people to be quieted while he retired to the rear to see what was the matter.

It appears that Miss Cecilia Gale, one of four talented and handsome sisters, had caught fire herself in her ballet costume. She stood upon a settee to reach her dress, and supplied her friend in the act of gas, when it was instantly ignited. Before the young lady could recover from the fright her clothing was all ablaze, and her sisters and several of the ballet girls were in adjoining dressing-rooms rushing up to assist her, were in turn set on fire. About a dozen of these girls were thus enveloped in flames, and the fire ran over their gauze and among their underclothes, making them look like gigantic rockets or "lights" as literally burning to the bone. Their screams were thrilling, and the scene that ensued one that cannot be witnessed only by the terrible picture behind the scenes, and here the fire from the dressing-rooms blazed up in the ceiling, and singed the lashes and hair of the affrighted girls.

Miss Cecilia Gale, writhing and still in flames, darted from the dressing-room, and was caught by Mr. Ravel, a stage carpenter, who at once tore up the set cloth, a piece of canvas, and with it broke waves, and wrapped around her. He was much burned while doing this. The young lady was then taken to the hospital too observed.

Several girls leaped into the street through the second story windows.

The scene in the rear of the theatre, on Sansom Street, was most pitiful and agonizing in its character. Half-dressed ballet girls rushed out of doors, and poor women, whose daughters took part in the processions and showscenes, were screaming their names amidst confused rushing, excretion, and fear. Carriages and cabs were driven up up and down, but no cabs could be obtained upon the cushions and taken away, the crowd pressed up and touched. Several of the ballet girls were driven on Sansom Street were thrown open to the sufferers, and a few were so badly burned that they could not have been removed. There was a great deal of delay before help could be obtained; but after the fire department arrived all were summoned. Some of the burned were taken to the Pennsylvania Hospital, and others to their homes in remote parts of the town.

THE LAST SUMMER BOARDER.

The very last boarder—alone I am left,
And I'm thinking 'tis certainly queer,
When Harry, and Jack, and their sisters have gone,
That I should be lingering here;
No breathing a sigh when Lizzie Montague
In the old yellow stage rode away,
Nor golden-haired Fanny went home long ago,
And Mary a fortnight to-day.

The big maple-tree, like a great auctioneer,
Hangs out its last wind its red flag,
"Going, just going!" the crimson tints say,
And yet—how hastily it lags.
That dear little mother of mine, I am sure,
Is anxious to find I don't come;
And "the governor's" grumbling I hear, I'm sure,
"Will, it is time you were home."

Yes, yes, I must go; and yet, Susie Gray,
I wonder if she would be sorry a bit?
Ah, then she is pretty, and very fond of the way
With some wonderful fabric to knit.
I've half minded to stay, but the little coquette,
But I know she would tease and say "No;"
Nay, if I should tell her I go away sorry,
She would only say "When do you go?"

Now what does it mean, this pain at my heart?
Say!—can it be that I love Susie Gray,
With a strap on his shoulder, a sword at his side?—
Why, the mind leans over her charms,
And she doesn't mind when his hearty mustache
Just touches her rosy cheek;
Oh! if I but had his cravat in my hand,
It would brush him slightly to speak!

Ah, Susie, my darling, my bonnie wild rose!
I don't learned it too late why I stay;
I have paid you to love you, yet love overmuch,
Oh, would I had gone yesterday!
When the sunny forest of the long summer dream
Yet snatched you its life and its charm—
They were from the window, they open the door—
How loving she clings to his arm!

They are coming. I know, though I don't look at all;
But I see in his brightness a tear,
Why, Susie, I thought!— Never mind what I said,
Colonel Gray, you are welcome here!
And the last boarder sealed with a first lover's kiss
Thus adieu 'neath the old maple-tree.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1861.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WEEK.

WHEN the rebellion first broke out, each week, and often each day, brought to the household of every honest man its budget of disappointment and sickening despair. We failed, so it seemed, in every thing we undertook, and the rebels succeeded in every enterprise of treason. The seizures of arsenals and forts followed, in swift succession, the capture of revenue cutters and the whole navy of Mints; our troops only showed themselves in order to surrender in form; our officers only won high rank to betray us; we had only manufactured and surrendered cannon, rifles, and all other munitions of war in order to have them stolen by the rebels. In the history of those long black months—January, February, March, and April—there is little or nothing to cheer, and every thing to dispirit patriot hearts. In those dark days not a few honest men gave up the republic, and despaired of the soul of the Northern people. Even afterward, when the magnificent uprising of the North had proved that the American heart had not been petrified by sordid prosperity, when the word skill in our leaders, and the unsoundness of men in high places, caused many a faint heart to revert to its previous despondency, and many a craven to sigh for peace at any price of dishonor or injury.

Thank God, those days are over! Day succeeds day, and week succeeds week now, and we all feel that the cause of the nation is gaining, not losing, ground. Week by week brings to the reader of the weekly newspaper its budget, not of hopeless defeats and surrenders, but of victories and accessions of strength. Each week accumulates fresh proofs of the soundness of the American heart, of the strength of the Government, and of the gradual progress of the good cause.

Since our last paper went to press Kentucky has squarely taken her ground. She has compelled the traitor Magoffin to demand the withdrawal of the rebel troops, and has called upon General Anderson to defend the soil of Kentucky with Kentucky Volunteers. We can not help recalling, in this connection, an article which appeared in this journal on May 4, in which we took the ground that Kentucky would either muster her riflemen under our flag, or bear the brunt of the war on her peculiar institution. She has promptly chosen. In a few weeks thousands of gallant Kentuckians will be fascinating the State motto under the Stars and Stripes. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of Kentucky's loyalty. She can not only keep Tennessee in abeyance, but can to a great extent paralyze the efforts of Arkansas and the rebels of the Lower Mississippi. With proper management she can and will furnish 50,000 troops for the war, men trained to the use of the rifle, and bred to know that a charge of powder is valuable, and must never be wasted. At the right time she will open her volunteers into Eastern Tennessee, and arouse to active life the latent Union sentiment in that region, as well as in the mountain section of Georgia and Alabama. Not the least important movement of the fall campaign will be that which takes its departure from Eastern Kentucky.

Since our last paper went to press, recruiting has received so vast a development that the apprehensions once entertained of the necessity of resorting to drafting under the Militia Act may now be dismissed. New York will furnish the 25,000 men required for the new levy in this season. Five or six thousand of them have already gone forward, and Governor Morgan is consolidating the various skeleton regiments in a practical, common-sense manner, so that every regiment will be willing to fight, and see an opportunity of doing so. By the middle of October, New York, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio will have fully 175,000, if not 200,000 men in the field. Massachusetts will have her full share, and glorious Massachusetts—the home of all that is truly noble in our American spirit—is doing better than any other State. By the time the fall campaign commences, the United States will have, as we said in our last number, 350,000 men in the field, exclusive of reserves and Home Guards.

The loan progresses satisfactorily. About a million dollars per day is subscribed by the people, though the Treasury Notes are not yet ready for delivery, and only one half the Government agents have been appointed. In Western Europe render it certain that large subscriptions may be expected from thence. Vigorous efforts are being made by the British aristocracy to defeat Lincoln's policy, in order to accomplish the ruin of our Republic; but Englishmen, like other people, love income, and will get it where they can, regardless of the opinions of their aristocratic leaders. From all that we can learn, we think it safe to calculate upon a subscription of fifty millions from Europe between this and the meeting of Congress. A further ground for congratulation is afforded by the success of the demand notes which are eagerly taken and retained by the people as a currency. It is evident that the Government will be able to float a hundred millions of these notes during the war.

There has been no military movement of great importance since our last number went to press. But the reconnoissance of Manassas and Johnston have examined our fortifications at Washington, and have prudently decided not to attack them. They have retired from the advanced position they occupied after the first stroke. Furthermore, they have been foiled in their scheme of hocusing Maryland out of the Union, and raising the Ping-aties of Baltimore to the leading Maryland secessionists. At the time of Fortress Monroe and Fort Lafayette, where they will be much more useful to their country than they would be at home, and secession and treason are dead in that State. Powerful naval expeditions are being fitted out for service on the Southern coast, and many days will not elapse before blows are struck which will resound to the heart of the rebel confederacy. At the West matters remain much as they were. A series of skirmishes and small battles is reported from thence; but General Fremont is not ready to take the field, and consequently decisive has occurred. He has a very large and constantly increasing force under his command, and will be able to perform his work in due season.

Our naval force is swelling to the required proportions. One of the new gun-boats has made her trial trip, and nearly a dozen are afloat. By the last October most of them will be nearly ready for active operations. By or Nov Year we shall have, including the vessels purchased by the Navy Department, a fleet of 250 craft on the Southern coast. Nearly all of these vessels will be steamers, and all of them will be well armed and equipped. Most of them will be of such light draft as to enter all the Southern harbors; so that the system of the blockade be perfect, but we shall have ample force to conduct two or three simultaneous expeditions against various points on the Southern coast, or to bombard any forts which may be deemed worth reduction. Nothing—but scruples on the part of our Government—can prevent the occupation of two or three Southern ports by his forces, and the entire stopping to the commerce of the world. Our armories are turning out ordnance and arms of all kinds with such rapidity that by the beginning of winter we shall have more than we can use, and we had before we were robbed by the rebels.

This is a very different prospect from the one which we beheld in April, or even in June last. It ought to send a thrill of patriotic exultation to every sound American heart.

THE LOUNGER.

FROM THE LOUNGER'S SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

MIDNIGHT, September, 1861.

DEAR LOUNGER,—The little town of Weissnichtwo, which is mentioned by Carlyle in his interesting memoirs of the late lamented Dr. Teufelsdreck, is just now the scene of great excitement. It seems that the chief boarding-house in the place was attacked at an early hour to-night by a party of desperate burglars. When the alarm was given the guests hurried to defend the premises, and naturally turned to whatever weapon might be at hand to help themselves. Strange and suspicious to relate, however, they found their doors tied upon the outside, when they burst them open they discovered that the tongs and shovels and brushes, which might have done service upon the instant, were removed; that the chairs, when they seized them to hurl at the enemy, fell to pieces; that there were cords stretched across the passages, on which to trip; and holes cut in the stair carpets, so that they stumbled and fell headlong. The confusion may be imagined. The indignation was intense, and the determination to square accounts with the midnight marauders rose to enthusiasm.

These gentry, meanwhile, were battering away at the doors and windows with hideous yells and execrations, trying to fire the building, and shooting any person who dared to show clearly a question of life or death. If they pushed in it was evident that the house would be sacked and destroyed, and probably murdered. Of course, to save their lives, their families, their property, there must be no delay in taking the most summary measures, because, although the bandits were comparatively few, they had laid their plans well, and had fairly taken the house by surprise. There were one or two white-faced boarders who asked, with chattering teeth, if the robbers should not be asked what they would take to go away. Two or three others, lying flat upon their bellies, asked why the house was not armed with fire-arms. One or two others, who were famous bullies and gamblers, declared that, as Christians, it touched them to the quick to submit to such a dreadful way; that the boarders ought to reflect how sorely they had exasperated the robbers by locking up all the doors as they could not expect Heaven to smile upon such unnatural strife. "For our part," said they, "we are persuaded that those who draw the sword will perish by the sword."

"Fact; sure's you're living me," shouted the leader of the band. "These chaps who have taken up the blunderbuss are darned likely to perish by the rifle!" And he aimed from the window and brought down his man.

Meanwhile some of the pale people had slipped into the dining-room, and agreed upon the following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That at this moment the watchword which should be in every mouth is, 'This house must and shall be preserved.'

"2. Resolved, That the duty of any person or persons to break the peace and destroy property at their will is ridiculous, and all sane people hold burglary, arson, and murder to be criminal.

"3. Resolved, That this ruthless midnight attack upon a peaceful household has forced every member to use every means in his power to put it to the duty of each one of us to do all he can, until the safety of the house and its inmates is assured beyond question.

"4. Resolved, That we hold next in guilt to the robbers who are attacking the house, those of the guests who refuse to assist in securing the doors and windows, thereby alienating thieves from honest men, foolishly insisting that there was an irrepressible conflict between robbers and disorder, which could only terminate in the predominance of one or the other.

"5. Resolved, That to the infatuation of these same people we can trace the catastrophes that have attended this attack. They might have pulverized with indifferent projectiles in the earliest hour; they have referred to robbers, and incendiaries, and murderers, whereby two or three persons who might have made terms for us with the robbers have not been called upon to do that service.

"6. Resolved, That as it was the duty of the master of the house and the guests to have called upon these persons, so it is their duty while resisting the robbers with fire and sword to offer them every inducement to leave, as they will only go away.

"7. Resolved, That peace ought to be made with all the robbers or none, and that any attempt upon the part of any to take all delights with which they strengthen themselves will be fatal to all hope of our success in beating them.

"8. Resolved, That it is the duty of the house to let us manage this matter.

"9. Resolved, That while we admit the right of self-defense, we do not contend against the assumption of the master and guests of this house to defend themselves at all hazards.

"10. Resolved, That while we dislike the way in which this house is defended we have a right to say so, whether it disheartens the guests and encourages the robbers or not.

"11. Resolved, That we thank the boarders who are defending their lives, and fortunes, and sacred honor with such unanimity, and it is our duty to protect them from the sophistries of sharpers and the bunting of spouters.

"12. Resolved, That the hopes of the house in this crisis rest upon us: that our management of the affair would be the most fortunate thing for every body: and that all who do not agree with us are treacherous knaves or deluded fools."

The fight was still going on when the courier left. The very latest news is, that the bandits had been driven off from them, when they heard the resolutions passed by the squad of pale people in the dining-room. The guests are laughingly discussing two questions. First, What is the connection between the first three resolutions and the rest of the list? and, Second, Who are they in the house who have helped the robbers by tying doors, hiding pokers, and cutting carpets?

When these questions are answered you shall hear the replies.

Yours,

DOUBLEDEDE.

P.S.—Later. They are laughing louder.

CAVOUR.

In the midst of our own tumult, the death of the statesman who rode the storm of Italy has passed with singularly small comment. We have indeed hardly paused to fling rosemary upon the grave of Mrs. Browning, who was so well known and so deeply loved among us. Cavour has could generate Italy so well as Cavour; and no woman could tell the story of Italian regeneration with such passionate eloquence as Mrs. Browning. It is curious that they died so simultaneously; and they will also be remembered together.

The one fact of Cavour's life is known enough. He united Italy. But the details of his life are not familiar, as they will be, when published in London by Mr. Dicey, can not fail of interest. As a boy, it seems that Cavour never played and never made friends. He was but a tolerable scholar, but learned whatever he wished to learn with singular ease, and busied himself with reading papers, political works, and histories. He was evidently so clever that he received his commission at sixteen, and was allowed to enter the army at eighteen, while twenty was the usual age. When he set out upon his travels he was already conspicuous although very young; and Austria, which hates youth and liberty, warned the police of Lombardy to beware.

Cavour had no very intimate friends. He was genial and frank to a certain point: then his temper was unpenetrable. He lived long in France and Switzerland. He visited England, but knew it rather by reading than by observation. He read English political literature very closely, and to the end of his life took the Times, the Morning Post, and the Economist, which latter paper was an especial favorite with him. The country where he found freedom and progress were the lands in which he loved to travel; and he traveled there with his eyes and ears open. Paris was doubtless, in the greatest men are; and he early set himself the task of his life. "In my dreams I see myself already Minister of the Kingdom of Italy," he wrote when he was twenty-four years old.

For nearly two years of his life of preparation he lived much in the gambling-houses of the south, and managed it so that he doubled the value of the estate and the rental. The only passion he indulged was a love of gambling. He once made gaming debts to the amount of four thousand dollars. The Marquis his father paid them out of the cavour's fortune share in the property, telling him that he would pay no more from that time. Cavour did not renounce gambling, but reduced his stakes. He was thought the best player at the Whist Club in Turin; and on the night when he was Minister to France, he played with Rothschild at a thousand francs points, and rose from table the winner of a hundred and fifty thousand francs. But gambling was rather a taste with him than a passion. His sole passion was for public life.

Cavour was in his element in office. He power was in seeing what was possible and doing it. In his domestic relations, as a rich bachelor, he was no better and no worse than the average Italian nobilanis of his time whose sole religion was the freedom of Italy. In his habits he was simple. Rising between four and five, he attended to the private affairs until six; then breakfasted lightly, and with the interval of half an hour's walking worked till two. Dinners were rare. He dined at home except when he gave state dinners, alone with his brother: then sat upon his balcony smoking a cigar, where the citizens of Turin saw "Cig. Count" as they passed. After a half hour's nap he worked again until midnight, when he went to bed. He sometimes drove with his brother in a little pony carriage known to all Turin. When he was very tired he went to the theatre and fell asleep. He enjoyed most strolling about his own estates at Levi or his brother's at Santena, and was fond of all rural nature, whose kindly sympathy drew all men to him.

This was the greatest Italian of many years. "He lived for one object only," says his biographer, "and having achieved it—died."

NOT OUT OF THE WOODS.

IT is to be hoped that we shall not about until we are out of the woods. That we shall not suppose the rebels are utterly discomfited and confounded because Mr. Franklin Minor, who is "first in position and intellect at the Court of Secessia Albenarle," says that Jefferson Davis ought to be spiked up where men can see him: and that we shall not believe the Richmond Examiner to collapse because the Richmond Examiner expects an opposition party to show itself among the rebels. There was much more reason to believe that we were going to fall when the Tribune belabored the Administration. Absolute unanimity is no more possible to the rebels than to their foes. A movement which has been contemplated and planned for thirty years, which has been secretly preparing for a year and openly organized for six months—a conspiracy of men who have been carefully alienated from the Government, and who have grown up with a generation which has been taught to hate the nation and love only a section—a war which is declared and felt by them to be a war to resist invasion, and to defend hearth, and shrine, and sacred honor—all this is not likely to break up and disappear in a night, like the ice in a river.

At this very moment Missouri is not safe; Western Virginia is doubtful; Kentucky is about to fight upon her own soil; Maryland is quieted only by military occupation; and our army on the Potomac is confronted by an army of rebels not less numerous. That we shall beat them at every point no sane man doubts. The conspiracy has not gained an inch since it started last November, and it has practically lost Maryland and Kentucky; while the nation, which six months ago had scarcely a soldier, and lay virtually at the mercy of an audacious foe, now stands erect and girt and fully ready for the fight. That we shall conquer and restore the supremacy of the Government no sane man doubts. But it is not to be done without a blow, nor will it be accomplished before sunset.

A month ago there were many who were ready to relinquish all for lost, because the Secretary of War called for the troops to hasten to Washington. What has happened within that time to persuade them that the rebellion is a bubble? This rebellion springs out of the perception of sagacious political leaders that the interest of slavery, and with it their power, has forever lost control of the Government of the United States. They have supposed since 1812 and 1820 that it might, and it probably would, be lost control. They will resist, perhaps not on the Potomac, but wherever and however they can work most harm to the Government. For they are cunning and skilful and desperate. Don't believe any escaping officer from their army who says that they are only afraid of an attack from us. Don't let them invade our soldiers into any more masked batteries. Our present loose confidence is only the reaction of the terror of a month ago. We must force ourselves to be deceived we deserve to be beaten.

PATRIOTISM BEFORE PARTY.

It is not often that a great, dominant, united political party deliberately renounces its distinctive action, as the Republican party did at Syracuse. Those who have been in the habit of considering it peculiarly prejudiced, and even unpatriotic, can no longer deny that it has taken a more truly noble course than any political party ever before in history. Its Convention clearly perceived, what the Democratic Convention refused to allow, that in a moment of danger party principles and political and action must be subordinated to the national safety.

It is simply ludicrous to assume, as the Democratic Convention did, that the Democratic party creed and the national existence are of equal importance. The Democratic party creed is such, in the opinion of the Government he maintained; and to call it peculiarly the party of the Government is sure to provoke observation of the fact that the leading rebels are now at war against the Government were all in the fullest communion with that party. The one Convention made a party name the test of patriotism; the other recognized patriotism in every party. The first Convention said, "If you are a party Democrat, you are a patriot." The second said, "If you are a patriot, your party name is of no account." If the first be right, there is, as the election will show, but a corporal's guard of loyal men in the United States. If the second be right, the overwhelming mass of the citizens are patriotic, whatever their party sympathies may be.

The time will very much help to refresh the people. There are but two tickets to vote for. One of them will get the vote of every strict party man, and of all who honestly think that the rebels are more than half right. The other will take the votes of men of all parties who believe that the Government must be unconditionally maintained against ceaseless rebellion.

NEW REDOUBT UPON TRUANTS.

The city has a new school-house—in other words, the conscience and the brain—are said to be the symbols and the safeguards of our system. If at this moment the public is not meeting its duties to maintain the school element, there is no question that it will be put into its proper place, subordinate to the other two. This, at least, is clear: that without the church and the school-house the country-house is sadly unstable; and as all trade comes down at last to individual service, so all public prosperity is very fearfully upon private principle and intelligence. Take these away, and property begins to crumble. Establish them in any people, and that people is presently prosper.

This was always the New England doctrine. By an old law of Massachusetts Bay no dwelling-house was to be nearer than a mile from the meeting-house, and one of the earliest provisions of town meetings was always the support of the schools—the good old tradition survives unimpaired, as the city of New Bedford shows.

That city has lately passed an ordinance which has the interest of two hundred years ago. The law requires all children in the city between the ages of five and sixteen, and who have no regular and lawful employment, to attend some public or private school. All who fail to comply, and all children of the public schools who are habitual truants, shall be fined five dollars for each conviction. Those shall be held to be habitual truants from the public schools who, without sufficient excuse, are absent three or more times in one term. In place of the fine, the Justice may send the truants to the Farm School, where they are to be under the control of the Mayor and Aldermen, who are also to choose, every year, three persons who shall alone be authorized to make the proper complaint, and to carry the law into execution. If these truant-officers shall find any pupil of the public schools "loafing" during school hours, without proper excuse, they shall return the truant to the school, if they do not think fit to prosecute, and shall inform the parent or guardian. The Judge of Police is clothed with jurisdiction of truancy.

This is a simple, direct law. It may save many a boy from becoming a criminal, and the city and State from many an expensive burden. It is a very heavy blow at vagrancy of all kinds, and the best point of it is that it recognizes the duty of every civilized community to do what it can to help its individual members. When, as will surely be the case after this war, the Constitution of the United States is made one of the chief studies in our schools, this ordinance will compel every citizen to know something of the fundamental law; and so far will make it impossible for any man to say what a member of Congress once told the Lounger, that he believed there were at least fifty members of the House who had never read the Constitution.

New England may be prim, but she is patriotic. She may be very moral, but she is very mighty. To continue the alliteration, she may be sour, but she is sagacious. In a country where ignorance is penal, you may look for an unparalleled public and private welfare.

THE DEFENDERS OF THE UNION.

M. KNOEBLER, the successor of Goupil & Company, has issued a large and handsome lithograph with the title "The Defenders of the Union." It represents the leading Generals of the United States Army at a council of war. General Scott sits in the fore-ground, with his hand resting upon a map; McClellan is at the end of the table, Fremont at the side of Scott; while Generals Wool, Butler, Dix, Siegel, M'Dowell, Heintzelman, Commodore Hudginson, and others, are sitting and standing around the table. The likenesses are striking, and the execution spirited and elegant. It is much the best portrait-gallery of Generals that has yet come to our notice.

The Liberal Institute says that, in his recent valedictory address to the readers of Bell's Life, "Jem Mace, the Wood cognomen himself to Lazarus. 'Like him,' says Mr. Wood, 'I am not dead but sleeping.' Would have made the metaphor more perfect if he had only restricted it so as to include the remark made on the occasion stated by Martha to our Saviour, 'Lord, by this time he stinketh.'"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

War has been declared by the Legislature of Kentucky, the Union Home Guards have placed under the charge of Brigadier-General Crittenden, and the troops under General Anderson, who has the supreme control of the State forces and ammunition.

The treasonable telegraphic news reporter of the Southern Associated Press, who has been the medium for the transmission of correspondence from traitors at the North to rebels in the South, has, with Governor Morehead and Reuben T. Marrett, cut the proprietors of the Courier-Journal out of their office, which has been forcibly taken possession of, and the paper stopped—been arrested.

The intelligence from Kentucky is of a most cheerful character. The people are represented as unanimously enthusiastic in favor of the immediate expulsion of all the rebels from the State. It is also stated that the existence of the Union forces from Indiana and the determination of the Kentuckians themselves, this object will soon be accomplished.

GENERAL ANDERSON'S PROCLAMATION.

The following proclamation has been issued in Kentucky:—

"Rebellions—Called by the Legislature of this, my native State, I hereby assume command of this department. I come to enforce, not to violate, the laws. I shall, with God's help, respect your rights in your lives. The enemies of the country have dared to invade our soil. Kentucky is to-day, as she has been, ready to meet the foe across her neighbors. Our State is now invaded by those who profess to be friends, but who are in fact our deadliest foes. No true son of Kentucky can longer hesitate as to his duty to his mother. Kentuckians, freemen, to arms! God willing, will be expelled. The leader of the hostile forces who are now on the soil of Kentucky is a Kentuckian, making war on Kentucky and Kentuckians. Let all such die forever accursed by mankind. Every one who now rallies to the support of our Union and our State is a friend. Rally, then, around the standard of the flag of fathers loved, and which has shielded us so long! I call on no arms but those which are to be used in support of what is dear to freemen! Let us trust in God, and do our duty as did our fathers.

Brigadier-General United States Army.

THE REBEL BUCKNER'S PROCLAMATION.

It is reported that a proclamation has been issued on Elizabethtown. General Anderson is believed to be advancing upon Bowling Green, where troops are gathering for our emergency.

The following proclamation has just been received:

TO THE PEOPLE OF KENTUCKY.

The Legislature of Kentucky have been faithless to the will of the people. They have refused to make your resolutions State resolutions, in which, under the guise of neutrality, the armed force of the United States might be excluded from the contiguous allies the people of Kentucky and the Southern States. It was not until after three months of every effort to prevent your action, and with large encampments of Federal troops on your territory, and a military occupation of your borders, that the United States met to regard your neutral position, engaged with a powerful force to seize its military control upon it your territory, which was of such vital importance to the defence of the Mississippi Valley and the rest of the Southern Confederacy, on the invitation of the people of Kentucky, and to maintain your part in your State. In doing so the commander announced his purpose to evacuate your territory immediately upon the withdrawal of movement on the part of the Federal forces, whenever the Legislature of Kentucky, or a majority of your people, should both belligerents the strict neutrality which they have so solemnly declared. Relying upon the faith of the Federal, at the head of a force, the advance of which is composed entirely of Kentuckians, I do not come to molest your citizens, whatever may be his political opinion. Unlike the agents of the Federal Government, who have proclaimed to the world the revocation of the civil rights of citizens in the State of Kentucky, I proclaim and declare that the claim of the President of the United States to declare martial law, to suspend the privilege of the habeas corpus, and to convert every barrack and prison in the land into a Bastile is nothing—is null and void. The people have not consent to undergo a free people. The Confederate States through Brigadier-General Pillow, in pursuance of the pledges of commanders of other columns of Confederate troops in your State, will occupy the position of the same conditions which will govern their movements. I repeat the pledge and the assurance that the force under my command will be used as an aid to the government of Kentucky in preserving her neutrality, and protecting her people, whenever they undertake to enforce it against the lawless invasion.

S. B. BUCKNER, Brigadier-General, C. S. A.

HEADQUARTERS, Sept. 18.

KENTUCKY TO BE CONQUERED BY THE REBELS.

The Memphis Appeal thus notifies Kentuckians of the purpose of their Confederate invaders:—"The Kentuckians here territory, and must have it, though at the price of blood or conquest."

INDIANA FOR SERVICE IN KENTUCKY.

The Governor of Indiana has gone into Kentucky, by way of Louisville, with guns and ammunition, to the Union men there, and to arm them to meet the foe on the frontier to hold themselves in readiness to follow. It is said that the demand for 10,000 men will be found by to leave Indiana at twenty-four hours' notice.

THE FALL OF LEXINGTON.

General Price entered Lexington, Missouri, with a large body of rebel forces, and on Monday, 16th, called on the citizens to surrender the place. This latter refused, and returned a very short but emphatic negative answer; consequently the rebels opened fire and the battle commenced in earnest, to which the Union troops replied vigorously. Reinforcements arrived on both sides during the day, and once from all parts, and it was for some time expected that Lexington would be taken by assault until they reached the Intelligence of a reliable character, however, reached Chicago on Saturday that Colonel Mulligan was compelled to surrender to the superior force of the rebel General Price on Friday, after a most determined resistance. Mulligan was without water, and was therefore reluctantly forced to yield from exhaustion. They had but 27 killed and 140 wounded, while the loss of the rebels is said to be very heavy.

AFFAIRS IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

The particulars of the battle at Carnifex Ferry, between General Rosecrans's troops and General Floyd's rebels have reached us. The present campaign in Western Virginia is likely to be far more important than was at first imagined, and the movements of General Floyd and Garnett from General Reynolds may have the effect of determining a general engagement. The force of the latter was expected from him by officers men, and civilians.

A FIGHT ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

At Blue Mills Landing, on the Missouri River, on the 17th inst., a desperate fight took place between 500 of the 1st Iowa Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, and about 4000 of the rebels. After an hour's fighting, Colonel Scott succeeded in driving the rebels off, and Colonel Smith's command came to his aid, but night fell before the fighting could be renewed. The rebels left in the night, and retreated inland, and there was no one to strive more the enemy fled and retired. Our loss was 5 killed and 38 wounded, 6 missing.

WHAT PROPERTY IS LIABLE TO CONFISCATION.

A circular has been issued by Mr. Seward, explanatory of the Confiscating Acts. It concludes as follows:—

"It will be seen, from an inspection of these provisions of the acts of Congress, that no property is confiscated or subjected to forfeiture except such as is in transit or prepared for transit to the insurgent enemy through, or for the promotion of the insurrection. Real estate, bonds, promissory notes, moneys on deposit, and the like are, therefore, not subject to seizure or confiscation in the absence of evidence of such unlawful use.

"All officers, while vigilant in the presentation of the conveyance of property to or from insurrectionary States, or the use of it for insurrectionary purposes, are expected to be careful in avoiding unnecessary vexation, and coat by seizures not warranted by law.

"WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State."

ANOTHER RAILROAD ACCIDENT CAUSED BY TREASON.

A sad accident, said to be the result of treason, occurred near Huron, Indiana, on the night of the 11th inst. A railroad bridge, 150 feet high, and having a series of sixty feet, gave way under a train of cars containing troops—a portion of the Nineteenth Illinois Regiment—precipitating nearly the whole of the cars into the bed of the creek below. Fifty-four persons were killed and about a hundred wounded. It is believed that the bridge had been maliciously undermined by one of the many secessionists who still remain in the country.

LIL. D. RUSSELL NOT TO BE EXPELLED THE COUNTRY.

The following letter from the Secretary of State is in response to a petition for the expulsion of the correspondent of the London Times from the country:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, Sept. 21, 1861.

"SIR—Your letter of the 19th instant has been handed to me by mesenick, seeking the attention of the Government to the subject expressed in your letter, and which, contained in a letter bearing the date of Washington, August 10, published in the London Times, and they express their opinion that the statements made in that communication are untrue, and that it is the design of the writer to excite the hostility of the bitter feelings of this country people in foreign countries.

"I am directed by the President of the United States to take no notice of representations, however objectionable, made in the press of foreign states, of even injurious utterances made by Ministers or other agents for foreign powers, in the discharge of their duties of their own affairs. The Government, on the contrary, has hitherto observed a policy of the most liberal duty the languages and the action of the Executive organs of foreign States.

"If it is true, as you state in your letter, that the opinion complained of, and I am quite sure that it has not arrested the confidence and favor of any other members of the diplomatic corps, and that the public, with urgent public affairs, is not disposed to attribute to the writer of the letter the influences of the writer may be, they nevertheless stand upon the same political authority, with the leading political Press of our own country is free, and is interested to receive false views, and to circulate them. The President decide not upon the favor or good-will of foreign nations, but upon the favor of the American people. He feels, and its fame seem to me now, more than ever heretofore, safe in their keeping.

"If it is the sentiment that the obnoxious paper may do harm here, is it not a sufficient reply that probably not a single copy of the London Times ever reaches the eye of our shores? If it be said again that the obnoxious correspondence is also regularly published in the United States, it seems to me a sufficient rejoinder that the censure of a correspondent is not necessarily the censure of the Press of his own citizens who reproduce the libel, rather than the original publication who wrote it and the first vessel publication.

"Finally, interference with the Press, even in the case of an existing insurrection, can be justified only on the ground of public safety. I do not say that any danger in the present case, even if one foreigner does pervert our publications, but the President thinks that foreign publications against us for a foreign Press. A hundred other foreign Presses, under such a situation, and as regardable as he is, are daily enrolling themselves in the Army of the United States, to devote their energies to the cause of the last hope of humanity in all countries and for all ages. Could I not be true to the mission of that great Press, and to the truth of our system, that error of opinion may safely be tolerated when reason is left free to combat it?

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM H. SEWARD."

DISSENSIONS AMONG THE REBELS.

The following article appears in the Richmond Whig over the signature of "A.," and will show how the gas of Franklin Misery:

"'A Word to the May Concern.—The following private letter to the editor is from an old personal friend, but long a resident of the North, and one of the first to be elected in the great county of Alabama. It was obviously not designed for publication, but the writer is so conversant with the better sign of things unseen, and the letter serve to indicate the Administration repugnance to the idea of public mind:

"'ALEXANDER, August 19, 1861.

"'DEAR MOSELEY.—I am utterly disgusted with your course. You are a traitor to your State, and I will prove it. If you will publish my speech I'll utter it.

"'I have a letter from Montgomery. Our troops there one day last week had nothing for breakfast but salt and water. Some were said quite miles at dinner, and had to raise corn, and got neither dinner nor supper when they came back to camp. Such is the fact. The reason is that our government is rotten in the head. Davis ought to be spiked up where men can see him. Toombs ought to be spiked up where no fruits from it. You have had great victories, but you have not followed them up. Your charge of the government for six months and more is a shameful one. Your army is fed, and clothed, on wagons, no any thing but salt and potatoes, and yet you sing out, that Government is doing every thing to provide for your people.' Now, it has no men, and I want to know which is the cost per a fat hog? Answer me. We must have it. The reason is your proposition to postpone the Presidential election. This is a revolution, and you must think that you may save us. If I were in Congress I would refuse one cent of appropriation till they brought it to me. Toombs Walker was turned out, and somebody put in his place with some enough to do the work. Why is it that you, and either Davis or Walker, but I have seen enough to relive contempt in the whole concern. Let me hear from you by the night place. Why, then, talk about the confidence of the people in the Administration? I don't feel any such confidence myself. I believe I am not singular in my disgust.'"

NEWS FROM THE GULF.

News from the blockading fleet of PORT ROYAL reports the Mississippi at Fort Pickens crowded. New Orleans is desolate, and its inhabitants are momentarily fearing an attack and bombardment. The most important news from the rebel army represents disease to be prevalent. The Fifth Louisiana Regiment is reported as somewhat improvable. The Wilson Zouaves were loyal and efficient.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ENGLAND TO INTERFERE IN MEXICO.

The supposed determination of England sending reinforcements to the English army in Canada is announced contemporaneously with the news of the appointment of an extraordinary commissioner for armed intervention in the affairs of Mexico. England and France, it was said, were to make a demonstration by sea and land, while Spain was to forward troops from Cuba to the republic.

ITALY.

STATE OF AFFAIRS.

The aspect of the Italian question was again serious. The Papal government had flatly denied the statement of Horace Rimbault as to the evil influence in Italy, and most of the Paris journals supported it in the position. Garibaldi was in Naples with Victor Emanuel, but General Goyon had ordered the French troops in Rome and elsewhere to oppose by force any attempt of the troops of Garibaldi to enter the Papal territory. Fresh disturbances had occurred in Poland, and the repressive measures of the Russian army officers were of a very severe character. A meeting of the clergy at Warsaw had passed resolutions hostile to the Jerome Napoleon (French) Cotinat (French). Robertine (Brazilian). Jamestown (United States). Steady (British).

THE MEN-OF-WAR IN OUR HARBOR.—[SEE PAGE 630.]

MUNSON'S HILL, THE ADVANCED POST OF THE REBEL ARMY ON THE POTOMAC.

MUNSON'S HILL AND BAILEY'S CROSS ROADS.

We illustrate on this page MUNSON'S HILL, the advanced outpost of the rebels on the Potomac, and BAILEY'S CROSS ROADS, where the nearest Union picket to MUNSON'S HILL is stationed. A correspondent of the Charleston Mercury thus describes the former:

Munson's Hill is a conical mound rising up abruptly some eighty feet above the surrounding level, and overtopping all its lofty neighbors on the front and rear. A regiment of Virginia troops from General Longstreet's brigade, occupies this position, and near the top of the hill a circular breast-work, with a dry ditch, has been thrown up for their protection. Unless artillery were employed in the attack their force could hold the post against five times their number. The country in front is too level for the use of mortars with any success, as no attempt to shell the place could be promptly thwarted by bringing up a few light rifled cannon, whose plunging fire would easily command the plain beyond. The enemy does not seem inclined, however, to dispute our possession, and has acquiesced, apparently without a murmur, in our Commander-in-Chief's decision, that they shall keep within their lines, immediately on the river, until we are ready to advance. By the time this reaches you the compliance will be a forced one, for disposition are now being made to prevent reconquation by the United States army of the advanced line, which has been selected as the base of our future operations.

A correspondent of the Tribune thus writes of and from Bailey's Cross Roads:

I always find Bailey's Cross Roads the most attractive point of the long line of army outposts, not because of the proximity of dusk wretched and insipicuous lucifers, Munson's Hill, but because of the brisk picket work that is generally carried on there. Our picket guards at this post are really of the first quality. They come from Michigan, and the best compliments I could frame for good spirits and unfailing courage I would bestow upon them. I do not speak with any claim to military judgment, and, for aught I know, the strict martial sense would criticise mine rigorously; but to the undiverted "civil" appreciation, nothing could be better worth enjoying than the handsome, manly, and sometimes droll and eccentric manners and behavior of these Michigan men. Let us look at them from this place. The first point of observation is a deserted blacksmith's shop, well ventilated with windows and filled cannon-shot holes, the latter inflicted some time ago by the rebels as a warning to Michigan men not to play improper tricks. The Michigan men had erected a furious looking piece of ordnance in the middle of the road, consisting of a stove-pipe and a set of wagon-wheels. The Confederate camp was thrown into consternation, and Bailey's Roads were studied vigorously until the real nature of the structure was discovered. The blacksmith's house was then perforated in such a manner as to afford excellent opportunities for observation on every side.

Just over the way, upon the piazza of a little dwelling-house, the Captain in command of the outpost sits serious and thoughtful. That is easy to understand. Of all the little force spread around he is the only really responsible man. His men are not under his eye, are not within call, and a good part of them can only be reached by messenger. The most remote pickets are nearly a quarter of a mile away, and who knows what may any moment happen to them? When the firing gets a little heavier than seems to him necessary, he becomes impatient, and sends out orders for less waste of ammunition. The answer always comes that the rebels fire on us, and we fire only in self-defense, which, if it does not convince, is hardly deniable, under the circumstances. Near the captain sits the surgeon, who is stationed here to attend to any wounded that may be brought in; but the wounded are not numerous, and there is a prevailing conviction that the attention of the surgeon has to be more frequently directed to corn, and its abuses, than to fractures or blood.

For the corn-fields are very rich hereabout, and the men can not possibly resist their seductions. Cookery is practiced with sentinels and dispatch in secure retreats. Corn is boiled and roasted in ample quantities. The biggest ears are gradually eliminated from the lot, and presented in form to the captain, who as gracefully accepts, and munches with dignity. Other ears, smaller, but not less sweet, are bestowed upon subordinate officers. Smoking politic are then taken to the outermost lines, and are welcomed with enthusiasm. The pickets at this station do not suffer for luxuries. "The chickens from the deserted farm-houses," says a lieutenant, "are very aggressive. They attack and bite our men, and our men are bound to resent it." So the odor of hot corn is not the only perfume that sometimes charges the atmosphere at Bailey's Cross Roads.

There is a certain hole in one side of the blacksmith's house which affords a comprehensive view of all the enemy's operations. The work on their defenses appears to have ceased for good, and the rebel soldiers do nothing but saunter and lie about upon the banks, until cool down to their picket work. Then they rattle down the hill as fast as you please while beyond range, but at a certain point they become cautious and adapt themselves to the irregularities of the ground. Nothing more is seen of them until they show furtively at the little huts on the boundary of their corn-field—for they, too, have a corn-field as well as we. They are very indistinct at this distance, and look much better at a nearer view.

UNITED STATES MISSISSIPPI GUN-BOATS BEING BUILT AT CARONDELET, NEAR ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

[SKETCHED BY ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.]

GUN-BOATS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

WE publish herewith a picture of the GUN-BOATS which are now in course of construction near St. Louis, on the Mississippi, for the Federal Government. A St. Louis correspondent writes:

The work upon the four gun-boats at Carondelet, five miles below the city, is going forward rapidly, and Captain James B. Eads, who has the contract, is displaying great energy. The boats are built of oak, unseasoned, and are called respectively the Nathaniel Lyon, John C. Frémont, Simon Cameron, and—I fear the name of the fourth has escaped me, but if it is not Jessie Frémont, it ought to be.

The boats are to be delivered by 5th October. They are to be cased with iron plates 2½ inches thick.

THE REBEL STEAMER "PAGE."

THIS little steamer, of which we give a sketch herewith, was built by THOMAS COLLYER, of this city, about seven years ago. She has been employed in the passenger trade on the Potomac River since she was launched. She is an ordinary river boat. Since the rebellion she has been kept at Aquia Creek. Lately she has been fitted up as a war steamer, mounting two rifled cannon, one forward and the other aft. When the late Captain Ward shelled the batteries at that place he endeavored to sink the Page, but was unable to do so. She is a fast vessel, and could be made very useful by the rebels in transporting troops across the river, or in towing flat-boats containing troops from place to place. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 128 feet; beam, 26 feet; depth of hold, 7 feet. Her draught of water is only about four feet.

THE MEN-OF-WAR IN OUR HARBOR.

ON page 628 we illustrate the men-of-war now (September 17) lying in the harbor of New York.

There are two French steamers—the Catinat, a side-wheel steamer, mounting about four guns, and the Jerome Napoleon, a screw steamer, of which we gave a portrait and description in a previous number, when she arrived here. Both vessels have turned their leisure in port to good account by painting their sides and trimming up their general appearance. They leave with the Prince Napoleon.

There are also two British steamers—the Rinaldo, a very handsome and fast screw steamer, clipper built, and bark rigged—she carries thirteen guns—and the gun-boat Steady, a handsome craft, which carries five guns, one of them a 68-pounder. Both of these vessels will have left by the time our picture reaches the public.

The Brazilian vessel is the steam corvette Bokráe, which carries seven guns. She, too, looks better now than when she arrived, and is really a very handsome model.

Finally, our own Jamestown, Commander Green, completes the group. We gave a picture of one of her exploits in our last number. She is an old ship, and her build is not the latest style; but she is stanch, and her crew are the men to make her name familiar to the public ear.

THE FORTIFICATIONS AT BALTIMORE.

WE illustrate on page 631 the fort now being erected on Federal Hill, Baltimore. The battlements are being rapidly completed. When the whole work is finished it will be one of the most impregnable fortifications in the country. Major Brewerton is in charge of the works, and gives employment to a large number of Union cartmen. When they are done, Murray Hill will next be fortified, and then Lafayette Park.

As some foolish stories are afloat with regard to General Dix's treatment of his prisoners, we subjoin the following from the Tribune correspondence:

No intercourse is suffered with the State prisoners at Fort M'Henry—not even are their families permitted to see them. The stories set afloat of harshness being used by the police in the capture of the prisoners are utterly untrue, for when required by the commandant of Fort M'Henry to reduce their charges to writing, the conspirators declined, saying that, perhaps, after all, their captors behaved with more than usual deference—as was really the case. The trouble was not in the police, but in the fact of the arrest, with those traitorous parties.

REBEL PRISONERS IN THE DUNGEON OF THE STATE HOUSE AT JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY JAMES A. GUIRL.]

THE WAR IN MISSOURI.

WE publish herewith, from sketches by Mr. J. A. Guirl, a picture of THE REBEL PRISONERS IN THE DUNGEON OF THE STATE HOUSE AT JEFFERSON CITY, MO., and a picture of A REBEL SHOOTING A UNION PICKET. Mr. Guirl writes: "The large, rough man sitting on the floor, with plate, bucket, etc., before him, is a desperate fellow, and is confined in the dungeon most of the time. He is holding a cracker in one hand, and cursing the Unionists for not giving him something better to eat. The man with a cap behind the barrel is the son of Gov. Jackson. The guard standing with his gun at the door is in a very awkward position, but he was standing in that way when I sketched him."

A REBEL PROWLER SHOOTING A UNION PICKET NEAR JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY JAMES A. GUIRL.]

LOOKING KENTUCKY.

WAITING for clients is not the most agreeable employment in life. If you have a good digestion you can take your quantum suff. of Chitty and Smith's leading cases, with an occasional quid of Coke upon Littleton; and having read yourself into a state of torpor, you can take a walk or a gallop on horseback; or if disposed to waste your time, you can do it by devoting an hour to some pretty maid or charming widow, taking care not to commit yourself unnecessarily. In this way I worried through my first year in Barrington, a large town in Kentucky, where I chanced to settle. For the first week I turned my head sharply when the door of my office opened, expecting to see a client. My nerves had ample time to become translquil, however, and after a few months I was so accustomed to solitude that I should have regarded an actual litigant, fee in hand, as a being for whom the sexton would presently come with a bateau corpse. The only person who commiserated me was the faithful Jake, who attended to my rooms Being naturally social, he thought a man shut up at work all day and most part of the night a churl.

"Massa Bill" (African for William Tompkins, attorney and counselor), "seems to me you powerful lonesome here in Barrington. Little women, too, 'most de chaps." (I had not then the handsome, crizzled beard which now adorns the lower part of my face.) "Law, don't I wish you knew any of dem massa Burr'l Burrs!" Jest to be dar 'bout hog killin' time, scare up a fox or two at night, drive a deer down from the knobs in de mornin', den eat 'roit round de country on barbecued pigs, see turkey shootin', an' de scrub races, an', maybe, do a little courtin' when it come handy."

It was a winning picture which Jake presented. I did know his master, though not intimately. I meditated.

"I should like to have a crack at a deer, Jake."

"Goe-a-mighty, massa, I'se nigger, and some folks tink dey don't know nuffin. But let Jake alone. I'll go 'way to Massa Burr'l's, case ole Sally she looks for me. Hi! Chasin' arter the dogs at sun-up through the black-jacks* is better 'n lashin in de dark-alley town."

It was Saturday; that night, armed with a pass against molestation by the patrol, Jake went home. I thought as much of the hunting, but amused myself next day as well as I could, making a synopsis of Brother Bunger's sermon. I had many times wandered about through the tangled thicket-bower of his periods; but I thought I would this time sweep down logically his premises, major and minor, with the conclusion, mathematically speaking, to reduce his vulgar fractions, with swelling denominators, to lowest terms. But did you ever wait for the settling of the froth of new ale?

I have heard some startling sermons in my time. Think of a man with cropped hair, groveling look, no manners, the action of a wood-sawyer, and the tone of a tall, gaunt rooster crowing for rain. "Brethren and sisters'n, I'm all the way from Indiany—when I left my wife'n six children—sh, to come over here an' preach to you the Gospel—uh! I ain't got no larnin', an' I don't want any. I'm not going to be set up taut as my lord an' master—ah, an' his disciples an' apostles—uh! If God wanted me to have larnin'—ah, he'd a given me larnin'." And so on for an hour. I [William Tompkins, counselor, etc.] am ready to make affidavit having heard this exercise—the sole exposition like a hundred others I was following on—one time during the woods, where, from a safe distance on horseback, I beheld the motley crowd that gathers on such occasions.

I do not believe, however, the story which my friend James tells of a young preacher, who, in the midst of the long career of the sermon-maker, and his gyre furtively upon his watch on the pulpit-cushion, and seeing that a considerable portion of the customary three minutes remained to be filled, went through every form of petition he had ever heard, including the restoration of the Jews to Palestine and the scattering of the unbelievers unto hell, and thinking of an expedient which had sometimes served him in eking out an unsatisfactory exhortation, exclaimed, "And now, O Lord, I will relate an anecdote!"

I repeat, I do not believe this story, although it has some degree of verisimilitude.

To return. On Monday Jake appeared with a knowing face. Presently the cause of his knowing expression came out. Colonel Barwell called. He was county court day, when every farmer of substance (and some without) came to town to do business. The colonel was in many respects a remarkable man. He was tall, six feet two, broad shouldered, and not too corpulent. His bonne hair fell back from a fine brow, while the lower part of his face was browned, and his cold chin thickly set with stumps of blue-black beard. A keen gray eye completed a picture worthy of Salvator. Two things you would be certain of: first, that Colonel Barwell had the most flourishing farm in the county; and, second, that his family (to his opinion) was beyond comparison the first and blest blooded that ever sprang from old Virginia. His country was everywhere sung in its stateliness. He had come to ask me to make him a visit. Jake's intervention was politely kept in the back-ground. His daughter, attending school in Barrington, was going to return with him that day, having, on a petition of a few weeks. My business was not trouble some, and would stand in the way of acceptance. In the afternoon Colonel Barwell called for me, and, having mounted our horses, we rode to the seminary. The daughter was already at the door in a riding-suit. Agreeing fellow came out, and, as I thought, exchanged a significant glance with her. The colonel beat his scowling regards upon the youngster as he walked away, but neither spoke or recognized the other.

"Come, our daughter," said Colonel Barwell, "Take to holding your horse."

* The black-jack is a species of stunted oak, abounding in Southern Kentucky.

As we rode away we took my place at her right, being beckoned there by her father. It was really a new sensation to me to come in contact with such a fresh and spontaneous nature. Very handsome, animated, vivacious, and natural, I really think she spoke just as she thought, and without a particle of policy or reserve. Nevertheless she did not once allude to the youth who had departed with the reflection of her smile on his face. And I suspected that her rapid and even brilliant talk was the result of effort.

In due time we traversed the sixteen miles which constituted our journey to Colonel Barwell's estate—our ride through the prairie land, covered here and there with stunted scraggy black-jacks, does not require any particular mention. Suffice it, I describe the house, the negro quarters, the kennels, and stables. Are there not tourists who do this? Nor shall I dwell upon the numerous entertainments, the old-fashioned Virginia dances, the morning rides, the exhilarating life in the open air, the freedom from ennui which makes a wealthy Kentucky farmer's house the most delightful place to visit in the (Western) world. Miss Celia was my constant companion, and a most faithful squire. But I could not forget that youngster, and I felt sure that Miss Barwell did not forget him either. And I could perceive that he met the hero of my own story. The youth had been beforehand with me.

Jake, however, drew conclusions rapidly.

"Powerful good girl, Miss Cely; eaze I know her from a pleanuttie. Carried her in my arms; reckon couldn't now, nuther. Colonel and Jake hegged, as continued: "Dere's only two o' 'em to sheer the property, Miss Cely an' Miss Amy; short division, hi! a mighty big farm an' lots o' niggers. Colonel Barwell, Miss Cely, and Massa Bill" [meaning me, William Tompkins], "I s'h'd like to t'long to you, I should to."

I had not failed to observe, as an investment in that species of live stock; but the frank avowal of confidence by Jake was a compliment to my good temper which I could not slight. And I told him that if I were his owner I would not whip him more than once a week; at which he haw-hawed, and showed his white teeth in full view.

Nothing could be more touching than the pride and affection Colonel Barwell felt in his daughter. He watched her every movement, every look, and followed her steps across the floor with all a father's fondness in his eyes. His wife was dead; he had no son; and this beautiful daughter, Anne, was plaintiff, and of a quiet turn.

I remained a week, and the hospitality was unbounded. Every day some new entertainment gave a proof of his astonishing skill with the rifle. Jake had gone home, carrying the carcass of a buck, and the colonel and I, with Celia, came home with four. It was a heavy gun: not the one he used for birds and squirrels; but nothing escaped him. Squirrels, which I could not see, came tumbling down to the trees; partridges and quails dropped among the low bushes; in every case the ball touched only the head. "Do you never miss in the body?" I would say. "Never, in this kind of game. If I should kill a bird or squirrel with a ball in his crop I should leave it in the bushes." I mentally determined to be more careful of my shots. Colonel Barwell as long as there was any other for him to shoot at.

On the morning when I was to return home my host expressed the customary satisfaction at the visit, in which I heartily joined; and he assured me that he would remember me in any legal business he might have.

Miss Celia (the prefix is universal in Kentucky) came to the side, and whispered to me, which I afterward remembered that I saw her slip something into Jake's hand.

I resume my former mode of life. A fortnight passed, when one evening, going to the hotel for tea, I heard that Colonel Barwell's daughter had eloped with young Manley, and been married. The marriage in Tennessee, it was supposed—and that the father was in hot pursuit.

I reasoned on the different modes of life. A fortnight passed, when one evening, going to the hotel for tea, I heard that Colonel Barwell's daughter had eloped with young Manley, and been married. The marriage in Tennessee, it was supposed—and that the father was in hot pursuit.

The next day I received a note from the father, requesting me to meet him at the house. But I don't believe that, possessing your senses, you will ever marry such a mean-spirited fellow as he has shown himself to."

Here Cockburn interrupted from the stair-way. "If you are fool enough to agree to that, Manley, then you are a mean-spirited fellow, and you don't deserve to have her."

"Who is this pitching in with his cock-a-doodle-doo?" inquired the colonel. "Come here, you, if you want your coat-tail!" And he took out a keen, glittering bowie-knife, and felt the edge with his thumb. Manley could not repress a shudder as he saw this unconcerned handling of the fearful weapon. He spoke, however, more calmly than before.

"Cockburn, I don't want any blood shed on my account—your blood least of all. As I said before, I did not steal the young lady, and to prove that I have no wish to control her against her will, I will leave it for her to decide. If she loves me, she will not leave me for her father's threats. If we are not lawfully married, it will be easy to have the ceremony lawfully performed. I shall not answer Colonel Barwell's threats as my father's husband. Recollect, I am the world considers myself a gentleman, and that they were by time probably man and wife. The inn-keeper added, that he expected them to return and pass the night at his house. There was no alternative; the baffled father sent his negro horses to the stable and waited for them.

Meanwhile the fugitives found the magistrate who generally tied the hurried knots for couples from Kentucky; unfortunately, he had no blank licenses ready, but he was willing to serve the present purpose he took one which had been used; erasing the old names and filling in the new. The ceremony performed in this irregular way, the young couple returned in high spirits, and soon reached the inn. A bountiful supper awaited them, and, when the bride had finished, she was shown to her chamber; Miss Celia was humming a song as she opened the door, but the notes froze in her throat when the light she carried fell upon the stern features of her father. He stood before her, just within the room; a thousand rebukes in his silent face.

"Father!" It was all she could say.

"Daughter!" And he stood with folded arms.

"So you came away," he went on at length, "came away, like one of the 'poor trash.' My daughter, who can marry whom she likes! I am not angry, but I am ashamed of you."

She did not speak. Proud and resolute as she was, she knew her master.

"Are you not glad?"

She bowed silently.

"According to law? Oh, you don't know! We'll say about that. Now, my daughter, you haven't but one life to live, and you have already wasted in experiments. When it is a proper time for you to marry I shall allow you a free choice; but you are a child now, and nothing more. You thought it would be funny or romantic to do this—as though it were something that could be undone! I shall not take you home with me, and you can then reflect. I don't believe you will disgrace yourself by choosing any such low-flung people. But, first of all, whose house was it, this running away, yours or his?"

"Mine," she answered, tremblingly. Perhaps not truly, for Celia was generous as he put the last question, and, knowing the violence of his wrath, she saw what a tempest was about to break on the unfortunate Manley.

"I shall see you again presently," said the father. He walked to the door, and, taking the key, went out and locked it. He had not far to go. Manley had heard voices, and was coming up when he encountered the man whom, of all men living, he had most to fear.

"Are you the fellow that has stolen my daughter?" asked the colonel. Now, whatever bravery Manley had, he was not prepared to look calmly on threatening muzzles, or to be cheerful in anticipation of having his bones broken. He had a theoretical acquaintance with them, but was so unlearned as it has sustained some very trembling knees on their way to the stake; but it was not of the kind needful in "scrimmage," when the natural means are exhausted, the bowie-knife comes in to settle the affair. So Manley, feeling an uncertainty in his legs, and a prodigious thumping at his heart, answered, in words that seemed to have the palsy:

"Yes, Sir—that is, I marry her—by her consent. She was—was not stolen."

"Oh! Not stolen. Now, Sir, I want to know about the ceremony. Tell me what was done—all about it."

Mr. Manley was not a man with a legal education, or he would have known better than to submit to any fifty-dollar J. P. as a fearful sort of frankness that is highly commended in story-books, but is very bad policy, especially in dealing with an antagonist who is armed himself. So he told what had happened, not omitting the mending of the second-hand license. A gleam of delight lighted up the colonel's face when he heard this.

"Caught in your own trap, you fool!" he exclaimed. "The marriage is not legal; not worth so much as a Continental dollar. You are from the beginning. My daughter is not your wife. Go home, you fool! Perhaps you can make a wagon-wheel. I think yourself lucky that I leave you with a whole skin."

Manley was roused by the taunts, and said something about protection from the law. But the colonel unlocked the door, and, standing on the threshold to keep the unmarried couple apart, said,

"My daughter, you have been imposed upon, deceived, betrayed. The marriage was a sham; it gives you neither the rights nor the protection of a wife. You are not married to him. I shall give you to stay three weeks. If at the end of that time you wish to marry this man you shall have an honorable wedding from this less for a man to say that he don't care. They give the cue to the town, and every face is wreathed in smiles, every finger is pointed, every voice says, "Aha!"

No man can face a whole community long. Into such a nest of hornets came Manley and Cockburn. Every where the ludicrous end of the elopement was the theme of jeering conversation. Verses were extemporized upon it, and were sung by all the idle rowdies in town, black and white. Manley was treated to a mock serenade; horns were blown, kettles were beaten; one of the serenaders had a tune crow which caused in concert; another had a venerable goat that bleated when his beard was pulled; for Manley it was Pandemonium let loose. The cursing thoughts of bestowing similar delicate attention on Cockburn; but the more prudent remembered his revolver, and thought it best not to run the risk of being peppered.

Cockburn met Manley next day, and was surprised to see the change in his face. Though still pale and thin, his bloodless lips were sharply compressed, and his eyes, no longer humid and womanly, shone with a cold, steady lustre.

"You see now," said Cockburn, "we might as well be in the infernal regions. Something must be done. We can't kill all these fellows; they are too many. You have nothing left but your choice between three things: to run away, cut your throat, or go and get your wife."

"I will go and get my wife!"

"Good!" exclaimed Cockburn. "I begin to believe in you."

Their plan was speedily arranged. Cockburn undertook to engage two or three men to accompany them. They thought the display of force would intimidate the combat into submission.

Strange that any persons could have been found to go on so desperate an errand. Perhaps. But what enterprise, however foolhardy, has ever failed to draw followers from among the restless spirits of Kentucky? If Molino del Rey is to be stormed, Kentuckians are the first to scale the walls. If Buena Vista is to be won against seven-fold odds, Kentucky rifles and cavalry are ready. If Lopez needs men to be garroted or shot in a vain attempt upon Cuba, or if the little tyrant Walker calls for aid in establishing a slave republic in Central America, Kentuckians are eager to brave fever and vomito, hunger and thirst, poisonous reptiles and more deadly semi-savages, all for glory and the love of adventure.

Preparations were speedily and silently made, and next morning at daylight Manley and Cockburn with three friends, all armed to the teeth, set out for Colonel Darrell's estate. All of them wore cloaks or loose coats, to conceal their weapons; and as they had kept their intention secret, they expected to take the enemy completely by surprise.

But the proverbial "little devil" carried the news; in this case it was a black bird—namely, Jake. In some mysterious way he heard of what was going on, and at once came to me.

"Massa Bill, dere's trouble a brewin' for ole Massa Darrell. Dat yer Manley an' Cockbun is goin' to-morrer to fotch away Miss Cely, an' to shoot de ole man if he gits in de way."

Jake, for a negro, has all his race, had a mortal contempt for "po'r white trash;" and he was rejoiced beyond measure when his master came home victorious. He expected he was done shet* of dat po'r white-livered chap, an' dat Miss Cely 'd be 'shamed of stoopin' to de low-flung people for a man. Gor-a-mighty, I hope ole massa 'll git de whole crowd some lead to fotch back wid 'em! Don't you, Massa Bill?"

I had not made up my mind.

"But, Massa Bill, wouldn't you now be a frien' to ole massa, and jest ride over an' let him know, so 's they shan't jump on him cowarus?"

"Me! Go sixteen miles at night! I think I shall not interfere in the quarrel. Why don't you go yourself? Mind, I don't tell you to do it, nor advise you."

"Oh, massa, you're sartin lawyer enough to know dat nigger's word ain't good for nothin in court; an' if dere's any trouble ole massa maybe 'll want to show that he knowed de rascals was a comin'."

The astute Jake! To think that he was more far-seeing than I in my own field!

Notwithstanding, I kept my ground. I did not see any reason why I should desire that Manley, or even the hare-brained Cockburn, should be shot. But Jake was bent on his errand, and, after borrowing a dollar from me, set out and found some white man to accompany him. I neither helped nor hindered.

A little after sunrise Miss Celia was making her toilet, when she heard the tramp of horses; she looked out of window and recognized her lover and Cockburn. What she felt I don't pretend to say. For afterward, when it became a matter of great importance to know, she kept her counsel. A remarkably intelligent and self-possessed person she proved to be. But, at all events, she started up and ran down stairs in a great fright—to inform her mother? I did not say so. For any thing I know, she may have intended to run to her lover's arms. But in the hall her father was ready; his rifle on his arm, a double-barrelled gun in the corner; powder, balls, buck-shot, patches, and percussion-caps in a chair at his knee. She had not time to speak before he stepped forward, raised the rifle, and said, "Keep off! Don't open my gate, or I shall fire!"

"Don't shoot! Keep cool!" some one answered.

The party were close together, and Manley in advance, was just opening the gate, a hundred yards or so from the porch where the colonel stood. The gate swung open, and the party coolly came on.

"Once more!" shouted the colonel, "I warn you!"

At the same instant the sharp crack of the rifle was heard, and Manley fell off his horse. His party responded with pistol-shots, but their fire fell short, and only enraged their antagonist. Quick as lightning he discharged a load of buck-shot from the other gun, and winged two of them; one was Cockburn, whose right arm fell powerless at his side.

The horsemen now halted for parley. These movements took place within ten seconds from the time when Celia came down. It was not until after Colonel Barwell had got down the second gun, still smoking, by the door, that he became conscious of his daughter's presence. She had fallen vs.

JAMES BARWELL,
under indictment for murder.
Argument of W. T. for defence.

Of course our client was acquitted. Who ever knew a Kentucky jury to convict where they believed there was a fair fight?

Cockburn and the Manleys railed at the jury, as might have been expected; but a one-armed man might talk as much as he chose, since he could no take up the quarrel; and as for the Manleys, what matter was it what a set of poor "one-account" wagon-makers said?

"And Miss Celia?" She is married to a fi ne young planter in Tennessee. "Her father?" Lives on his estate, comfortable and respected.

"No poetical justice, then?" Not a particle.

PICKING HOPS.

On the hills of old Otsego,
By her brightly gleaming lake,
Where the sound of horn and hunter
Sylvan echoes love to wake,
Where the wreaths of twining verdure
Clamber to the saplings' tops,
I sat beside sweet Minnie Wilder,
In the great field picking hops.

Then the clusters green and golden
Binding in her sunny hair,
Half afraid, yet very earnest,
Looking in her face so fair;
Speaking low, while Squire Von Lager
Talked of past and coming crops,
Said I, "Minnie, should a soldier
Stay at home here picking hops?

"While the country, torn asunder,
Calls for men like me to fight,
And the voice of patriots pleading
Asks for hands to guard the right;
While from hearts of heroes slaughtered
Still the life-blood slowly drops,
Can I—shall I stay beside you,
Minnie darling, picking hops?"

Very pale the cheek was growing,
And the hand I held was cold;
But the eye was bright and glowing,
While my troubled thought was told;
Yet her voice was clear and steady
Without sighs, or tears, or stops,
When she answered, speaking quickly,
"'Tis women's work, this picking hops.

"Men should be where duty calls them,
Women stay at home and pray
For the gallant absent soldier,
Proud to know he would not stay."
"Bravely spoken, darling Minnie!"
Then I kissed her golden locks,
Breathed anew a soldier's promise,
As we sat there picking hops.

Now I go away to-morrow,
And I'll dare to do or die,
Win a leader's straps and sword, love,
Or 'mid fallen heroes lie.
Then when all of earth is fading,
And the flattering life-pulse stops,
Still 'mid thoughts of home and heaven,
I'll remember picking hops.

THE REBEL GENERAL JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON.

THE REBEL GENERAL JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON.

We published in our last number a portrait of the Rebel General ALBERT S. JOHNSTON, who commands the rebel forces on the Mississippi: we now give the other JOHNSTON, JOSEPH E., who, with Beauregard, commands the rebel army on the Potomac.

JOSEPH ECCLESTON JOHNSTON was born in Virginia about the year 1804, and is, consequently, some fifty-seven years of age at present. After the usual school education, young Johnston was adopted by the United States, and was brought up in their Military Academy at West Point, at their cost, and under their flag. On leaving West Point he was appointed to the Fourth Artillery, and served in that capacity till 1836, when he became First Lieutenant and Assistant Commissary of Subsistence—a very desirable berth. In 1838 he was appointed First Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers, and served in that capacity through the Florida War, obtaining for his services the brevet of Captain. In 1846 he became full Captain, and served first with the Engineers, and next with a regiment of Voltigeurs, throughout the Mexican War, receiving two brevets for distinguished conduct. At the close of the war he was retained in the Topographical Engineers, and enjoyed a life of agreeable ease in the Government service, until last year, when he was placed at the head of the Quarter-master's department, with the rank of Brigadier-General. The appointment was made in June, 1860, when General Scott foresaw the trouble looming in the future. It is to be presumed that, in placing General Johnston in the responsible position of Quarter-master-General, he placed implicit reliance upon his loyalty. How that faith was requited may be inferred from the fact that, early in 1861, Joseph E. Johnston forswore his allegiance, deserted his flag, and made war against his country at the head of the Virginia rebels. General Johnston is second in command in Virginia, with the rank of full General.

THE WAR IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

ONE of our artists has illustrated the following incident of the war in Western Virginia, described in the letter of a correspondent who writes from mouth of Twenty Mile Creek, August 29:

On the 24th, Companies B and H of the Ohio 12th Regiment, under command of Major Hines, started up New River, for Hawk's Nest, which we reached about three o'clock. Hawk's Nest is a rocky cliff, 1000 feet from the water's edge in New River. Here we took supper and cooked one day's rations, put them into our haversacks, and started up Gauley Mountain. We had to ascend single file, sometimes crawling and swinging ourselves. About ten o'clock we reached the Back Bone, or top of Gauley Mountain, where we slept soundly. We got up at four, walked a mile, took breakfast, waited an hour for the fog to get off, marched four miles and took dinner.

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE SHARP-SHOOTERS.

We publish on page 625 several illustrations of the NEW HAMPSHIRE COMPANY OF BERDAN'S SHARP-SHOOTERS REGIMENT, including a portrait of Captain JONES. The Tribune said of this Company:

These New Hampshire marksmen are all men of excellent moral character, more than ordinary intelligence, and of good social position. Quite one-third are farmers, the remainder being composed of mechanics and artisans who earn their $2 a day the year round. They are led by Captain A. B. JONES, a stalwart, handsome young man, who was offered the commission by the Governor on his graduation-day at college, and who sprang with alacrity from the study of Euclid and Herodotus to that of Hardee and Scott.

He is a wonderful rifle-shot himself, having made a ten-shot string of seven inches from a rest in a recent public trial of the men. This almost equals the marvelous exploit of Colonel Gordon Bunnell in the Wochawken exhibition, and is actually better than the champion string made in '43 in Kentucky. Let the Colonel look to his laurels! The best shot in the Company is one Brown, from Bow, New Hampshire, whose string measured fifteen inches; but the average of the whole hundred men is under thirty inches. Captain JONES, in recruiting the New Hampshire Company, advertised for candidates to come to head-quarters at Concord, bringing with them satisfactory certificates of good character and habits as their second qualification for admission. The result was that over 250 applications were made, nearly all of them by men who could "pass the string test." So that the 100 taken being deducted, there is material for another company of riflemen from the Old Granite State. New Hampshire has done well in this war in a good many ways, but she has nothing to be prouder of than the 100 whom she has sent to operate on the wings of an army under young Captain JONES. If any one's eyes give a good account of themselves, we think hereafter have no faith in strong arms, steady nerves, clear sight, or 40-pound rifles.

THE ASCENT OF GAULEY MOUNTAIN, IN WESTERN VIRGINIA, BY THE TWELFTH OHIO REGIMENT.

MAJOR-GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S BODY-GUARD (STURGES RIFLES).

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S BODY-GUARD.

We illustrate herewith the corps known as the STURGES RIFLES, Captain Barker, who are serving as General M'Clellan's body-guard. They were recruited at Chicago, and took their name from the great grain merchant, Solomon Sturges, to whose liberality they were indebted for equipments. Before the outbreak of the war General M'Clellan had been connected with them as militia officer. When the war broke out they followed him into Western Virginia, and since then to Washington. They are a gallant body of picked men, all athletic, trained to endure fatigue, and all good shots. Their uniform is easy and comfortable, and is generally worn by General M'Clellan himself. Hitherto they have numbered one hundred and thirty-five men; they are now to be raised to one hundred and fifty-eight.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE house I occupied at L—— was a quaint old-fashioned building—a corner house—one side, in which was the front entrance, looked upon a street which, as there were no shops in it, and it was no direct thoroughfare to the busy centre of the town, was always quiet, and at some hours of the day almost deserted. The other side of the house fronted a lane; opposite to it was the long and high wall of the garden to a Young Ladies' Boarding-School. My stables adjoined the house, abutting on a row of smaller buildings, with little gardens before them, chiefly occupied by mercantile clerks and retired tradesmen. By the lane there was short and ready access both to the high turnpike-road and to some pleasant walks through green meadows and along the banks of a river.

This house I had inhabited since my arrival at L——, and it had to me so many attractions, in a situation sufficiently central to be convenient for patients, and yet free from noise, and favorable to ready outlet into the country for such feet or horse exercise as my professional avocations would allow me to carve for myself out of what the Latin poet calls the "solid mass of the day," that I had refused to change it for one better suited to my increased income; but it was not a house which Mrs. Ashleigh would have liked for Lilian. The main objection to it, in the eyes of the "genteel," was, that it had formerly belonged to a member of the healing profession, who united the shop of an apothecary to the diploma of a surgeon; but that shop had given the house a special attraction to me; for it had been built out on that side of the house which fronted the lane, occupying the greater portion of a small gravel court, fenced from the road by a low iron palisade, and separated from the body of the house itself by a short and narrow corridor that communicated with the entrance-hall. This shop I turned into a rude study for scientific experiments, in which I generally spent some early hours of the morning, before my visiting patients began to arrive. I enjoyed the stillness of its separation from the rest of the house: I enjoyed the glimpse of the great chestnut-trees which overtopped the wall of the school garden; I enjoyed the ease with which, by opening the glazed sash-door, I could get out, if disposed for a short walk, into the pleasant fields; and so completely had I made this sanctum my own, that not only was the servant knew that I was never to be disturbed when in it, except by the summons of a patient, but even the house-maid was forbidden to enter it with broom or duster except upon special invitation. The last thing at night, before retiring to rest, it was the man-servant's business to see that the sash-window was closed and the gate to the iron palisade locked, but during the day time I so often went out of the house by that private way that the gate was often very seldom locked, nor the sash-door bolted from within. In the town of L—— there was very little apprehension of house-robberies—especially in the daylight—and certainly in this room, cut off from the main building, there was nothing to attract a vulgar cupidity. A few of the apothecary's shelves and cases still remained on the walls, with here and there a bottle of some chemical preparation for experiment. Two or three worm-eaten wooden chairs; two or three shabby old tables; an old walnut-wood bureau, with a lock into which odds-and-ends were confusedly thrust, and sundry ugly-looking inventions of mechanical science, were assuredly no attractions which a timid proprietor would guard with jealous care from the chances of robbery. It will be seen later why I have been thus prolix in description. The morning after I had met the young stranger by whom I had been so favorably impressed, I was up, as usual, a little before the sun, and long before any of my servants were astir, went first into the room I have mentioned, and which I shall henceforth designate as my study, opened the window, unlocked the gate, and shortened for some minutes up and down the silent lane skirting the opposite wall and overhung by the chestnut-trees, rich in the garniture of a glorious summer; then, refreshed for work, re-entered my study, and was soon absorbed in the examination of that now well-known machine, which was then, to me at least, a novelty —invented, if I remember right, by Monsieur Dubois Reymond, so distinguished by his researches into the mysteries of organic electricity. It is a wooden cylinder fixed against the edge of a table; on the table two vessels filled with salt and water are so placed that, as you close your hands on the cylinder, the forefinger of each hand can drop into the water; each of the vessels has magnetic plate, and communicates by wires with a galvanometer with its needle. Now the theory is, that if you clutch the cylinder firmly with the right hand, leaving the left perfectly passive, the needle in the galvanometer will move from west to south; if, in like manner, you exert the left arm, leaving the right arm passive, the needle will deflect from west to north. Hence, it is argued that the electric current is induced through the agency of the nervous system, and that as human Will produces the muscular contraction requisite, so it is human Will that causes the deflection of the needle. I imagined that if this theory were substantiated by experiment, the discovery might lead to some sublime and unconjectured secrets of science. For human Will, thus actively effective on the electric current, and all matter, animate or inanimate, having more or less of electricity, a vast field became opened to conjecture. By what series of patient experimental induction might not science arrive at the solution of problems which the Newtonian law of gravitation does not suffice to solve; and— But I must not suffer myself to be led away into the vague world of guess by the vague reminiscences of a knowledge long since wholly neglected, or half-forgotten.

I was dissatisfied with my experiment. The needle stirred, indeed, but erratically, and not in directions which, according to the theory, should correspond to the pressure. I was about to dismiss the trial with some uncharitable contempt of the French philosopher's dogmas, when I heard a loud ring at the house-bell. While I paused to conjecture whether my servant was yet up to attend to the door, and which of my patients was the most likely to summon me at so unreasonable an hour, a shadow darkened my window. I looked up, and to my astonishment beheld the radiant face of Mr. Margrave. The sash to the door was already partially opened; he raised it higher and walked into the room. "Was it you who sang at the street door, and at this hour?" said I.

"Yes; and observing, after I had rung, that all the shutters were still closed, I felt ashamed of my own rash action, and made off rather than brave the reproachful face of some injured housemaid, robbed of her morning dreams." I turned down that pretty lane—lured by the green of the chestnut-trees—caught sight of you through the window—and—and here I am! You forgive me?" While thus speaking he continued to move along the littered floor of the dingy room with the undulating restlessness of some wild animal in the confines of its den, and he now went on, in short fragmentary sentences, very slightly linked together, but smoothed, as it were, into harmony by a voice musical and fresh as a skylark's notes. "Morning dreams, indeed! dreams that waste the life of such a morning. Rosy magnificence of a summer dawn! Do you not think that he prefers to lie abed, and to dream rather than to live? What! and you, strong man, with those noble limbs, in this den! Do you not long for a walk through the green of the fields, a bath in the blue of the river?"

Here he came to a pause, standing, still in the gray light of the growing day, with eyes whose joyous hues forestalled the sun's, and lips which seemed to laugh even in repose.

But presently those eyes, as quick as they were bright, glanced over the walls, the floor, the ceiling, the plinth, the mechanical inventions, and then rested full on my cylinder fixed to the table. He approached, examined it curiously, asked what it was? I explained. To gratify him, I sat down and renewed my experiment, with equally ill success. The needle, which should have veered from west to south, describing an angle of from 30 degrees to 40 degrees, only made a few troubled undecided oscillations.

"Tut!" cried the young man, "I see what it is; you have a wound in your right hand."

That was true. I had burned my hand a few days before in a chemical experiment, and the sore had not healed.

"Well," said I, "and what has that matter?"

"Every thing; the least scratch in the skin of the hand produces chemical actions on the electric current, independently of your will. Let me try."

He took my place, and in a moment the needle in the galvanometer pointed to his grasp on the cylinder, exactly as the French philosopher had stated to be the due result of the experiment.

I was startled.

"But how came you, Mr. Margrave, to be so well acquainted with a scientific process little known, and but recently discovered?"

"I well acquainted! not so. But I am fond of all experiments that relate to animal life. Electricity especially is full of interest."

On that I drew him out (as I thought), and he talked volubly. I was amazed to find this young man, in whose brain I had conceived thought kept one careless holiday, was evidently familiar with the physical sciences, and especially with chemistry, from my own study by predilection. But never had I met with a student in whom a knowledge so extensive was mixed up with notions so crude and incorrect. A profane sentence he showed that he had mastered some late discovery by Faraday or Liebig; in the next astonished me by citing the wild fallacies of Cardan or Van Helmont. I burst out laughing at some paradox about sympathetic powders, which he announced as if it were a recognized truth.

"Pray tell me," said I, "who was your master in physics? Never pupil never had a more crack-brained teacher."

"No," he answered, with his merry laugh, "it is not a crack-brained. I am a mere parrot; just cry out a few scraps of learning picked up here and there. But, however, I am fond of all researches into science, and guess at her riddles. To tell you the truth, one reason why I have taken to you so heartily is not only that you looked worth caught up fancy in the day your published work caught my fancy in the shop (which I guess the contents (pardon me if I say dip, I never do more than dip into any book), but also because young * * * * tells me that you have actually met in this town confirm; viz., that you are one of those few practical chemists who are at once exceedingly cautious and exceedingly bold—willing to try every new experiment, but submitting experiment to rigid tests. Well, I have an experiment running which I am giddy mad of doing, and I want you, some day when at leisure, to catch it, fix it as you have fixed that cylinder: make something of it. I am sure you can."

"What is it?"

"Something akin to the theories in your work. You would not believe how sensitive to each special constitution the special substance that may fail to the equilibrium of its health. But you own that the electric current causes the best cure of disease is less to deal with the disease itself than to support and stimulate the whole system, so as to enable nature to cure the disease and restore the impaired equilibrium by her own agencies. Thus, if you find that in certain cases of nervous irritation the nitric acid is efficacious, it is because the nitric acid has a virtue in locking up, as it were, the nervous energy, and in concentrating all undue waste. Again, in some cases of what is commonly called feverish cold, stimulants like ammonia assist nature itself to get rid of a disorder that opposes her normal action; and, on the same principle, I apprehend, it is conceded that a large average of human lives is saved in those hospitals which have adopted the supporting system of ample nourishment and alcoholic stimulants."

"Your medical learning surprises me," said I, smiling, and without pausing to notice where it deals somewhat superficially with disputable points in general, and my own theory in particular, I ask you for the deduction you draw from your premises."

"It is simply this: that to all animate bodies, however various, there must be one principle in common—the vital principle itself. What if there be one certain means of recruiting that principle? and what if that secret can be discovered?"

"Pshaw! The old illusion of the medieval empirics."

"Not so. But the medieval empirics were great discoverers. You sneer at Van Helmont, who sought in water the principle of all things; but Van Helmont discovered in his search those invisible bodies called gases. Now the principle of life must be certainly ascribed to a gas.* And whatever is a gas, chemistry should not despair of producing! But I can agree no longer now —never can argue long at a stretch—we are wasting the morning; and, joy! the sun is up! See! One's nose can get out! and greet the great Life-giver face to face."

I could not resist the young man's invitation. In a few minutes we were in the open lane under the glinting chestnut-trees. Margrave was chanting, low, a wild tune—words in a strange language.

"What words are those? no European language, I think; for I know a little of most of the languages which are spoken in one quarter of the globe, at least by its more civilized races."

"Civilized races! What is civilization? Those words were uttered by men who founded empires when Europe itself was not civilized! Hush, is it not a grand old air?" and lifting his eyes toward the sun, he gave vent to a voice clear and deep as a mighty bell! The air was grand—the words had a sonorous swell that suited it, and they seemed to be jubilant and yet solemn. He stopped abruptly, as a path from the lane led us into the fields, already half-dried in sunlight—dews glittering on the hedge-rows.

"Your song," said I, "would go well with the clash of cymbals or the peal of the organ. I am no judge of melody, but this strikes me as that of a religious hymn."

"I compliment you on the guess. It is a Persian fire-worshiper's hymn to the sun. The dialect is very different from modern Persian. Cyrus the Great might have chanted it on his march upon Babylon."

"And where did you learn it?"

"In Persia itself."

"You have traveled much—learned much—and are so young and so fresh. Is it an impertinent question if I ask whether your parents are yet living, or are you wholly lord of yourself?"

"Thank you for the question—pray make my answer known in the town. Parents I have not —never had."

"Never had parents!!"

"Well, I ought rather to say that no parents ever owned me. I am a supernatural sun—a vagabond—a nobody. When I came of age I received an anonymous letter, informing me that in sum—the time of say what—but more than enough for all I need, was lodged at an English banker's in my name; that my mother had died in my infancy; that my father, who had through secret channels provided for my education and rearing, was also dead—but recently; that as I was a child of love, and he was unwilling that the secret of my birth should ever be traced, he had provided for me, not by will, but in his life, by a sum consigned to the trust of the friend who now wrote to me; I need give myself no trouble to learn more; faith, I never did. I am young, healthy, rich—yes, rich! Now you know all, and you had better tell it, that I may win no man's courtesy and no maiden's love upon false pretenses. I have not even a right, you see, to the name I bear. Hist! let me catch that squirrel."

With what a panther-like bound he sprang! The squirrel escaped his grasp only by the oak-tree; in a moment he was up the oak-tree too. In an instant I saw him rising from bough to bough; saw his bright face among the glittering teeth through the green leaves; presently I heard the sharp, piteous cry of the squirrel—echoed by my patient's merry laugh. Down, through that maze of green, Margrave came, dropping on the grass and bounding up as Mercury might have bounded with his wings at his heels.

"I have caught him—what pretty brown eyes!"

Suddenly the gay expression of his face changed to that of a savage; the squirrel had wrenched itself loose and bitten him. The poor beast! In an instant its neck was wrung —its body dashed on the ground; and that fair young creature, every feature quivering with rage, was standing over it, with its eyes gaze and again! It was horrible. I caught him by the arm indignantly. He turned round on me like a wild beast. Blood from its gums—his teeth set, his hand lifted, his eyes like balls of fire.

"Shame!" said I, calmly; "shame on you!"

He continued to gaze on me a moment or so—his eye glaring, his breath panting—and then, as if mastering himself with an involuntary effort, his arm dropped to his side, and he said, quite humbly, "I beg your pardon; indeed I do. I was not myself then. Forgive me. I can not bear pain!" and he looked in deep compassion for himself at his wounded hand. "Venomous beast!" And he stamped again on the body of the squirrel, already crushed out of shape.

I moved away in disgust, and walked on.

But presently he left my arm self-taken aside, and a voice, dulcet as the coo of a dove, stole its way into my ears. There was no resisting the charm with which this extraordinary mortal could fascinate even the hard and the cold; nor them, perhaps, the least. For as you see in extreme old age, when the heart seems to have shrunk into itself, and to leave but meagre and nipped affections for the nearest relations if grown up, the indurated egotism softens at once toward a playful child; or as you see in middle life some misanthrope, whose nature has been

* According to the views we have mentioned, we must substitute life to a gas, that is, to a fluid.—Liebig. Organic Chemistry, Playfair's translation, p. 362.

soured by wrong and sorrow, shrink from his own species, yet make friends with inferior races, and respond to the caress of a dog, so about this person there was the attraction of a beautiful child, of a graceful animal, half fierce and half docile.

"But," said I, with a smile, as I felt all displeasure gone, "such indulgence of passion in such a trifle is surely unworthy a student of philosophy."

"Trifle," he said, dolorously. "But I tell you it is pain; pain is no trifle—pain is the worst ill! I suffer. Look! Cure it, do!"

I looked at the hand, which I took in mine. The bite no doubt had been sharp; but the hand that lay in my own was that which the Greek sculptor gave to a gladiator; not large the extremities are never large in persons whose strength comes from the just proportion of all the members, rather than the fortitious and partial force which continued muscular exertion will give to one part of the frame, to the comparative weakening of the rest), but with the firm-knit joints, the solid fingers, the finished nails, the massive palm, the supple polished skin in which we recognize what nature designs the human hand to be—the skilled, swift, mighty doer of all those marvels which win Nature herself from the wilderness.

"It is natural," said I, thoughtfully; "that your susceptibility to suffering confirms my opinion, which is different from the popular belief, viz.: the pain is nervous rapidity; or must I mortify your pride by saying that they have some moral quality defective in you which enables them to rise superior to it?"

"The Indian savages," said Margrave, sullenly, "have not a health as perfect as mine, and in what I call vital vitality—the blissful consciousness of life—they are as sticks and stones compared to me."

"How do you know?"

"Because I have lived with them. It is all a mistake about their superior health, as I will explain to you some day; and in their fine perceptions of sounds, such do not come from exquisite equilibrium of system, but are hereditary attributes transmitted from race to race, and strengthened by training from infancy. But in a pointer stronger and healthier than a mastiff, because the pointer through long descent and early hunting creeps stealthily to his game and stands to it motionless? I will talk of this later; now I suffer! Oh, cure it—do do!"

It so happened that I had there me some roots of the white lily, which I meant, before returning home, to leave with a patient suffering from one of those painful local inflammations, to which that simple remedy often affords great relief. I cut up one of these roots, and bound the cooling leaves to the wounded hand with my handkerchief.

"There," said I. "Fortunately, if you feel pain more sensibly than others, you will recover from it more quickly."

And in a few minutes my companion felt perfectly relieved, and poured out his gratitude with an extravagance of expression and a beaming delight of countenance which positively touched me.

"I almost feel," said I, "as I do when I have stilled an infant's wailing, and restored it smiling to its mother's breast."

"You have done so. I am an infant, and Nature is my mother. Oh, to be restored to the full joy of life, the scent of wild flowers, the song of birds, and this air—mountain air—mother air!"

I know not why it was, but at that moment, looking at him and hearing him, I rejoiced that Lilian was not at L——.

"But I came out to bathe. Can we not bathe in that stream?"

"No. You would derange the bandage round your hand, and there is nothing like perfect rest for it."

"I obey, then, but I do so love the water."

"You swim, of course?"

"Ask me to cut off a limb. Ask the fish if it can escape me! I delight to dive down—down to plunge after the startled trout, as an otter does; and then to gasp among those cool, fragrant reeds and bulrushes, or that forest of emerald weed which one sometimes finds waving under clear rivers. Ah, man! could you live but an hour of my life you would know how horrible a thing it is to die!"

"Yet the dying do not think so; they pass away calm and smiling, as you will one day."

"I—! die one day—die!" and he sank on the grass, and buried his face among the herbage, sobbing aloud.

Before I could get through half a dozen words, meant to soothe and to cheer, he suddenly bounded, dashed the tears from his eyes, and was again hanging some wild, barbaric chant. I did not disturb him; in fact I soon grew absorbed in my own meditations on the singular nature, so wayward, so impulsive, which had forced intimacy on a man grave and practical as myself.

I was puzzled how to reconcile so passionate a childishness, so undisciplined a want of self-control, with an experience of mankind so extended by travel, with an education, desultory and irregular indeed, but which must have been at some time or other familiarized to severe reasonings and laborious studies. There seemed to be wanting in him that mysterious something which is needed to keep our faculties, however severally brilliant, harmoniously linked together—as the string by which a child mechanically binds the wild flowers it gathers, among them at choice into the garland or the chain.

A RUN FOR LIFE.

A RAILROAD ADVENTURE.

My father was an extremely clever and capable artisan, who possessed besides ability considerable prudence and no small share of ambition.

With such qualities it was only natural that he should rise in life; and he did so. Before I was sixteen years of age he held a lucrative and responsible position in the locomotive department on one of the great north country lines, and had he lived I think he might have made himself a name in the world. I was his only son, and he gave me a good education, deeply tinged with a mechanical coloring, in the hope that I should improve on his station. In this hope, if he were alive, he would not, perhaps, be altogether disappointed; but although I have no reason to complain of want of present prosperity and social position, it is none the less true that the spare hours and holidays of my school life were spent chiefly among work-shops, engineering establishments, and those young days I had a passion for the locomotive, and my boyish ambition was to become a master of all the mysteries of steam-engines and machinery. That I was forever loafing about the engine-house and getting an occasional trip with good-natured drivers more ready to please an inquiring youngster than careful to obey the company's regulations. In this way I early gained a tolerably complete insight into the management of that locomotive, and being a shrewd, self-confident lad, was already a profound belief in my capacity for discharging all the duties of a driver. I had, besides, an inseparable companion, named Ben Hibberd, the fireman's son, who followed the calling I thought I should so much adorn, and who delighted equally with me in pottering about engines, and in long expeditions in the short distances wherever the opportunity occurred. The elder Hibberd was an extremely daring and clever driver, and was considered, and deservedly, like too many of our very best artisans, given to occasional fits of drunkenness. This peculiarity had given me no trouble since or before the time of which I am speaking, but as on each occasion his escapades had been productive of no actual harm, and as he was the author of much valuable man, he was retained, but cautioned. Mark was quite as great a proficient as myself in the knowledge of engines, and more than half of both was to have our abilities properly recognized among the workmen who were our companions. In all our little excursions Hibberd was chief, however, was the leader; he inherited his father's skill and courage, and soon acquired, even among the men, a good reputation for coolness and steadiness. Such were young Hibberd and myself at about the age of fifteen; but in order that you may clearly understand the story of my story, I will at present say no more to explain the situation and peculiarities of our station and the neighboring line. Coulston is a large town on the —— Railway, standing midway between Derby, which is ten miles below, and Castleton, which is ten miles above it.

Attached to the station are the locomotive works already mentioned, and a very large engine-house. In the latter, the number of engines was generally considerable, and it was one of our favorite haunt, where we lurked at all hours, hoping for the chance of a run with some complaisant driver who, down to Monday, was much trusted by the cuapter of accidents and 'Shanks his mare,' for a return journey. The engine-house stood at a distance of about 200 yards below Coulston station, to which it was connected by a siding joining the main line, in a manner with which every one is familiar.

Allenby was a small place where few trains stopped, while our town was large and of rising importance. The nearest down station of any size was Littlecote, twenty miles distant—as happened one dark but clear November evening that Mark Hibberd and I were lounging about our favorite engine-house, chatting to one and another of the drivers who were busy oiling and cleaning their respective locomotives. Old Hibberd's 'Fire-fly' was there with others, and we were hanging round during the afternoon that Mark's father was to be in readiness to take a "special" down to Ilchester at eight o'clock precisely. Old Hibberd, who in fact there, though it was then half past seven, and Mark said casually, in answer to a question from old Bob Jackson, the driver of the 'Swallow,' that his father was not "on the lush;" but he had been down to the Railway Arms again that afternoon for the first time during the day, and was "screwed."

We were standing on the foot-plate as we talked, and steam having been up some time and the water filled, we were somewhat "blowing off" steam during the afternoon that Mark's father was to be in readiness to take a "special" down to Ilchester at eight o'clock precisely. Old Hibberd, who in fact there, though it was then half past seven, and Mark said casually, in answer to a question from old Bob Jackson, the driver of the 'Swallow,' that his father was not "on the lush;" but he had been down to the Railway Arms again that afternoon for the first time during the day, and was "screwed."

"Right you are, Mas'r Charley," said Bob; "but my word Mas'r Mark take her down to the points and back again while I light my lamps and fill my oil can."

"Do," said one of the little chances we delighted in. It wanted exactly twenty minutes to eight when Mark turned on steam, and we glided slowly out of the engine-house, leaving old Jackson trimming the "Firefly's" lamps. We had run backward and forward over the hundred yards of rails between the crossing and the house when Mark's evil genius prompted him to exclaim:

"I say, Charley, let's run over the points and down the line for half-a-mile or so; we can be back easy by eight o'clock."

So sooner said than done. When we reached the points I dropped off and opened the switches, thus shunting the engine on to the up-line, upon which we proposed to indulge ourselves in some two or three minutes' gallop, and then return.

Once in acting thus, you must understand that we did nothing whatever involving any danger from ordinary sources, and were in all human probability perfectly safe from mishap.

The run was a glorious success, not due at Coulston till 8·20, but which did not stop at Allenby. Nothing could possibly follow us from Ilchester for we were on the up line of rails, and as we should be back again before eight o'clock, there was of course no danger to be apprehended from the coming up of any train from our return, but only to ship his lamps and start on the down line for Lichester.

Our programme, however, was deranged in a way we little expected. Prudent if bold, we did not allow the delights of our gallop to detain us too long, and had commenced our return to eight-and-we passed the crossing on our way back to the engine-house; we had slackened speed on approaching the points, and were travelling slowly and quietly, when Mark shouted to me, "Put down the break, Charley, here's the big 'Swallow' coming out at a lick, and no mistake!" In a moment we had stopped and reversed the "Firefly," and began to move slowly ahead down the up-line again, greatly wondering what on earth brought the train, but not in the least alarmed for our safety, since we had only to allow the "Swallow" gradually to overtake us, and when she was by (which, as we had no fixed speed to set us easy) both engines might return together. Meanwhile the giant behind us came on at such a rapidly increasing speed that we were unwillingly obliged to travel faster as well. We shouted and tried to attract attention from her driver, but in vain, and we presently began to think that all was not right and to wonder. At length Mark whispered, "Charley, you may take my word for it that's the Governor, and he's mad drunk. I have seen him in that state before, and that came to hand, and don't know at this moment if he's on the up or down line or what he's doing—he's the only man I ever saw that's been drinking." Here was a pleasant situation.

It was just on the stroke of eight o'clock: in another ten minutes or a quarter by express would pass Allonby on its way to Coulston: before us therefore was the certainty of collision, and behind us an engine driver raving at a great speed, which increased with every minute, and driven by a man mad drunk—what was to be done? It was a case in which promptness, decision, and decision must be the work of a second of time.

"Let us run for Allenby," said Mark at once, with his hand upon the regulator. "Keep the whistle open, and they'll see us ahead in Providence they'll hear it and have time and sense to shunt us on to the "down" before the express runs through."

I was for less vigorous measures. Something assured me that Mark was right, and that the engine behind us was driven by Hibberd in a state of intoxication; but I fancied that however drunk he might be, he would yet not be so utterly insane as to persist in driving against certain destruction, provided we could make him understand his danger; so I proposed that we should slacken and let him overtake us, and then run on the "Swallow" and by pressure or force induce him to return. All this and much more passed between us in far fewer seconds than it has taken me to tell it; and in fact, the whole affair was a succession of such rapid action following upon decisions so swift that I find it impossible to give you the faintest idea of the startling suddenness with which the circumstances crowded on each other. For a moment Mark—thinking, doubtless, more of his father than himself—approved of my suggestion, and we slackened speed. By this time both engines were running at a perfectly frightful velocity, and the "Swallow" had come fairly within sight. No sooner did her buffers touch ours than Mark flung himself upon his father's engine. I watched him clamber along the tender till I lost the outline of his figure in the darkness. A minute of unspeakable suspense followed, during which the "Swallow" held on her rapid speed. I now did all I could to impede her progress. I shut off steam and screwed my breaks down till they were one blaze of fire, and reversed my father's engine more me forward. At length, after what seemed a whole hour to me, I heard above the din of the pace which we were going, of yells, mingled with hoarse curses. I closed the handle a moment to listen, and soon felt certain that a fearful struggle was going on between Mark and his son. I was caught at the "Swallow," pulled myself on to her, and climbed as fast as I could toward the footplate. Hibberd was driving the boiler I met Mark returning, reckless.

"On to your engine," he screamed, "and run for Allenby!"

This was enough for me; it was no time to ask or answer questions, and another second or two saw us both upon the "Swallow"—broke up, whistle open, and all steam on. We drew quickly away from our companion; but the few minutes of delay had frightfully increased our chances of safety.

It was so dark that I could not clearly see Mark's face, but I knew from the disturbed appearance of his clothes that there had been a tussle, and I said simply, "Well, Mark?" While speaking, I opened the fire-door, and as the red gleam burst out, I started in renewed horror, for his whole face, neck, and hands were covered with blood.

"It's my own, Charley," he whispered; and even while he spoke, with the dexterity of an engine driver, he wiped the noble fellow's eyes filled the foot-plate of the engine he found Hibberd alone, and raging drunk: that he had made no effort to reverse the "Swallow's" gear, and in order to do so put his hand upon the starting lever. This fairly maddened Hibberd, who flew upon him before he could accomplish his object, and cut across the brief but deadly struggle I had heard. Mark was powerless in his father's strong hands, and escaped almost by a miracle from being dashed off on to the line by a blow which felled him. In the fall his head was cut open against some of the iron work, and he was forced to return as I have described without gaining his end. But no kind of danger could make Jem Hibberd lose his coolness and his eyes darkened and his teeth set as, with hand upon the whistle, he strained forward for a glimpse of Allenby signals. As for me, I grew sick; I took up my watch for what I feared was the last time, glanced at the hands, and then sat down upon the foot-box, covered my face, and waited for the issue. I thought of the father at home who was so proud of me, and the mother whom I loved so dearly. A crowd of Mark's scenes passed me. I asked his old again, but could not read the figures: he took the watch from my hand, and his voice was quite steady as he said:

"Another two minutes for us, Charley, and there are Allenby signals."

We had been running only eight minutes since we first knew our danger, but what an age it seemed! I remember he was handing me back the watch when his hand touched mine, and I felt him start as if shot. The next instant he clasped me tight by the wrist, and whispered in my ear, "The red lamps! Life all over. God save my poor father." Again, though, he spoke cool and clear, "Hold tight to me, Charley, and when I say the word, jump for your life." We stood a moment poising ourselves upon the oscillating engine, then he shouted "Now!" and sprang. I was nervous, my foot slipped, and I fell along the footplate of the engine. In an instant there was a horrible grinding crash, a dazzling flash of light before my eyes, a huge leave upward and onward, then blackness of darkness and intense silly.

Six weeks afterward I was sufficiently recovered from fever—brought on by my injuries and the excitement of that night—for the narrative of the story. Beyond a broken leg and rib I had escaped unhurt. Violent inflammation, accompanied by delirium, had, however, greatly retarded my convalescence.

Hibberd and Mark were both dead. The former was given credit on the line for having established no visible injury beyond a comparatively trifling wound in the head, serious, it is true, but not sufficient to have caused death. He died from internal hemorrhage, and none but myself knew that the scalp wound had been the work of the lad's own father. Of the circumstances of that accident on the night express on the —— line at Allonby station in 184—, I dare say you remember the newspaper accounts—to-night I have tried to give you a true and faithful history of the causes which produced that disaster, and of which a necessarily vague and incorrect version passed current with the public.

AN ANECDOTE.

GENERAL SCOTT, in the commencement of this War, heard of a man who had an excellent Map of Virginia and Maryland, showing every city, town, wagon road, creek, run, etc.; but which was not to be found on any map in the camps or in Washington. He sent to the man and offered him $500 for the map, but the man, unpatriotically, thought he appreciated upon the necessities of the Government, and refused to take less than $800 for the map, which fact being communicated to General Scott, he sent a file of soldiers and took the map without paying the man any thing for it. The verdict of the public was "Served him right!"

Copies of this map, which General Scott thought well worth $800, are now ready for the public under the title of Lloyd's Military Map of Virginia and Maryland.

Size of sheet, 58x46 inches. Scale 9 miles to an inch. Beautifully colored in counties.

Price only 25 cents.

This map was drawn and engraved on this scale, so that it could be had by the public at a cheap price. Nothing has been left off that was on the original. It shows every rail-road and station, every wagon-road, cross road, river, creek, run, city, town, post-office, canal, mountain, harbor, sea-coast, fort, battery, and encampment. It is just the map the public have long needed to trace the operations of the armies in Virginia, and is now ready for delivery. It will be sent by mail on receipt of the price. Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circular, address
